AFTER the Publication of a Collection of State-Trials, which consists of Six Volumes in Folio; the Reader may possibly be surpris'd at the Appearance of two Volumes more of Collections on the same Subject. For this Reason it may be proper to provide some Particulars preliminary to the Work, concerning the Indisements there were to it, and the Method wherein it has been pursued.

And here we would by no means be understood to lay any Imputation on the Gentleman who prepar'd the last Edition of that Work for the Press. The judicious Preface he prefix'd to it, plainly shew'd him to be entirely Master of the Subject; and he perform'd, with eminent Sufficiency the Part he undertook, which was, to prepare and methodize such Trials, Printed or Manuscript, as were brought to him; to insert them in their proper Places, and to make Remarks and References wherever there was Occasion. The Business of collecting the several Pieces was by no means his Province, nor was it to be expected from one who had daily Avocations in the way of his Profession.

And tho' it were admitted that the then Undertakers did every thing they possibly could, to render the Work entire and complete, and spared neither Pains nor Expence to procure Materials fit for the purpose; yet it is no wonder, that in so fruitful a Field, they should after all their Diligence leave some Gleanings to reward the Industry of those that came after them.

They proceed'd in the first Edition upon a very scanty Plan, proposing to take in no Trials, but what were really State-Trials, and were taken at length and entire; and to this Plan they adhered strictly, except in a few Instances; but in preparing the second Edition, by the Advice of several Gentlemen of Learning and Candour, a greater Latitude was taken, and as well several Cases heard before the Court of Star-Chamber were inserted, as other Proceedings at Law, which could not properly be called State-Trials; and Trials which were well taken, tho' not of a Criminal Nature, were inserted, together with the dying Behaviour and Speeches of such unfortunate Persons as suffer'd Death upon their Convictions.

In almost every of these Particulars, these Supplemental Volumes will appear to have received many Additions and Improvements. The Cases here inserted, which were debated in the Star-Chamber, are such only as were considerable for the Curiosity of the Facts enquired into; as the Case of Darwin for sending down the Warrant for beholding the Queen of Scots, contrary to Queen Elizabeth's Order; or for the Figure and Season of the Poison conceiv'd; as Lord Chancellor Bacon and others. The Trial for a large Estate in Shesholt, wherein the Lady Jey was a Party, that of Mr. Dowd and others, for assaulting Mr. Colpepper; the Proceedings between the Duke and Dutchess of Nesbit, and his Grace's Trial with Mr. Germans; and some others were taken from printed Pieces, which, for their Price and Scarcity, were almost equivalent to Manuscripts; and we can with Truth say, that most of the printed Trials here made use of, cost above Ten times the Price, that an ordinary Piece of the same Size is commonly sold for.

As for the Trials in these Volumes which were never before printed, we are not at liberty to give the Reasons why we believe them to be Authentic; but we conceive the utmost Marks they bear will be to evident and convincing, to every one that reads them, of their being genuine, as to make any Proofs on that Head to be absolutely unnecessary.

We have been oblig'd in a few Places to transcribe here and there some Passages from larger Works; but in this Particular we have been as sparing as possible, having insert'd no more than was absolutely necessary to relieve the Connexion, and to make the whole more intelligible. The greatest Freedom taken in that kind has been in the Collection of Arguments and Debates upon the Hobart Corpus Aci and Liberty of the Subject, between the Years 1651 and 1650; in which we were oblig'd to be sometimes beholden (but as little as possible) to Mr. Raguenett's Historical Collections. As these Contests, between the Crown and the Subject, were one of the greatest Causes of the fatal Confusions which afterwards follow'd, and of that farprising Revolution which was the Abdolishment of all Charters, every Proceeding in that Affair, warranted by sufficient Authority, was thought worth preserving; especially as it related to what, next to the Life of the Subject, is deemed most precious in the Eye of the Law, his Liberty.

Some Gentlemen may perhaps think that Mr. Raguenett's Collection are so full on this Head, that it would be a Presumption to add any thing to them; but it will appear that most of the Speeches and Proceedings here printed are not taken notice of by Mr. Raguenett. How they came to be omitted, we will not pretend to determine; only we cannot forbear observing, as a strange Injustice of Partiality in that Editor, that after inserting the Articles against the Earl of Stratford at large in his Trial, he has abridg'd the Answer put in by him to his Articles, with this large-direction. The Answer took three Hours, being above 200 Sheets of Paper, too long to be here inserted; yet take an Abstract of the said Answer to the articles exhibited against him, which are as follows. Which Abstract is so vastly short, as not to contain above Ten Pages.

For fear of being thought partial, in order to swell the Price of the Book, we have omitted the Trial at large of the Earl of Stratford, it being to be had separate at a moderate Price. We don't doubt but his Answer at large would have been a great Ornament to this Collection, and would have enabled the World to judge more clearly of his Case, than it is now likely to do. But as all the Proceedings against him were finally order'd to be obliterated; so, with the utmost Enquiry, we have been unable to find any Copy thereof remaining with the Defendants of his Family, or in any other Hands.

The Case of Abolition, between the East-India Company and Mr. Sandy, does not, it must be confess'd, strictly speaking, come under the Description of a State-Trial; but as the publishing the Proceedings between the King and the City of London, upon a 25th Warrent, in the last Edition of the State-Trials, met with general Approbation, we hope the like candid Construction will be put upon the Step we have taken in this Case. The Question of the Power of the Crown to grant an exclusive Charter, and the Difficulties to be made between a criminal Monopoly, the regal Privilege, and legal Property, are undoubtedly of the highest Importance. The Point is debated upon the Occasion by the most knowing and eminent Lawyers of the Time, and their Arguments are now full published from Manuscripts, which have not been taken notice of in any of the Law-Books now extant, (except a very short Abstract of some of the Speeches, which is printed in Mr. Seymour's Reports) to which are added, the learned Arguments and Reasons of the Lord Chief-Justice Jaggis.

There are some Instances where we have not been able to procure complete Trials, and yet have obtained either Speeches made in them by Gentlemen of Note at that time, or large and particular Relations, though not in so minute and exact a manner, as in Trials taken in Short-hand in Court. Where any thing of this kind has occur'd, which we judg'd worth notice, we have chos'to preserve them from the oblivion they would otherwise sink under, by inserting them in this Collection. And tho' they are not so valuable as State-Trials, yet they may serve to give a more clear Account of the Facts there treat'd, than is to be found in a general History; which, as the learned Editor of the State-Trials will observe, is one considerable Benefit arising from Collections of this kind.

Concerning the other Pieces contained in this Collection, we need be less particular in this place, as we have before most of the Articles, or in Not as the Bottom, given our Reasons for inserting them: Only let it should be thought that the remarkable Case of Abby and White, in the last Volume, contains so much that the small Book, published under that Name in Octavo in the Year 1705, it may be proper to observe, That the whole Proceedings and Debates of that memorable Affair are deduc'd in order of Time from the first Complaint made in the House of Commons; containing not only the Proceedings, Reports, Representations, Conferences and Resolutions, of both Houses, as publish'd by their Order, but also the Proceedings and Arguments in the Court of King's-Bench.

As we, as no Pains or Expence has been spared to make this Collection complete, useful and instructive; so we must submit the whole to the Judgment of the Publick, and rely upon the Candour of the Readers, for a kind Acceptance of our Endeavours.

another to my Lady Elizabeth's Grace, ready to say this end, that they should ascribe against my Lord Protector's Grace.

Surely to fellowship as could be. Nowe what a kind of Death was this, that when he was ready to lay his Head upon this Block, he turned out the Lecherous Servants and forth, and my Servants spoke the Thing that he wotes of it Well, the Words were ever heard.

His first count confided them Papers, and they were found in a Chamber of his. They were so given between the Scoles of a school where. He made his yoke in craftily, and with such Workmanship, as the lyke had not been fore.

I was Prisoner in the Tower twelve, and I could never invente to make yoke his. It was a Wonder to hear of his Sabellity. He made his Pen of the Ajlet of a Paynte that he plucked from his Nose, and thus wrote these Letters for himselfe, as ye have heard, enlarging many matters as my Lord Protector's Grace, and to fourth. God had lye him to himselfe, he hadde chosen forlorn hym. What would he have done if he had lived still? thus went about this King. Charity (they say) worketh but good, not after this forte. Well, he is gone, he knoweth his fate by this, he is either in joy or in payne. There is an appearance over this lyke, but if he dye in the State of damnacion, he shall crye in the same. Yea, though he have a whole Moske to fynde for hym, he shall have his fynd sentence when he dyeth.

And that servent of his that confided and uttered this pene, was at hand name. He dyed honestly as he. God put it in his herte. And as for the tetter, whether he be saved or not, let it be to God. But surely, he was a wicked man, the Realer is well cryde of hym. It hath a traitor, that he is gone, he knoweth his fate by this. A terrible example furely, and to be noted of every man; nowe before he should dye, I heard by he had commendations to the King, and spoke many wordes of his Majesty. All is the Kings, the Kings. Yea, Dear Fere. Those were fayre wordes, the Kings, the Kings. It hath been the cost of all Traitors to pretend nothing against the Kings's Person, they are a pte of the matter to the Kings, but to other. Subjects maye not refuse the Kings's Magistrates, nor cōfide to do nothing contrary to the Kings's Lawes. And therefore these wordes, the Kings, and to fourth, are of small effe. I have heard muche wickednes of this man, and I have thought also, Joly, what wyl worth, what wyl be the end of this man? Among other (that went to execution) I heard of a woman woman, a naughty lye, a whore, a evayne body, and was ledde from Newgate to the place of execution, for a certain robbery that he had committed, and the hadde a wicked communication by the ways. This woman, I saye, as the wote by the ways, had wote and follyte talke, as this: That yf good fellows hadde kept touch with hye, he hadde not been at this time in that case; and amongst all other talke, the fiend, That such a one, named this man, had lye murthered fynde; and herebye this of hym at that tyme, I looked over what would be his end, what would become of hym.

He was a manne the farthest from the feare of God that ever I knowe or heard of an Exglobe. Fyfte he was author of all this women's wherefore. For if he had not had her myshapenes, he myght have been married, and become an honeste woman; whereas now he layng brought with hym, first fell afterwards by that occasion to dye. And they that were taught with hye fol to robbery, and the folowed; and that was he author of all this. This gave cause is requite, peradventure they maye come to be a hyge manne, but surely it is a great matter; and he, by unrepentance, let from evyl to worse, and then worse to worse of all, it is at the length he was made a spectacle to all the world. I have heard also, he was of the opinion that he believed not the immortalitye of the Soule, that he was not ryght in the matter. And it might wyl appear by the takinge of his death. But ye wyl say, What ye falsider, ye breake Charite.

Nay, it is Charite that I do, we cannot have no better use of bym now, than to use others to beware by hym.

Christ falsly, Remember Lotte's Wyfe! she was a woman that would not be content with her good state, but wrethted with God's collinge; and she was for that caufe turned into a Salt Stone, &c. Thus may this man be an example to us. Let as all subjects judge well of our Magistrates in such matters, and be content with theyr doings, and loke not so be of the Countaile.

And thus take I occasion to speake of him, and to proue you thereby, and I beseech you so to take it, as he may be a good warning to us, and this is the best use that wee can have of him now.

In his fifth Sermon he sayth. You wyl saye this, the Parliament House is wiser than I say, you might leave this to the defence of themselves: Although the men of the Parliament House can defende themselves, yet have I spoken this of a good state, and a good good of the Admirall's writings: I have not layned, not lyed our joce. I will now leave the honourable Countaile to answer for themselves. He confided our fall, he would have hadde the Governour of the King's Majesty, and wyl saye? He sayed, he would not in his minde have him brought up lyke a wode. I am fure he hath been brought up to godly, with such Schole-masters, as never King was in England, &c.

And in his seventh Sermon he sayth this: I have heard fay, what that good Queene (meaning Queene Catharine) that is gone, had ordered in her house daily prayer both before none and after none, the Admirall gettes hym out of the way, lyke a moule digging in the earth. He that be Lotte's Wyfe to me at long as I live. He was a covetous man, an horrible covetous man; I would these were no mo in England: He was an ambitious man; I would these were no mo in England: He was a felicitous man, a contented of Commune Prayer, I would these were no mo in England: He is gone, I would he had left none behind him. Remember you, my Lordes, that you pray in your houses, to the better meditation of your Felde.

II. Proceedings against Edward, Duke of SOMERSET, in Parliament, for Misdemeanours and High-Treason, Jan. 1550. 3 and 4 Edw. VI.

THE Duke of Somerset having taken the part of the common People against the Nobility in the busines of scholares, made himself many Enemies. He had also given great Grounds of Jealousy by entertaining foreign Troops in the King's Service; and the noble People who were rising in the disorder of the Rains of some Bishops Houses and Churches, drew so publick an Envy on him as any Thing he had done: And his acting by his own Authority, without asking the Advice of the Council, and often against it, was affording a regal Power, and fortified not to be endured by those who thought they were as all Points his Equals. Thus, all September, there were great Hatres between the Lords and him. The King was then at Hampton-Court, where the Protector shew was with some of his Retinues and Servants about him, which incited the Jealousies: for it was given out, he intended to carry away the King.

On the 6th of October, some of the Council met, and sent to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London to shew no Letters from the Protector, and wrote to the Nobility to inform them how they were proceeding. The Protector hearing of these Things, removed the King to Windsor in his hall, and armed such as he could gather for his protection: Whereupon several Letters passed between the Council at London, and those at Windsor; and at last a Proclamation was published against the Protector to the following effect: 1. That the Protector, by his malicious and evil Government, was the Occasion of all the Sedition that of late happened within the Realm. 2. The Lofs of the King's Princes in France. 3. That he was ambitious and fought his own Glory, as appeared by building of most sumptuous and costly Houses at the Time of the King's Wars. 4. That he esteemed nothing the great Council of the Councils. 5. That he sowed Division between the Nobles, the Gentlemen, and the Commons. 6. That the Nobles assembled themselves together at London, for none other purpose but to have caused the Protector to have lived within Limits, and to have put such Order for the Safety of the King's Majesty as appeared. 7. That he was the Protector's Doors were, which they sold were unsuitable, ungrate, and malicious. 8. That the Protector favoured the Council to the King, and did what in him lay to cause Variance between the King and the Nobles. 9. That he was a great Traitor, and therefore the Lords desired the City and Commons to aid them to take him from this his place. This was signed by the Lord Rich, Lord Cammell, &c. the Lord Sir John, President of the Council, the Marquis of Northampton, the Earl of Warwick, great Chamberlain, and most of the Council. On the 12th of October the whole Council went to Windsor, and coming to the King, they presented, that all they had done was only out of Zeal and Affection to his Person and Service. The King received them very kindly, and thanked them for their Care of him. On the 15th they sat in Council, and then for those who were ordered to be kept in their Chambers, only Cous (afterwards the famous Lord Burleigh) was let go; and, in the end, the Lord Protector was commanded from the King's Presence, and committed to Ward in a Tower within the Cullie of Windsor, called Black-hall Tower; and the next Day, being the 16th, they brought from thence the Protector, and conveyed him to the Tower of London. Some Time after, the Lords returned to the Tower, and there charged the Protector with the following Articles of Misdemeanour and High-Treason.

Articles objected to the Duke of Somerset.

THAT he took upon him the Office of Protector, upon express Condition, that he should do nothing in the King's Affairs, but by Advice of the late King's Executors, or the greatest Part of them.

1. That contrary to this Condition, he did hinder Justice, and subvert Lawes of his own Authority, as by Letters is by other Comend.

2. That he caused down Persons, arrested and imprisoned for Treason, Murder, Man-slaughter, and Felony, to be discharged, against the Lawes and Statutes of the Realm.

3. That he appointed Lieutenantes for Armies, and other Officers for the weighty Affairs of the King, under his own Writing and Seal.

4. That he commended such Ambassadors of other Realmes abroad, of the weighty Matters of the Realm.

5. That he would not use to receive divers of the King's most honourable Counsellors for declaring their Advice in the King's weighty Affairs against his Opinion, sometimes telling them, that they were not worthy to sit in Council; and sometimes, that he need not to open weighty Matters to them; and that if they were not agreeable to his Opinion, he would discharge them.

6. That against Law he held a Court of Request in his own House; and did enforce divers to answer there for their Freehold and Goods, and did determine of the same.

* For the Articles offered by the Protector, and the Letters that passed between the Lords and the King, see Burns's Reformation, Vol. II. in the Collection of Records, p. 416. 25.

† This proclamation, which had made him a Traitor, within three Days was called in again, with Commandment given none of them to be sold. For's End of Mary's, Vol. II. p. 117. 2. 117.

‡ For's End of Mary's, Vol. II. p. 117. 2. 117. The Duke was in the Tower a small Time before the Lords led the Articles to his Charge: But Burns's Reformation, Vol. II. p. 117. 2. 117. is called before the Council on the 14th, and that the Articles of his Accusation were then read to him.

8. That

2. That being an O'Clock, without the advice of the Council, or most part of them, he did deliver Offices of the King's gift for Money, grant Jewels and aids, and prebendations of Benefices pertaining to the King; gave Bishopsricks, and made sales of the King's Lands.
3. That he commanded alms and multiplacation to be preached, thereby to abuse the King's Com.
4. That divers times he openly said, that the Nobility and Gentry were the only cause of death, whereupon the people took to reform many of themselves.
5. That against the mind of the whole council, he caused Proclamations to be made concerning inclosures; whereupon the people made divers inclosures, and destroyed many of the King's Subjects.
6. That he sent forth a Commission, with articles annexed, concerning inclosures, common, highways, cottages, and such like matters, giving the Commissioners authority to hear and determine those causes, whereby the laws and Statutes of the Realm were subverted, and much Religion misused.
7. That he suffered Rebels to assemble and be armed in Camp, against the Nobility and Gentry of the Realm, without openly repelling of them.
8. That he did comfort and encourage divers Rebels, by giving them money, and by promising them fees, rewards, and services.
9. That he caused a Proclamation to be made against law, and in favour of the Rebels, that none of them should be vexed or fined by any for their offences in their Rebellion.
10. That in time of Rebellion, he said, that he liked well the manners of the Rebels, and that the aversion of gentlemen gave occasion for the people to rise; and that it was better for them to die, than to perish for want.
11. That he said, the Lords of the Parliament were loth to reform inclosures and other things, therefore the people had a good cause to esteem themselves.
12. That after declaration of the defaults of Bolton, and the pieces thereof, by such as did survey them, he would never amend the same.
13. That he would not suffer the King's pieces of Northampton, and Buckingham, to be furnished with men and provision; albeit he was advertised of the Defaults, and advised thereto by the King's Council; whereby the French King was emboldened to attempt upon them.
14. That he would neither give authority, nor suffer Noblemen and Gentlemen to suppress Rebels in time of rebellion; but wrote to them to seek the Rebels out, and slay them gently.
15. That upon the 5th of October, the 22nd year, at Hampton-Court, for defence of his own private causes, he procured seditious bills to be written in counterfeit hands, and secretly to be dispersed unto divers parts of the Realm; beginning thus: God People; inciting thereby to raise the King's subjects to Rebellion and open War.
16. That the King's Privy Council did counsel at London to come to him, and move him to reform his Government, but he hearing of this assembly, declared, by his letters in divers places, that they were high Traitors to the King.
17. That he declared entirely, as well to the King as to other young Lords attending his Person, that the Lords at London intended to destroy the King; and desired the King never to forget, but to revenge it, and desired the young Lords to put the King in remembrance thereof; with intent to make faction and discord between the King and his Nobles.
18. That at divers times and places, he said, the Lords of the Council at London intended to kill me; but if I die, the King shall die; and if they slay me, they shall slay him.
19. That of his own head he removed the King suddenly from Hampton-Court to Winchester, without any provision there made, that he was thereby not only in great fear, but fell thereby into a dangerous disease.
20. That by his Letters he caused the King's People to assemble in great numbers in armies, after the manner of War, in his aid and defence.
21. That he caused his servants and friends at Hampton-Court and Winchester, to be apprehended in the King's armies, when the King's servants and guards were unarmed.
22. * That he caused at Winchester his own person in the night-time to be guarded in himself by many persons, leaving the King's Majesty's person unguarded, and would not suffer his own guards and servants to be next the King's Person, but appointed his servants and friends to keep the gates.
23. That he intended to fly to Jersey or Wales, and laid path-boards and men, and a host, to that purpose.

After he had read and considered the above Articles, he sent the underwritten submission to the Lords.

Edward Duke of Somerset's First Submission.

I Edward, Duke of Somerset, have read and considered these first twenty-nine Articles before specified, and do acknowledge my said offences, faults, and crimes, done and contained in the same, and most humble protest as my knees, do fallle and wholly submit my selfe to the most honourable mercy and clemencie of the King's Majesty, for the moderation of my said offences; having my full trust and confidence, that his Majesty, with the advice of his Highnesse most honourable Councill, will consider mine offences, faults, wrongs, and proceedings; that if any of my said offences be by his clemencie pardoned, remitted, or otherwise discharged, that I may enjoy the benefit thereof, although the same become unknown. And further, I do most humbly beseech all my Lordes, and other his Majesty's most honourable Councill, as much as he means to his Majesty, to take away all consideration mine offences to have proceeded from of ignorance, negligence, folly, wilfulness, and for lacke of due consideration, than of any wicked or malicious hart, evil intent or thought, tending to ane Traitor to his Majesty in the Realm; But that if my grace his Majesty, by the honorable advice of the said good Lordships, to have pity upon mee, my wife and children, and to take some more will with me, not accord me in the contrary, and his letters, but after his great goodness and clemencie, whereunto whatsoever or shall see, I do most humbly with all my hart submit my selfe.

Written with mine own hands the 23rd Day of December (Baronet says the 23rd) on the pylours of our Soverain, at Lord King Edward the Sixth.

However, on the second of January, a Bill was put in against the Duke of Somerset of the Articles before-mentioned, with the above Confession. This he was prevailed with so, upon assurance given, that he should be gently dealt with, if he would truly confesse and submit himself to the King's mercy. But some of the Lords said, they did not know whether that Confession was not drawn forth by him by force; and that it might be as if he had subscribed them freely and uncoerced. Whereupon a Committee was appointed of four Temporal Lords and four Spiritual, who went first to examine him concerning it. The day following the Bishops of Exeter and London made the Report: That he charged them for their kind message, but that he had freely subscribed the Confession; that he was free from it, and that he had no unreasonable desire against the King or his Realm. So both Houses have passed the Bill against him, and he was fined, by Act of Parliament, entitled, de Affirmatione Fidei et Rationis de Duke de Somerset, that as for the punishment of his late misdemeanors, whereby he was fined 30000, a year of land, and left all his goods and effects. Upon this, he sent another submission.

The second Submission of Edward Duke of Somerset, Prisoner in the Tower.

I AM most fearful and full of heaviness, my very good Lordes, to undeclare that my last letter was no longer accepted at your Lordships hands, to whom I am bound during my life, for your most gentle and merciful dealings with me, that it pleased your goodnesse to bring my case to a fine. I trust your Lordships never think that ever I did, or would intend, to stand against the King's Majesty and your Lordships Goodness, or that I would put about to just for my cause, saving his Majesty and your Lordships honour, clemencie, mercy, and pardon. Although the use be not unreasonably, yet I do not want my selfe whole to his Highnesse and your Lordships mercies. I pray onlie the moderation of it, and did ever to declare to your goodnesse, mine intention to leave it. And yet referred all to his Majesty, and your wisdom, goodnesse, and discretion. And I most humbly desire your Lordships not to think that I was about to contend with your Lordships, when I did speak of my confessions, I might see, in that I thought I did for the best, as I do acknowledge and confesse, that neither I am the wisest man in the world, nor yet if I were, I should not escape without a most singular grace, but more than I should deserve: But I leave all that, and most humble, humble, humble, and lowly, I submit my selfe to the King's Majesty, and to your good Lordships; appealing from the rigour and extremity of his Majesty's laws, to his Majesty's great mercy and clemencie; praying your goodnesse to have mercy to his Majesty, not to be offended with me, nor to exclude his Majesty's mercies benignity from me, for my weakness and lack of discretion, but to accept my good mirth as one that I have would do that were well. And when I cannot or have not done that things I ought to do, I would gladly amend, and am ready at all times without condition to do and suffer whatsoever that thing that your honours will appoint me, accepting what clemencie mercies lower I obtaine to be of his Majesty's and your goodnesse. Most humbly on my knees praying his Majesty and your good Lordships to pardon mine offences, and to order me for them, as to his most high merciful clemencie shall appear convenient. And finally flying from the extremity of justice, desire mercy, as you have, and call, most merciful Counsellors, mending my wrongs and doing them as of Beaufort or Hubbards, but still for lack of discretion and wisdom. For the which once again I require pardon and grace to be showed, and if it pleased your good Lordships to have me, I trust you should find me lowly unto your honours, and to conformable unto your Lordships orders, that I trust to make amends, and obtaine pardon for my former folly. And thus I most humbly commend your good Lordships to Almighty God, to whom I shall always pray that ye may long continue in honor. From the Tower, the second of February.

He came out of the Tower on the 6th of February, giving bond of 10000. for his good behaviour, but limited that he should stay at the King's house at Stoke, or his own at Ston, and should not go four miles from them, nor come to the King or Council, unless he was called; and when he knew that the King was to come within four miles of these houses, he was to withdraw from them.

* This Article is in Small Chronicle, but omitted in Hayward's Life of Edw. VI. and Somerset's Reformation.
 † Reynolds, Vol. VIII. O. 22. 699. Upon these same Articles, to which it was then so little known, he was first to the Tower; those where he had taken so much pains to humble himselfe had his private judges. He could not deny that most of the facts in his charge were true. But the question was, Whether they were crimes? He was accused neither of fraud nor of rapine, nor of extortion. But that was to be decided only by the peers of the Realm, or by the Parliament.
 ‡ Many thought Beaufort in a very large throat, and aggravated the algebrity of such a behaviour. But it was doubtless possible they would have been glad he should have taken another throat, which should not have failed to prove fatal to him. This assertion, that among the articles of his accusations, there were several which could be justified only by the algebrity, which would force have forced his turn in the House of Peers: the major part of whom were not inclined to favour him. For instance, he was accused that he had caused the King's People to assemble in great numbers in armies, after the manner of War, in his aid and defence. It is true, he might have allowed the King's Peers. But it was the Peers of a great King, between ten and eleven years old only, who looking upon him as his Governor, did every thing by his advice; whereas the Duke could never have cleared himself upon this Article, any more than upon several others. Consequently his only remedy was to own having guilty of all, and to call himself upon the King's mercy. Besides, it concerned him highly to get out of prison if it was possible on any terms, that it was dangerous for him to continue any longer in the hands of his enemies. Reynolds (Vol. VIII. p. 4.)

These which, being in their Place, for fear knew not where they were. And I pray which was their first among the rest, being all afraid as they (I say) truly, Good Will altogether smothered, looking when any Man would smother me on the Head.

In the mean time, whilst these things were thus in doing, the People by Chances (upon our Sir Anthony being riding into the Scaffold, which was the occasion of a new noise, for when they saw him coming, they concluded that which was not true, but notwithstanding which they all would for, that the King by that Melinger had sent his Uncle pardon, and therefore with great rejoicing, and calling up their eyes, they cried out, Pardon, pardon. I come. God I live the King. This this good Duke, altho' he was deliberate of all Man's help, yet he saw before his departure, in how great love and favour he was with all Men. And truly I do not think, that in so great slaughter of Dukes as hath been in England within these few years, there were so many weeping eyes as one mine, and as without cause: for all men did sit in the decay of this Duke, the publick run of all England, except such as indeed did perceive nothing. But now to return from whence we have strayed, the duke in the mean time standing still in the same place, madly, and with a great countenance, made a sign to the people with his hand, that they would keep themselves quiet. Which thing being done, and silence obtained, he spake unto them in this manner.

Dear! beloved Friends, there is no such matter here in hand, as you vainly hope or believe. It forceth this good unto Almighty God, whose Ordinance it is meet and necessary that we all be obedient unto. Wherefore I pray you all to be quiet, and to be contented with my death, which I am well willing to suffer, and let us now join in prayer unto the Lord for the preservation of the King's Majesty, unto whom hitherto I have always showed myself a most faithful and true subject. I have always been most diligent about his Majesty in his affairs, both at home and abroad, and no less diligent in loving the common commodity of the whole Realm. At which words all the People cried out, and said, it was most true.

Then the Duke proceeding, said, Urne whose Majesty I with continual health, with all felicity and all prosperous success. Whereunto the people again cried out, Amen.

Moreover, I do wish unto all his Considerers the Grace and Favour of God, whereby they may rule in all things agreeably with justice. Unto whom I exhort you all in the Lord, to show yourselves obedient, as it is your bounden duty, under the pain of condemnation, and also most profitable for the preservation and safeguard of the King's Majesty.

Moreover, forasmuch as heretofore I have had oftentimes affairs with

The CASE of the Marquis of Hertford, touching the Dukedom of Somerset, A. D. 1660, when the Bill was brought into Parliament to restore him to the Title of Duke of Somerset.

EDWARD, Earl of Hertford (great Grandfather of the said Marquis) was by Letters Patents under the Great Seal of England, bearing date the 26th of April, a Edw. VI. created Duke of Somerset, to hold to him and the Heirs Males of his body, upon the body of the Lady Anne his then wife begotten, and to be begotten, for ever, with several other remainders over in tail.

The said Duke afterwards, viz. in Michaelmas-Term, 5 Edw. VI. was indicted of Felony, for procuring and stirring up others to raise and impair John Earl of Warwick (one of the King's Privy-Council), which Indictment (tho' void both in matter and form) was pretended to be grounded on the Statute of 3 and 4 Edw. VI. which makes it Felony to stir up and procure others to take away the Life of any of the King's Council; but this Indictment was only for stirring up others to impair a Privy-Councillor, (which was never raised into Act) and the same declared and branded in print to be void by learned Judges. Yet the said Duke was found guilty of Felony, and put to death for this fact, which was but a pretended Felony; and it is true, yet so small I dare forbearable thereby.

The malice of his enemies not satisfied with his blood, afterwards by their power (in the infancy of the Duke's Heir, who continued and was divers Men, and hard it is to please me, that I should see it done by any that hath been offended and injured by me, I am verily capable require and ask him frequently, but especially Almighty God, who is present throughout all my Life I have most grievously offended; and as for my adversaries, they be that have offended me, I do with my whole heart forgive them. Now I once again require you, dearly beloved in this house, that you will keep yourselves quiet and still, lest through your tumults I might trouble me. For albeit the Spirit be willing and ready, the Flesh will not and warring, I and thro' your questions, I shall be much more quiet. Moreover, I desire you all to bear me witness, that I die here in the faith of Jesus Christ, desiring you to help me with your prayers, that I may perceive constant in the same unto my life's end.

* And he is further made, That the said Duke and his Heirs Males, begotten upon the Body of the said Lady Anne for ever, shall, by authority of this Act, lose and forfeit unto your Highness, your Heirs and Successors for ever, and also be deprived from hereafter for ever, as well of the Names of Viscount, Marquis, Earl of Hertford, and Duke of Somerset, and every of them, as also of all and every other, by and their Heirs or Successors, Deputies, Clerks, Attorneys, and Stewards, by whatsoever Names or Names be the said Duke hath been called, named, or created, by any Letters Patents, Writs, or otherwise.

After this, he turning himself again about like a mock Lamb, knelt down upon his knees. Then Dur. who was there present to counsel and advise him, delivered a certain Scroll unto his head, wherein was contained a brief confession unto God, which being read, he stood up again upon his feet, without any visible of Mind, (as it appeared) and first had the Sheriff's sword, then the Lieutenant of the Tower and others, taking them all by the hands which were upon the Scaffold with him. Then he gave the Hangman terms of mercy. Which done, he put off his gown, and kneeling down again in the draw, under his death-smiter. After that, the Hangman coming unto him, turned down his collar round about his neck, and all other things which did let or hinder him. Then lifting up his eyes to Heaven, where his only hope remained, and covering his face with his own handkerchief, he laid himself down along, showing no manner of token of trouble or fear, neither did his countenance change, but that before his eyes were covered, there began to appear a red colour in the middle of his cheeks.

Thus this most meek and gentle Duke lying along, and looking for the stroke, because his doublet covered his neck, he was commanded to rise up and put it off, and then laying himself down again upon the block, and calling thrice upon the name of Jesus, saying, Thy forgiveness! As he was the third time repeating the name, even as the name of Jesus was in uttering, in a moment he was bare both of head and life.

John continued in a difficult condition, deprived of all his titles, till Queen Elizabeth, in the first year of her reign, created him Earl of Hertford, and Baron Somers, and his Grandson, William Earl of Hertford, was created Marquis of Hertford, 1640, and in the year 1660, he preferred the following Case to the House of Peers: which giving a great light unto that proceeding is here inserted.

The CASE of the Marquis of Hertford, touching the Dukedom of Somerset, A. D. 1660, when the Bill was brought into Parliament to restore him to the Title of Duke of Somerset.

Edward Duke of Somerset for several months after his Father's death, procured an Act of Parliament in the same year, 5 Edw. VI. intitled, An Act touching the limitation of the late Duke of Somerset's Lands, wherein there is a clause obliquely intimated, to take away the said House for entitled as aforesaid, which, by no Felony (how notorious known the same had been) could by law have been forfeited.

This being a case unprecedented, both in law and history, and to contrary to the rules of law, justice and reason, to have an attainder of Felony made, for an offence, which apparently neither then, nor at any time after was Felony, and if a felony, yet to have a forfeiture extended beyond the offence, (if there were any) and to be so maliciously prosecuted after the death of the said Duke, (who was most instrumental in bringing about the blessed Reformation of Religion) it is humbly conceived to be such an agreeable to justice to restore the said Marquis, who is Heir Male of the body of the said Duke and the Lady Anne his wife, to his ancient Honour, so illegally taken away as aforesaid.

Whereupon, in September 1660, the said Marquis of Hertford was recalled to the Dukedom of Somerset, by a repeal of the Act of the 5th of Edw. VI.

IV. The Arraignment of Mr. Davison in the Star-Chamber, upon Tuesday the 28th of March, 1587, 30 Eliz.

Before Sir Crispian Wray, Chief Justice of England, who for the Time sate as Lord Privy-Seal; the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Archbishop of York; the Earl of Worcester, the Earl of Cumberland, and the Earl of Lincoln; the Lord Grey, and Lord Lumley; Sir James Cressy, the Comptroller; Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Master of the Rolls; the Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas; Edmond Anderjyn; Sir Roger Manwood, the Lord Chief Baron; and Sir Walter Mildmay, the Chancellor of the Exchequer;

For hearing of a Matter of Misprision and Contempt against Mr. Davison, late one of her Majesty's Secretaries, and one of her Privy-Council, by Virtue of a Commission to them directed.

Whereupon Mr. Papdon, the Queen's Attorney-General, spake in form following:

My Lords, I am to inform your Lordships in her Majesty's behalf, of a certain great and grievous Contempt and Misprision against Mr. Davison, then Prisoner at the Bar, late one of her Majesty's Secretaries. The manifold and sundry practices committed by the said Queen are not unknown unto your Honours, which were offences in the highest degree, and required to be looked unto with speed. It is well known unto your Lordships also, that thereupon, by earnest intreaty and intercession, her Majesty at length considered that the matter should be heard and decided according unto law. Whereupon were those honourable proceedings had at Peterborough. But the residence which belonged thereto, to-wit, the execution, her Majesty politely neither commanded, nor desired, offering no clemency in the former, nor wisdom in the latter. Which course, she held from the 15th of October, till November, December and January. During which time, most horrible conspiracies against her Majesty's Sacred Person were contrived, most false rumours that the said Queen was escaped spread abroad, and bearded that foreigners were landed for invasion, all which, for preservation of the said Queen, and prejudice of ours. Upon these considerations, her Majesty affirmed to sign the Warrant for her Execution, by whom such tumults were raised. Notwithstanding, being

5. Queen Elizabeth undertook to make the execution of the Queen of Scots was done against her will, and without her knowledge; the way for work was thus: Davison was the instrument for made out of, without his knowing any thing of the matter, to add this fact of Conspiracy. A little before the Queen of Scots' death, he was made Secretary of State, and it is very likely he was put into that post on purpose, that he might be drawn into the same, and made accountable for Mary's death. Repts. Vol. IX. being moved to enquire by her great wisdom, the thought necessary to have it in readiness, a day, attempt should be begun, and yet not in haste to execute at that time as I said, she left with Mr. Darcy to carry to the Great Seal, to have it in readiness as aforesaid. And he, after the sealing, and without her Majesty's commandment, procured it unto the Lords without her privy, contemptuously. Nevertheless, upon the Lords' demand to him, her Majesty bid him ask secrecy. And upon without made by the Lords whether her Majesty consented in that mind for execution of the said Queen, he said, she held that course still; and upon further question made, that her Majesty would not be further troubled with that matter. Whereupon the Lords, for no impediment, dispatched an execution, wherein Mr. Darcy did break the secrecy her Majesty repaid in him, in delivering it unto the Lords, and dealt very contemptuously in not making her privy, knowing her mind to be to the contrary. For her Majesty said Mr. Killigrew unto him, commanding him, if it were not sealed already, it should not be sealed; and after, when he said her Majesty it was sealed already, she asked him what he said? That as to done by him, he being but a particular Counsellor, her Majesty took care it a matter of high indignity and abuse of her Commissions, and a wrong of the greatest moment that ever happened since her Majesty, since which time never any Counsellor in matters of far less importance proceeded without a resolution or privy: which thing she leaves to your Honours consideration for punishment thereof.

Darcy, with a cowardly countenance, replenished with gravity, a fine delivery of speech, but a voice somewhat low (which he excused by late sickness) discreetly answered in first ensuing:

My Lords, I am right sorry, that an action of this nature, for the honourable proceedings against the said Queen, than which never was any thing more honourable, should after the full and laudable performance thereof be called into question. Again, my Lords, I am most sorry that her gracious Highness should conceive such an high displeasure against me, as to trouble your Honours with me at this present. But as in all such actions heretofore, I have been most faithful and forward to do her Majesty's commandments; so in this, by your Honours favour, let me bear the testimony of my confidence, that I have done nothing either willingly or unwillingly, but as became an honest man. And therefore, first, that I delivered it unto the Lords without her commandment, or against her commandment, let it be lawful for me with your Honours leave to justify the contrary. To that the Attorney answered, I said not that you delivered it unto the Lords against her commandment, but that you knowing her mind in this manner to Mr. Darcy to be repaid, Well, then, I desire to have the proof: whereupon the Solicitor-General read his examination, wherein to the sixth point he saith, that after the sealing she said he made her not privy to the sending down. Mr. Darcy to that answered, My good Lords, the Warrant for the execution was signed and sealed by her Majesty's express commandment; which being so, I take it to be irrevocable in law. Whereupon, by the Advice of the Lords it was sent down, the not being privy to sending down, wherein I thought I dealt as befemed me: for wits of execution do not use to count to her Majesty. That I was so forward, I thought it my duty, and for no other reason I possibly for I never had any private grudge or hatred against the Queen of Scots, but as respect of my Country and Common-Weal. The Warrant sealed with me six Weeks before I presented it, and when I presented it, my Lord Admiral will witness I was first for. The place I held, I proved I never sought for, it pleased her Majesty for some gracious opinion of me to permit me thereunto. In which I am assured I have not committed any wilful error, but as an honest man should do for nothing in the world is more dear to me than my reputation. I confess I said to some Lords, I took it to be her Majesty's pleasure to proceed therein, and I appeal to her Majesty's own conscience if I find not cause to thank for. But she is my most gracious Sovereign, it is not my duty to say, if the contrary; I will not stand in contestation with her, for it becomes me not, and therefore I submit myself to what punishment your Honours shall please to lay upon me.

Though the above Trial of Mr. Darcy is very full, yet, as the underwritten one, copied from a MS. in the Bodleian Library, under the Title Juridici, 7843. 862. pag. 335. being something different, taken by an Eye-witness, and being short, we hope it will prove acceptable to the Reader, especially as it relates to the Treason of Mary Queen of Scots; whose Trial in Vol. I. pag. 155. is very defective.

THE Proceedings against Mr. Darcy in the Star-Chamber, by Commission not read, but directed to the thirteen following:

1. The Lord Chief Justice of England, as Lord Privy-Seal for that day.
2. The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.
3. The Lord Archbishop of York.
4. The Earl of Worcester.
5. The Earl of Cumberland.
6. The Earl of Lincoln.

12. The Master of the Rolls.
13. The Lord Chief Baron.
14. The Lord Arundel.

The sum of that which was proposed, and enforced against him by her Majesty's Commissioners at the Law.

The matter laid against him is a great and heinous indignity, as her Majesty taketh it, committed by him in this last proceeding against the said Queen, which although it were in itself most just and honorable, yet in the manner of doing concerning it, Mr. Darcy is charged with by her Majesty with want of Duty. For whereas by the manifold defects of the said S. Queen, and that as the judgment of all the Realm in Parliament her life was now to satisfy the Law, and thus necessary for the

To that the Solicitor (Ex parte) answered; Mr. Darcy, you do well to extol the honour of the proceedings, for it becometh you, and to the truth was. But I must tell you the more honourable the proceedings were, the more is your contempt in not making her privy. In referring the execution, I note her Majesty's magnanimity, who not regarded the dangers of her own fall, to continue in other's life. And yet her wisdom is therein to be commended, who thought good to have it in a readiness, with intention to have clamour as long as might be. In not consulting with her Majesty your offence doth, but by your means was a great contempt, and farther, the said to you, you should sit it with great secrecy.

To which Mr. Darcy said, I confess it, and the Solicitor replied, Why then that was a caution not to do it without her consent: for notwithstanding your intention was good, it was a fatal error. Whereupon Darcy rejoined, She is my most gracious Sovereign, as good a Mother unto me as ever any Prince had, and what I have, I had it of her hands. I hope, therefore, my Lords think me not to intend as to offend her, unless by neglect; but that I did it willingly or willingly, I protest I did it not. And notwithstanding the loss Mr. Killigrew said it should not be sealed, it is not sealed already, yet it is proven not but that the said was sealed, do it where it was sealed. She said unto me, What saith? Wherein I answered, I had done it by her Majesty's commandment, and that such a thing might not be called with. Now, my Lords, the reason to move me to think it was her Majesty's meaning, were familiarity and want of skill, the honour and justice of the cause, next, I knew of an amendment from beyond the seas of her Majesty's imminent dangers. Alas! I was privy to the proceedings at Fotheringhay. I was notwithstanding of the things in Parliament. Left of all, the ransom of Scotland, the uses and customs in the Realm, which moved me, being no private commandment to the contrary, as I did. When he had said this, his adversaries told his examination, where to the second he saith, when her Majesty had him in custody, he said he would be as careful and secret as should need: so the third, he confessed it. Killigrew came unto him, telling him, if it were not sealed already it should not be sealed. To the fourth, after the Warrant was sealed, her Majesty asked him, What saith? Wherein Darcy answered, that her Majesty commanded me to keep it secret, and I told the Council of it, how can it be thought of for that? For her Majesty had me expressly from her Secretary Walsingham thereof; my Lord Chancellor must needs know it, so much as he must feel it. And her Majesty made my Lord Admiral privy thereto; so they might I not make it known in some other than these chief Counsellors? To that, said Mr. Attorney, Though Mr. Walsingham should know it, yet it was not general. Mr. Darcy answered, Neither was I verbally commanded to conceal it upon the fact. Then said the Solicitor, Another matter makes against you, my Lord Treasurer did ask you, whether it was her Majesty's pleasure? And you answered, Yes. To that said Darcy, I remember not that. The Solicitor replied, It is my Lord Treasurer's testimony. And Darcy rejoined, I reverence his testimony, and proceeded, saying, my Lords, the cause is between her Majesty and me; she is my gracious Sovereign, and I her servant, it becometh me not to say, if the contrary, neither could I, as I said, confess against her; yet let me protest, that, in my own conscience, I have dealt as sincerely, faithfully and honestly as any servant could do. Then spoke the Lord Chief Justice of England, saying, By that, if the asked you, What saith? You might know it was her pleasure to defer it, and therefore you do it without her commandment was a great offence. Then spoke Grosvenor, the Queen's Sergeant: My Lords, four things I note that Mr. Darcy's conduct is full, that her Majesty bade him ask secrecy; next, the Warrant being sealed, Mr. Killigrew was sent unto him, that were it not sealed already, it should not be sealed at all. Thirdly, he confessed her Majesty was content he should show it Mr. Walsingham, which proves the minded to keep it from the rest. And it had been his duty to have known her pleasure; and therefore for so much as he confessed this, preference of the whole Realm, as was desired; yet her Majesty, of her natural most gracious and merciful disposition, after the so honourable condition and proclamation of the S. Queen's guiltiness, notwithstanding so many important allegations and vehement intercessions, could not be brought to condemn to the execution; rather desiring by all means possible, if there were any hope of amendment and reclaim, to spare where the might honourably fill, than to spill where the might honourably spare; and in this mind he continued from October to the end of January. But when the law that her malicious enemies daily increased their wicked attempts against her and the State, that tumours were forced and information given daily of attempts by treason, by rebellion, by violence upon her Royal Person, to work a change and delivery of the said S. Queen, the most wisely referred at length to have a full and mature judgment, agreed according to Law and Justice, in a readiness; whereby upon all occasions or occurrence, the might be executed: and this of special chance and truth, she thought good to commit to Mr. Darcy, willing him to carry it to the Lord Chancellor, to have it under the Great Seal, but without charged him to keep it very secret, and not to make any acquainted with it. The very same day he learned it to the seal, and the next day after having received charge from her Majesty, by the Lord Admiral, that day should be made, if it was not sealed; but he declared it was sealed the day before, On, where the Queen replied, What needs that had? The next day after that, (which was, I think, on Christmas Day) my Lord Treasurer asked him, if he knew what the Queen had said towards the execution? He answered, To have so forward, and so showed it unto him, and also to the call of the Council, procuring then Warrant down to prison executed, the Queen

all, the fault is bad; and it is the worst, because by her saying what she said, she might gather what her intent was. Mr. Danyel's fault, he excused by saying that the Commissioners, which a man might have thought would be to excuse, but it results in a Contempt, and a Contempt is a Contempt, and yet is not every Allegiance a Contempt? If a man do a thing without a warrant, it is a Contempt, and he is concluded to do a great offence worthy the punishment inflicted upon him: and I would.

After him spake the Master of the Rolls, agreeing with the contents of them that have before; and that Mr. Danyel's great fault made him forget his duty: also saying, that the point did not, whether he did know it was his Majesty's pleasure it should be stayed, which, had he, appeared by his own confession, and therefore, in this, he agreed with the former confessions.

Now spake the Justice Grey, who said not very much, and yet spake somewhat: that he loved the man well, and yet had cause, saying, that he had no lack of good-will, but yet had grievously offended. So he subscribed in opinion to the former judgment.

After him spake the Lord Laurey, who divided the offence into two parts. First, The neglect of his duty; and secondly, The breaking of his duty: saying further, that the Judges had told the law, and we must believe them, that it is within the compass of a Contempt. The matter, said he, is evident: for first, her unwillingness in the Parliament was a neglect of her duty, which he let slip. And further, in saying, that she was of that mind that surely she spake without the knowledge of the Court, which he said, for you ought to have told them how doubtful it was; yet, Sir, you took a worse course, that said a high manner by your positions, as it should seem, should be done without her privity. Why said he, what an abuse of the Commissioners was this? Surely a great abuse, and it was a fault against them, much more against her Majesty: this is one of the highest offences, by my words, (for to be sworn) that ever subject did against the Prince; and thus you were my brother and her (before God I speak it), I think the punishment too little; yet with no offence to you, but for the quality of your fault. But, I say, had a greater fault been imputed upon him, I would easily have agreed therewith.

After him spake my Lord Grey, who said, I was pained with speech of the first, touching the Queen of Scots, and the next, Mr. Danyel's offence. For the first, said he, it is largely discussed: for the last, my good Lords, let me crave your further examination. His offence is made the more by divers circumstances; the first circumstance is, for that it was for execution of a Queen; but what Queen! Surely such a Queen as practised most horrible treasons against our sovereign Queen! such a Queen, as conspired the overthrow of the whole State! yet, such a Queen, that fought the subversion of Christ's true Religion, to bring our souls headlong to the devil! So then, my Lords, the taking away such a Queen, can no way aggravate her fault. The second circumstance is, her breach of decency, which he executed, that he told it to the chief Counsellors: whereas Mr. Walsham, my Lord Admiral and Lord Chancellor, either by secrecy, or commandment from her Majesty, did know it undoubtedly. Whenever my Lords before me have thought, his answer is the best; for if he say no, so I am relieved. For the third point, he asking what fault he had afterwards, he said it down without her privity, before him, is the full proof of the Contempt; here in the office, and the office, which he thought to acknowledge, yet with two confessions of the fault, the Justice remains with the Realm; the next, advertisements from friends, and beyond the seas. Now, my Lords, must not these considerations move him rather to put himself under her Majesty's mercy by dealing without her commandment, than to commit her Majesty to the mercy of her life by oblying her? For had that other thing happened which God forbid, that her Majesty would have tolerated, and then this Warrant signed and sealed had been found in Mr. Danyel's hands, meaning nothing but execution, should we not then have judged him a traitor? Should we not have torn and rent him away? Surely, my Lords, I should have thought him more worthy of ten thousand deaths, than now of the least punishment that may be inflicted upon him; for each of us, in preservation of our Country, ought to love our lands, our livings, and ourselves our bodies; howbeit, I excuse not his offence, neither do I agree it is a Contempt, and I agree with the punishment; and yet I think his fault proceeded from a very good and to be pardoned his Country; and I pray God, that that peculiar ornament of pity and compassion wherewith her Majesty is singular, may be extended towards him, that all his offences, be he a simple man, may neglect of his own private will, that all his offences, be he a simple man, may neglect of his own private will, that all his offences, be he a simple man, may neglect of his own private will.

After him spake the Earl of Essex, who, for his opinion, I thought it was but negligently done, and not contemptuously; but had it been done in contempt, he would have then thought fair and imprisonment no sufficient punishment for an offence of that quality; yet the Office being as it is, for company, said he, I agree to the Fine; but in mine opinion it is too much, seeing that I know her Majesty is merciful: and for the self, I agree with my Lord Grey.

The Earl of Cambridge opposed the case, neither aggravating nor denying the offence; but briefly concluded, he agreed in opinion with his Wife's Advice.

And the Earl of Windsor said nothing, saying that he was of the same mind with Mr. Chancellor, that spake first.

After him spake the Archbishop of York, speaking, as he was, like a Bishop, rather than a Judge, to declare a matter which concerneth the State, for he inveighed against Mr. Danyel's offence by places of Scripture: Obedience, said he, is the only virtue, and Disobedience the contrary; and God requeth nothing else but obedience. So Paul said, Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers, &c. And when John was reported Ruler over Israel, the People said, They would also do as all things. If then they ought to be subject, be he a simple man, much more in these things which he said. So first, said he, for Mr. Chancellor, for he did it neither willingly nor unwillingly, as I think certainly, but of a good mind to cut off our common enemy: that it was a good deed, must needs be confessed; but that it was not well done, must needs be granted.

and therefore no presumption in him; and in his own judgment, he had sufficient warrant so to do by the first delivery of it from the Queen herself. Then considering the troublesome rumours that were then abroad, and that information came daily from London and Windsor of forces of people in arms, and the report scattered about that Antony and Cybil was broken, the prisoners gone, that London was fired, and her Majesty made away, amongst these rumours what should I do? Did I not dare which I might not and good subject would do in such a case? Further, it is not custom in court that particulars should trouble her Majesty in the execution of any such bills, but when the high judges, by her Royal effort, warrant, authority and life to it, the rest for the manner and means of execution is left to the Council; and for all other circumstances of time, when, if place, where, of persons, by whom; especially in this case when her Majesty had said expressly that the would not be troubled any more with it. Thirdly, for the not imparting of it to her upon her communication with him, &c. I had it by me six or six weeks before I spake any thing more of it, and was very unwilling to trouble her any more with it, especially remembering her words.

This was the effect of his defence, not uttered continuously, as I have set it down, but interposed by the particulars as they were objected, in much more largely large and choice terms; but I think that I have not left out any thing of weight. After this, the Commissioners began to speak judiciously unto the matter, whose Speeches I will by way of abridgement now, where any thing was spoken different from others, and especially notable, for most of them had the same beginning of the South Queen's demerits, &c.

The first then spake was Mr. Walter Willmory.

He handled eloquently the great causes the Queen had to deal severely with the S. Queen, and the importance of the Parliament thereon, and her Majesty's patience in following, her wisdom in being willing, her natural and accessible clemency in being slow; and compared her slackness with Mr. Danyel's fault, that he knew her mind therein very well. Then he shewed, that such things might not in any style be executed from Princes, and that perfumery and excuses at the uttermost that subjects can offer, for the Prince's Heart is in God's hand to dispose of. As for the Council, it is known that no Prince's Counsellors are father made privity to any thing, than that it pleases the Prince, and afterwards that is imputed to see that is conceived from another with great cause, and therefore you should not presume further than you had express leave, much less to have them an encouragement to the suit to proceed therein upon your own opinion, howsoever your desire was for the end good and honest, especially seeing these hath not been the like example, but he concluded that the punishment should not be in regard to the man's ability, but to the quantity of the Crime committed, (his judgment) ten thousand marks, and imprisonment during her Majesty's pleasure. To which all after agreed.

Vol. VII.

2. Sir Roger Mordaunt, Lord Chief-Baron.

The second, seated at large the South Queen's perpetual evil mind to our Queen, to bereave her of her Crown as her husband, as her usurper, the Arms and State of England in possession, when she was first (out of the shell) married unto France, her debasing of it in her Widowhood, by laying the fault upon her late husband, and yet then seeking to be proclaimed His spouse in the life of her chief father, for the never call of her dear father, which was a dangerous step to her marriage, for he did in her second marriage, his bloodiness in continuing to her husband's murder, and upon that, flight and deprivation of her protection here by our Queen not only in life, but in honour; yet her alienation to the purposes of the Duke of North, and yet after that, tho' then our Queen would not suffer her for that to be touched, not any way defamed, as many would have had her, not only agreeing to treasonous plots, but also completing with them, and therein going beyond them all, so as we could never be in quiet, but we had a Shoreville, and then an Edwin, then a Flora, then a Perry, and now lately Abigail and Robert; her Majesty at length was forced to use a little severity with her accustomed mercy, and one ounce of use with ten of the other. For even in this proceeding against her, she might have been by the Senate of Edward III. by a Jury of Esquires and Gentlemen, attainted and burned, and her blood corrupt; yet her Majesty did chide by a new and so deal more honourably with her. Then he came to this fall of Mr. Danyel's, which he implied by the central reason of her Majesty's mind in all this, proceeding as the other did before, the thing he took to be Misprision and Contempt in our Law, punishable by Fine and Imprisonment; and he said, that Misprision and Contempt is to do any thing contrary to, or before the Prince's commandment, or the good of the State, in other things; as Justices of Itinerary to sit out of Term, to sit in bad courts, or Knights, and so he gave their examples, as in the Masters of the Law, viz. Sheriffs to execute their office, as Barons Knights to the Parliament without their Oaths. So this thing they bring a high point of Justice, was not in any respect to be done otherwise than her Majesty's express commandment would bear, especially not with such haste, when she expressly declared her mind to the contrary; wherein Mr. Danyel may seem by this fault, if her Majesty had any other purpose, to have persecuted her, and God might otherwise have turned her mind; for it is not lawful to be of suspicion in her Majesty in respect of that, as in the execution of the Duke of North, day to day was reported, and often her Majesty declared her same danger to be and intended to have put him so death, if otherwise the law might have been finally. The commandment to impart it to the Prince Edward in especially, was an exhortation to the suit against him, and finally, what he said my Lord Tanner could not be gathered of her Majesty's words, but rather the contrary; and the instrument was not in preceptory and irreversible as he took it, nor a sufficient Warrant for any kind of proceeding against the S. Queen, neither for the officers, nor for any other: for the last statute, besides the condition and prohibition, doth require the Queen's direction.

Therefore, as it was said, that his Majesty imports not each part of irreconcilable enmity, as a capital, so then his offence was a disobedience, and a great one. If it was in excise, I think, a good intention, but that excise was not built for absolute of metu quam servituti. And St. Paul said, Nemo enim potest suum dominum diligere, et non se ipsum. Therefore, said he, the offence was not so dangerous as for, in such a case, one would be twice advised, to be wise either herself or wife. Lady of all, he concluded he agreed with his Majesty's Council, and he ended his sermon.

Then, first, he said, to the Council. That the matter had been opened in the Council, the danger of the Swiss Queen, whom he thought, living, and dead, as ordained to disturb and trouble the State of England. This concerning Mr. Davison's offence, Albeit, said he, that which is done could be as well as otherwise done, yet now I hope would with a wisdom, whatsoever to say, in my opinion, said he, he did it in the superabundant zeal of Religion unto his Majesty, and here to the Commonwealth. These be great arguments, said he, yet not enough: for non est factum officium; altho' the act were good, yet can I not excuse him in the circumstance, however, said he, the mercy in the Prince in deferring it was great; for there was some mercy, as well as a merciful severity: for it is written, Hisque diebus regis deus, per sua misericordia for ever. Yet, said he, mercy as a Prince is not to be restrained; and therefore, because the example may be dangerous hereafter, that Council may presume to do without the commandment of the Prince, which is a mischief more intolerable than an inconvenience; therefore I agree to that punishment which is herein agreed.

Left of all spoke Mr. Prynne, Chief Justice, who threw the Case, and said further, That to every Contempt a commandment was not necessary, which by my opinion was needed to be proved, for, said he, the Bishop of Worcester came to the Parliament, and afterwards departed without licence, and therefore had a grievance. I sit upon him, Myself, said he, as a Justice of the King's Bench, in the Term we hear of matters of Treason, by the reason of our office; and out of the Term, by Commission of Oyer and Terminer also with others: at, said he, a Commission should be directed unto me and others of Oyer and Terminer for a matter of Treason, and we should assign the Prison, and assign him to die, yet would I not and that must be subject general, that all men may do it, which is not here so particular, who, or by what means. Neither is there here any such, especially his Majesty having no knowledge of the thing done. Further, he was the Queen's prisoner, and therefore no man might presume to take her away, or deliver her without special licence from the Queen; and finally, he showed, that the good intent was no warrant to transgress duty, whosoever he put a case of two, as where Judgment of death is given against one, and the Sheriff, for that he is a notorious thief or traitor, will hang him presently, before the Justice depart out of town.

3. Lord Audley.

He noted a difference in law between Misprison and Contempt, that one was larger than the other, and both in point of Justice, and might be when the Warrant of a Justice, or a Commissioner's Letter in such matters is not directly and finally observed; and urged, that a Secretary should be secret, and that it was his duty to have an express commandment.

4. Sir Gilbert Gerrard, Master of the Rolls.

He handled the same matter that before is spoken by others, but somewhat otherwise.

5. Sir John de Croft.

He showed his mind indifferently, with protestations of his good-will and good opinion of the man; that it was a rare example, and commended, as he thought, for want of Experience more than for want of duty.

He was somewhat sharp. Such Commissioners of execution are sent to Sheriffs, you, no Sheriff, ought to be very particular for such great persons; you had no more Commission than I, &c. and of likelihood you have hereby prevented other good purposes, which God might have put into her Majesty's mind, and herein you have led to many grave Counsellors, &c. If you were my brother, I would thank ten times to much to be little enough, &c.

7. Lord Gray.

He proposed very vehemently the great exigence the good Gentleman was in at that time: My good Lord, he said, comfort, quiet, &c. and call to mind in what case we were in, there came advertisements at first from our Province in France, in Italy, advertisements from abroad, from our Province at home, even within fifteen miles of this City, of rising, setting, breaking up holders, yea of the rebellion of his Majesty's Royal Person; if otherwise than well had come to her Majesty's Royal Person, which of us would not have run to him, and torn him with our hands? My Lords, why should Davison be more zealous and forward for his Prince than we? After he replied to that of my Lord Chief Baron, that the offence of St. Francis Devison did not exclude the rell, as he perceived, but rather implied and presupposed that the rell should know it, for without this explicit information, he being sick in his house, and so absent from the Court, could not in any day time have knowledge of it. After he agreed to the Punishment, but wished that her Majesty should have compassion on him to encourage others that were zealous to deserve well of her and the State, and to be ended. Palapso facimus ultima maurice erat.

* Periphrasis thus excited himself in an apologetic Discourse of his to Malapropos. The Queen, says he, after the departure of the French and Spanish Ambassadors, of her own motion, commanded me to deliver her the Warrant for executing the sentence against the Queen of Scots. When I had delivered it, the first I readily with his own hand, when he had to do so, he commanded it to be held with the Great Seal of England; and in saying thus, he said, Go to my office, who is now sick, altho' I fear he will die for sorrow when he hears it. The second said the reason of my delivering it so long, namely, that he might have been violently or unadvisedly drawn thereby, whereas in the mean time he was not ignorant how necessary it was. Moreover, the French Queen and Mary, that they had not refused her of this care, and wished that Malapropos could tell their public touching this matter. The next day after it was under the Great Seal, he commanded me, by Malapropos, that it should be kept in his house, and when I had returned her that it was done, she sent him back with such good words, that he was joyful, and so forth. Another said, that he might be better; and when I had returned her that it was done, she sent him back with such good words, that he was joyful, and so forth. Another said, that he might be better; and when I had returned her that it was done, she sent him back with such good words, that he was joyful, and so forth.

put him to execution; and yet the Commission is so hard and determinate. Surely, I think you meant well, and it was honest, but not so. Finally, he agreed the punishment should be as it was full of all deliberation. But further, said he, I must tell you, that forasmuch as the fault is yours, it declares her Majesty's clemency, and not privity in this action, and that she is offended therewithal. Further, my Lords, I must signify unto you from her Majesty, that forasmuch as the Lords of the Council were asked by Mr. Davison's request, in telling them the way pleased, and that which they did was for her safety, upon his wrong information, the Lords be fortioribus because they were asked by him; therefore her Majesty imports no fault to any of the Counsellors, but only to him, and the rest the double dishonour of all blame.

This field, Mr. Davison craved leave to demand one question, and make one petition.

For your question, said Mr. Prynne, I think it was never the order in this Court, after the matter is heard judicially, to answer any question, (which Sir Walter Ashley affirmed) but for your petition you may speak.

Truly, my Lords, said Davison, any question shall be forth as in your own conscience shall seem reasonable.

Whereas they neither gave him leave nor denied him.

Whereupon Davison said, If this Warrant, being signed and sealed, and left with me, and wanting nothing but execution, it should have furnished her Majesty should have miscarried, whether then—

Nay, said Mr. Prynne and Mr. Prynne, now you enter into that which is difficult already: yea, said Mr. Prynne, that question was moved by my Lord Gray.

Well then, said Davison, I will not seek for pretence enlargement of my liberty, nor rebuke of my imprisonment, altho' any body be not well able to endure it; only let your Honours hear me, I beseech you, of all liberality of discharge, and be moderate for me, that I remain not in her Majesty's displeasure and disgrace: for I protest I shall be contented with any condition and state of life whatsoever, if I may have her Majesty's favour.

Whereunto the Lords universally answered, he spoke like a good subject. And so the Court rose.*

2. Earl of Lincoln said little to the purpose.

3. Earl of Arundel said very little.

4. Earl of Devonshire said very little, and so before.

11. Archbishop of York discussed theologically of the necessity and worthiness of the virtue of Obedience, even bodily to Princes in all things; and that as sanctum matrem in inde omni tempore, adding the difference between honor and honor, (as before my Lord Chief Justice of palapso and palapso, which I forgot also to relate) and good intents do not make the fault excusable, and that he ought to have direct, explicit, and intimated command, whereas he cited a Rule out of Civil Law, (wherein he said he was to find and converse) to this purpose, If the Prince commanded aliquid magnum de honore, ita si parvum, si de honore magnum: he concluded, he did agree to the punishment, but was sorry that Mr. Davison, of whom he had heard so well, should fall into this case, he could not help it, a wider man might have been led with zeal, and none of us would have it undone.

12. Archbishop of Canterbury, having said forth somewhat of her who troubled as all both alive and dead, and theologically of superioribus potestas, as out of the Psalm, where God plagues the enemy of his Church, for his mercy endureth for ever; for this greatest matter, he said, as sanctum matrem in inde omni tempore was in question, a thing done, as he thought, unadvisedly of zeal, and that which might have been better done in consideration of her Majesty's purpose to forbear her death, which could not be unknown to Mr. Davison, for such things are by no means to be verified from Princes, God will certainly move their hearts, and when it shall be most for his glory. This example, he said, might be dangerous and inconvenient hereafter; and therefore he concluded it rather a mischief than an inconvenience, and so agreed to the punishment.

13. Mr. Prynne, Lord Chief Justice. He, as Chief, concluded the matter, and pronounced Judgment judicially upon the grounds alleged before of others, which he refuted, &c. And after, as from her Majesty, spoke somewhat to justify her proceedings in all these matters, and to declare that he did not for this impose any fault to her Council, for that they were misled by this man's undue suggestions.

Mr. Davison submitted himself to the Judgment of the Queen's mercy, and requested that he might propose a question, which he took upon his credit to be such as they would not dislike, and therefore he had leave and a request. His question was, If this being in my hands, her Majesty had miscarried, what should have become of me? To this, Sir Walter Ashley and my Lord Chief Baron answered, that my Lord Gray had asked it already. His request was not for mitigation of his fine, or for enlargement of prison, altho' he could answer all his life were here in than now; much less for his former offence: but only that he might, with her Majesty's favour, enjoy any condition whatsoever, requesting them to be intercession for that. Nothing to this was said, but they arose and departed.

* These I am sure are the principal matters by any of them uttered, so far as by myself, or by my conference I could recall to mind.

Ex Autographo Gulielmi Nuzii, qui scripsit testis fuit.

VI Proceedings in Parliament against John Earl of Gowrie, Alexander Ruthven his Brother, Henry Ruthven, Hugh Mencrief, and Peter Exiot, for High-Treason, Nov. 15, 1600, at Edinburgh.

WILLIAM, Earl of Gowrie, having been condemn'd at Stirling, and executed at the year 1584, with two others, for felonious practices, in forcing the King's Person at Redbow-House, in his minority, and basiliating from him all others who were not of their party, making him condemn'd to what they propos'd, and levying forces to secure themselves and the King's Person in their custody; occasion'd the Clergy of that party, both to preach and publish scandalous pamphlets against the King and Government; this did breed a most friendship between young Gowrie and the faithful Clergy. Albeit, the King did, with great benignity, restore the Earl of Gowrie to his Father's house and estate; yet, his two sons, the Earl, and Mr. Alexander, were raised up in such malice against the King, by force of his religion, but especially by the Clergy, that neither the King's favouring him by his Estate and Honour, confiding in other means of favour, and trust on him, (and placing his Sister as the first Lady of Honour to the Queen, and making his Brother Alexander one of his Bed-chamber) could ally his revenge a nil at all, he resolv'd to bring his long-design'd purpose to effect. For, in August 1600, he desir'd and contriv'd the bringing the King from Folland to his house in Perth; and there, with his fellow-conspirators, to have murdered the King.

On account of this Treason, and several lifelines, a Parliament was adjourn'd to Edinburgh on the fifth of November that year 1600, albeit the printed Acts bear its meeting to be on the 15th.

Accordingly a Parliament was adjourn'd, to be held at Edinburgh on the 15th of November 1600, and [as is already] it was adjourn'd to the 4th of November. On which day, Sir Thomas Hume, the King's Advocate, produced a summons of Treason duly executed against William Ruthven, Brother and apparent Heir to John Earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven; calling also, in the summons, the tutors and curators of the said William, (if he had any) and all others, having pretence to interest in the matter, to hear it found; and declared, that the said Earl of Gowrie, and Mr. Alexander his Brother, had committed Treason, in attempting to bereave his Majesty of his Life, at St. Johnstone, on the 3rd day of August last past. The summons and executions being read, and the Heralds and Messengers sworn to the veracity of the executions, both at their private houses, mercat-crosses, and Shire and Peer of Loth, &c. (which are the most publick monuments and Citations that can be given by the Law of Scotland); which Citations were given on the 28th day of August and 10th dates, in their respective places and mercat-crosses, and the Parliament was declar'd current daily.

On the 9th day, the said summons and executions were read over again, another summons of treason was produc'd, with their executions and verifications, made on each side in the face of the Court, against Alexander and Henry Ruthven, sons to Alexander Ruthven of Friesland, and against Hugh Mencrief, brother to William Mencrief of that ilk; Patrick Exiot, brother to Colin Exiot of Balmorie; to hear and see themselves condemn'd, as guilty of High-Treason, and Life-Majesty, against the King at Perth, the 5th day of August last past.

And likewise by warrant from the Parliament, one Andrew Henderley, who was prisoner in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, on accusation for the said crime, was brought by the Bailie of Edinburgh, and held before the Parliament; he having receiv'd formal summons in the Tolbooth, on the 28th of August last past.

The summons being three called, the executions all verified, and none of the parties dissenting, excepting Andrew Henderley the prisoner; the King's Advocate did take instruments: and likewise the King's Advocate did then, and there, produce before the Lords, our foreveng Lord's letters of relaxation, given under his Highness's signet at Edinburgh, relaxing all the persons so feloniously from the horn, and from all the summons created against them, at the sentence of whatsoever persons; that is, they might have mercy and freedom to compare; and which relaxations were dispens'd, at the mercat-crosses of the Burgh where each person had his abode, and also at the mercat-cross at Edinburgh, and Shire and peer of Loth. And their executions and relaxations were registr'd in the records of the Burgh where the accused did reside: on which productions the King's Advocate did take instruments.

The Lords Commissioners in Parliament did remit the said Andrew Henderley to the Toth both for false callopy, and the Parliament adjourn'd until the 15th day of November; on which day, the Parliament having met, the said Sir Thomas Hume, Advocate, produc'd the said summons of Treason and Executions, and the Heralds and Messengers bearing, of two, verified the executions upon both normally, &c. neither William, nor none for him, nor the others cited, comparing the King's Advocate did take instruments thereon: only Mr. Thomas Henderley, one of the Commissioners of Edinburgh, compar'd for the forefaid Andrew Henderley, and produc'd the writ following, underscrib'd by the King's Advocate. "It is our will, and we command you, that upon sight hereof, ye deliver Andrew Henderley, Chamberlain to unquahie John Earl of Gowrie, his name first of the summons of Treason and Executions, raised and executed against him, for being at, pier, redd, counil, and counsell, of the late Treason conspired by the said unquahie Earl, his unquahie brother, and complice, against our Person; and as you will be answer to us hereupon; keeping that present for your warrant. Subscribed with our hand at Holyrood-house, the ninth of November, 1600. Sir Johnskinner, James R.R." Consistat whereupon, the Advocate "did delete his Name."

The Heralds and Messengers did, at that first time, again verify upon both the executions given in; and the relaxations and executions against William, and Alexander, and Henry Ruthven, Patrick Exiot, and Hugh Mencrief; and the Parliament found the Delict relevant, and then adjourn'd till the 15th day of November, and committed the examination of the witnesses to the Lords of Articles, which are a Committee of Parliament, according to the constant practice and custom in Parliament.

As to the Lords of the Articles in that Parliament, were two Bishops and four Abbots, all men of great worth and integrity; four Earls, viz. Lennox, Perth, Marischall, and Albany; four Lords, viz. Glen, Lincolne, Newcastle, and Fife; seven Barons, and nine Commissioners of Burghs.

On the 15th of November, the Parliament did again meet, and the Advocate did again call the summons of Treason against all the forementioned Persons (except Henderley), for conspiring the slaughter of the King, on the 5th of August last past. Being all three called, and none comparing, the said Estates did find both the summons, reasons and causes therein mentioned, relevant; and therefore admitted the same to the Advocate's production. Wherupon the Advocate did produce the Letters of homing duly executed and enrolled, against Alexander and Henry Ruthven, Hugh Mencrief, and Peter Exiot; hearing, that they were shew'd to the Scales, and put to the horn, for crimes of Treason therein mentioned.

And the oaths and depositions of the witnesses, list and adduc'd by the Advocate, for proving of the Treason against the delictors (taken before the Lords of Articles), viz. the deposition of unquahie Mr. Thomas Crossin, and George Graygowl, when they were call'd to death, for the forefaid crime of Treason; and likewise, the Advocate repeat'd the solemnity, with the circumstances of the matter of fact, to prove the points of the Label; and produc'd the depositions of all the witnesses, which were all, as follows:

The Depositions of the Witnesses, examined in presence of the Lords of Articles, for proving of the said two Summons of Treason.

[Note, That the Words not printed as they were then written and spoke, for exactness sake.]

THE Duke of Lenox, sworn and examined, deposes, That upon the 5th day of August last past, this Depositor, for the time being in Folland, in company with his Majesty, the Earl Mr. Alexander Ruthven, in speaking with his Grace before the tables, between six and seven in the morning, and shortly thereafter, his Majesty calling to the hearing of the Buck, and having him one in the Park of Folland, his Highness spake to the Depositor, desiring him to accompany his Majesty to Perth, to speak to the Earl of Gowrie. And immediately thereafter, this Depositor sent his servant for another horse, and for a sword, and bag on, and followed his Grace: and at this Depositor outtook his Grace, Mr. Alexander Ruthven was speaking with his Majesty; and shortly after the Depositor's coming to the King, his Highness rode a-part, and spoke with this Depositor, saying, Ye cannot guess, man, what errand I am riding for; I am going to get a poise in Perth, and Mr. Alexander Ruthven has informed me, that he has found a man, that has a pickard full of crown'd Gold, of great worth. And in the mean time, his Highness enquired of this Depositor, of what humour he thought Mr. Alexander to be of? Who answered, that he knew nothing of him, but as of an honest discreet Gentleman. And after that his Highness had declar'd to this Depositor, the said circumstances of the man who had the Gold Gold, the place where it was found, and where it was kept; this Depositor answered, I like not that, Sir, for that is not lawful. And they riding beside the bridge of Errol, his Majesty call'd to the Depositor, that Mr. Alexander desired him to keep that matter of the poise secret, and take nobody with him, and then his Highness both at that time, and thereafter at St. Johnstone, within the Earl of Gowrie's hall, said to this Depositor, Take note where I put with Mr. Alexander Ruthven, and follow me. And as his Majesty was within a mile to Perth, after that Mr. Alexander had come a certain space with his Highness, he rode away and call'd to Perth, before the rest of the company, towards his brother's lodging, of purpose (as the Depositor believes), to advertise the Earl of Gowrie of his Majesty's coming there. And as his Majesty was within two paces of butt-lings to the town of Perth, the Earl of Gowrie, accompanied with divers persons, all on foot, met his Highness in the face, and saluted him; and immediately thereafter, his Majesty

The Abbot of Glastonbury, taken and examined, deposes, concerning to the said Duke of Gloucester, in all things, as follows: That after dinner, when word was of his Majesty's departure towards Wiltshire, and that there had all together come down to the Porter, and had inquired at him, Of the King's Majesty was gone forth, the Porter answered, He was not pulled forth, and the Earl of Gloucester affirmed, That he was pulled forth at the back-gate, and the Porter said to the Earl of Gloucester, That cannot be, my Lord, because I have the key of the back-gate. And, after that his Majesty had come forth at his window of the round, Tristram attended on him, this Duke then James desired him to lay hands on the Duke of Gloucester, and he laid hands on him, and he seized him, and gripped the Earl of Gloucester, saying, I fear I raise in thy death, thou traitor die. Then the Earl of Gloucester answered, I know nothing of the matter. Then suddenly the Earl of Gloucester's men, togged the said Sir Thomas Erskine and James Arden from the Earl of Gloucester's company who immediately ran the space of half an hour, but from thence, towards Gloucester's house, and drew thence by two fowls, and cried, I will either be at my own house, or die by the gate. And immediately thereafter the said Earl, accompanied with thirty persons, so shortly, passed by the said place, that the Earl of Gloucester might for the time, and shortly after, the Duke was so appeared to have far a multitude of people carrying a yell towards the place.

SIR THOMAS CRAIG, of the age of thirty-five years, stout, appears conformable to the Lord Indefatigable, and Lord of Indefatigable, Indefatigable. That immediately after the Dependent heard his Majesty cry forth of the window of the tower, "Sir, help! I am betrayed; they are murdering me!" he ran with diligence towards the place, to have helped his Majesty, and, before his entry, seeing the Earl of Genarois, this Dependent and his brother grappled here by the neck, and fast to him, "Traitor, this is thy deed. While Earl answered, What is the matter? I know nothing. Immediately this Earl's servants loved him from this Dependent and his brother. And this Dependent entered within the cloie, he fought with Sir Hugh Monny, who demanded of the Dependent what the matter meant; and, in the mean time, the Dependent heard Sir John Rampy saying out at the turnpike-hill, "Sir, Sir Thomas, come up the turnpike, even to the head!" And, so this Dependent had called up two flops of the turnpike, he sees and meets Mr. Abraham, Eschew himself, in two parts of his body, with his face and his back to the Dependent, the Earl of Genarois, Sir Hugh Monny, and others that were with him, "Sir, this is the traitor, strike him!" And immediately he was flicken h. them, and kill, and as he was fallen, he turned his face, and cried, "Alas! I had not the wits of it, this Dependent being standing above him in the turnpike." Thereafter, this Dependent laid his head of the turnpike, and rose up within the chamber at the head of the gallery, where Sir King and Sir John Rampy were there also present; and, at the first meeting, the Dependent said to his Majesty, I thought your Majesty would have considered me, for me, not to have commanded me to await your Majesty at the court, for my thought is not meet to have taken men with you. Whereupon his Majesty answered to this Dependent, "Alas! the traitor damned me in that, which did in the leaves, for I commanded him to await my Majesty, with me, with his Majesty, and me to do as he said, and he said, I thought to have done so, but did not; he did not drink the do. Shortly after this, Sir Hugh Monny followed the Dependent into the chamber, and George Wylly, I went to James Smith, and immediately thereafter Mr. Thomas Craig, with his sword drawn in his hand, entered within the said chamber, and the Earl of Genarois followed him with in the said chamber, with one sword drawn in every one of his hands, and are knifed upon his hand, who struck at the Dependent and his colleague on certain space. Likewise, they d-fended them and broke again; and that same time, this Dependent was hurt in the right hand by Mr. Thomas Craig, and, and this Dependent heard my Lord of Genarois speak some words at his entry, but understood them not. At last, Sir John Rampy gave the Earl of Genarois a sword break; and then the Earl of Genarois and the Dependent were both taken up, and he laid him up, whom he knew not, and how soon the Earl fell to the ground, Mr. Thomas Craig, and the remainder who accompanied him, departed his path down the turnpike. And the Dependent remained, the together with my Lord, up the old turnpike & but what was done within the house and place thereunto, knows not, but by report: neither saw he any just brought to the place, by any of the town. And knows no more of the matter.

Sir Johnstone,
ALEXANDER POKKIS.

contained in the said summons; and therefore it was given for dooms by the mouth of David Lindsay Demolish of Parliament, in manner and form as follows:

G

* This

1604, my Masters of the Jury, as the Earl of Salisbury is guilty of Treason, yea or nay for his confession of a great party of money which is treason, and I fear him, and that of itself is Treason.

Sir Christopher Blount answered, that he was now a man, with through remembrance of his duty, and through grief of his affliction, not himself, leave some matter; therefore desired not to be troubled by what he said, for he hoped the Lords had called him thither rather to confess his fault, than to accuse or defend them.

Mr. Attorney said, they must now proceed, and Sir Christopher or Blount is not now state in question, but as the Earl is concerned and interested in this cause, for order of proceeding, there was no man in the world but must be called by the names and by precedent, a thousand of by their all men said, then would it be proceed against him.

Sir Christopher Blount desired them to proceed against the others, for he would confess a fault had been done. But Mr. Attorney desired to be heard against him, as per se per contra ad alios. Now, to show this point of treason, the indictment contained the matters touching the Queen's person. In private cases, of course, shall come to their matters with small persons, this is a show of disobedience, and so forth to deducation.

To prove the point of treason, 8 Edw. VIII. the last words of Restituta an indictment against the Statute of Levellers, for the increasing of their treason. And all the Judges that advised this to be Treason.

Year, 12 Edw. the Premier in Levellers making a riot in Southwark, upon information made against them in the Star Chamber, some of them were sentenced to be whipped, some others were confined to life at Banbury, and some to whip the Mayor for suffering the Prisoners to be whipped. And in extending to life and make an execution, was resolved by all the Judges to be Treason.

19 Edw. Broghda, and others in Cheshire, rising to overthrow the laws, and to subvert the King, the King was at Windsor, the indictment was of Treason and confounding the Queen's death, and advised in law against the Prisoners of the Queen. Now, if the law be the conclusion of the subject mechanical men, who shall be thought of the acts of Law, and other things intended to serve the Queen, to take the Corporation themselves of the Court, to call a Parliament, to change Government, to alter Religion? These indictments of force must needs tend to Treason. The Prisoners of London, the men of Cheshire, were hanged, drawn and quartered.

The Chief Justice Payton delivered the reasons of all this to be, that by force to compel the Prisoners of any government, is in itself Treason.

The Attorney. He that conspires to take London, and to surprise the Court, this doth merely concern the State; but this Conspiracy company, to confound the Queen's health, this concerns more; but the objection of Religion, this of all things concerns most. I am from before her coming to the Crown, by Majesty having holden a constant profession of the Religion now established, and since her reign to blessed of God in it, and for her own, by compulsion or otherwise, to be drawn to change it, what impiety and sacrilege against God were it so think it? This quarrel for the changing of Religion, was the great cause of the Spanish invasion intended in 88, and the many massacres against the Queen's Person, by poisoning her gloves, the Poison of her husband, and many other ways; therefore at the request or compulsion at a subject to change this true profession of Religion, her Majesty would rather lose her Crown, and venture her Person itself in defence of the law, than ever suffer or endure it. Also previous to this to think: These things have flowed for precedents. Now we hear, for the Government of our own Kingdom, Queen Jehol, in the time of King Edward VI. the ablest great numbers, pretending for the good of the King and the Church, they was a glorious pretence; but his being upon the wings of her power, calling a Parliament in the name of the King, took the oversight of the King's Majesty's name; and upon that the catastrophe, the conclusion was the smothering of the King, and putting to death the Treasurer and Chancellor; but, said he, the lover of the law is such, as we are all gaitors, therefore to long as the King lives, we are all in danger. The Fury of Richard III. the Act of a Henry IV. calling a Parliament, putting the King in Prison and Cage, and the King's death following, are dangerous precedents, and too fitting these indications. This treason's head hath been long aching, like unto an Elephant's whip, long aching, but here in a hollow tree, and discovered before it was felled.

It was further said, that they were free, it would not be asked; if they were away, it would not be considered; therefore refused how should know it. And upon the sudden, even when the matter was to be asked, then all to have notice of it. And the tale of being to be murdered in his bed, or to be set upon by Sir Walter Raleigh going to the Lord-Treasurer's, this was a hurt, and to be feared by them to a hurt, but on the other side, it shall be proved directly, that they intended to kill Sir Walter Raleigh. It was objected, that the Queen's forces that would be suddenly raised would be a detriment to the service, but to prevent this, it was resolved to proceed that the Prisoners generally of Treason, because they knew not of the Treason made, that they were paid in the thought itself. For clearing of this, Mr. Attorney referred himself to the opinion of the Judges in the point, whereupon it was delivered by my Lord-Chief-Justice, That in any case, one pretended Treason, and others committed, and offered him in any case, the pretence of the Treason intended, yet were they all offenders in Treason.

And for the honour of the Indictment, and manifesting the due of their judgments, Mr. Attorney desired their judgments, whether in case, then were others, and others in such a matter, whether the law charged out in this point with Walter Raleigh against the Person of the Prince of Wales was advised by the Judges to be so, and the indictment must follow them.

Now, for several proof against every several person that was charged, he first began with Sir Christopher Blount, and with his own confession to the King. The conclusion of Sir Christopher Blount contained this,

That the 20th of January, he was sent for by the Earl of Arden to come up to London; whereupon he came, and was at Drury-house when the conference was there the Sunday or Monday evening before the going into London, but came when the conference was ended. The reason of their going into London, as they on Sunday the 8th of February, was, because the alarm was given at the Court, and knowing into what hazard the Earl was concerned, he went with him for safety of the Earl's life, as far as there might be power in him, and thought a lawful for subjects to use force for their safety, and the taking of a Liberty. And being asked by Mr. Attorney, whether he was prony to the purpose of taking the Court? And, as was prony to the convenience of going to take the Court, but was a thing felt to be consider of, but not to hold. And being further asked by the Secretary, if in their conference it was not resolved, that the Earl prevailed, and came to the authority he that at, he would have suffered Toleration of Religion? answered, that he thought so; and said, he should be to them to deny it; for the Earl had many times told him, that he liked not the being of men's conference; and in his usual talk would say, he wished that any should be troubled for their conference. And in a second conference, he set down, that the Earl, five days before his going into London, wrote down with his own hand certain articles to be discussed upon; without one say, whether they should take the Prisoners another, touching the Parliament of the Court? and that the Earl finally spoke of this purpose to alter the government of the Realm. But the Examiners said that might not have been set down, because it was no grace unto the rest.

Mr. Secretary desired to know the reason wherefore he would not have had this set down, which he understood to be, for that the conclusion was to liberal of matters to find, as this being added, it would embroil the rest?

But Sir Christopher Blount said, he was not without but the altering of the Government being moved, and the removing of the Secretary, he desired subsistence to express any further matter, for grieving of himself. And in the last conference, Sir Christopher Blount feared to displease from the attempt intended, but utterly disliked the taking of the Court at that time of the night.

For a farther proof against Sir Christopher Blount, that he had wrought with the Earl for a Toleration of Religion, and sought to seduce Sir John Davies, the confession of Sir John Davies was read, wherein it was set down, that Sir John Davies talking of Sir Christopher Blount, of the Earl had promised Toleration of Religion, the Catholic Religion? Sir Christopher Blount answered, that the Earl gave good hope of it. And Davis in his confession set down that personally by the petition of Sir Christopher Blount, he became a Catholic, therefore being taken and committed to Mr. Montague, he desired Montague to help him to a Prison. But Sir John Davies said, that many times he had conference with Sir Christopher Blount touching Religion, but he was not the original petitioner of him unto that Religion, but being bred up in Orford, his Tutor, Mr. Blow, was a Catholic, and from him he took it, and hath ever lived free from giving offence by his profession; and having this with apology, he hath always been loyal and obedient to law, both accompanied the Earl extremely at Arden, and communicated with him; and the reason of his words upon his left conference, was supposing Mr. Montague to have been a Catholic, did require him to help him to a Prison, but grieved afterwards he was deceived in Mr. Montague. And the Lord-Admiral protested he knew that Mr. Montague was not allied to that Religion, which Sir Blount said the right to be true; but said, Mr. Montague had not kept word with him, for he promised upon his credit not to reveal his request.

And to prove Sir Christopher Blount was an author, and a chief flatter of the Rebellion in London, the confession of Lord Scud was read, wherein was set down, that he went with the Earl to Shamill Smith's, but went not into the house; but being sent for by the Earl, went with him, and came back with him towards Leicester, and Sir Christopher Blount and the Lord Scud, at the chain before their coming to Leicester, gave charge upon the Queen's forces, and were both hurt at that place.

Sir Christopher Blount at the Bar confessed he was too forward in that about, and gave charge upon the Prisoners, but denied the killing of at that place, which Mr. Attorney charged him with; but he denied Mr. Attorney to thank charitably of him, and not to charge him with that man's blood.

Then Mr. Attorney proceeded to prove, that where it was intended and given out for a box, that Sir Walter Raleigh should have fought to have murdered the Earl, this matter was sought to murder Sir Walter Raleigh, to which purpose the confession of Sir Frederickes Corps was read; wherein was contained, that the Earl and Sir Christopher Blount, that Sunday, meaning that Sir Walter Raleigh had time to speak with him, Sir Christopher Blount desired Sir Walter Raleigh to kill him; and to that end, Sir Christopher Blount sent four times after him when he went to speak with Sir Walter Raleigh.

But Blount said, that Sir Frederickes Corps did much wrong him in so saying; but confessed, that he refused Sir Frederickes Corps was to be one of the principal executioners in his business, he wished Corps not to go naked to Sir Walter Raleigh, nor to go home to him, but to meet him upon the water, and to take some pistols with him, that in case Sir Walter Raleigh should not suffer him to come off, that then he should be of force to come away, and bring Sir Walter Raleigh with him; and this was his advice.

And being asked by Mr. Secretary, whether his thought, or was persuaded that my Lord Cushman, or Sir Walter Raleigh intended any such thing against the Earl?

Sir Christopher Blount answered, that he did not believe that they ever meant any such matter, nor the Earl himself feared it not, only it was a word called out to colour other matters.

Corps also confessed, that the Earl intended, after he had possessed himself of the Court, then to have gone into London with seven principal officers of the State carried with him, and after a while to have called a Parliament, and settled things to his liking.

* See also Barnes's Works, Vol. IV. p. 237 for the several words Montague to Sir Arden's conspiracy, as signed before the Lords, and others of the Council.

"ships would not stand with covetous these fellows are grown to a vet "much thole fellows be taught courage to fight, or else this Rebel woul
"never be subdued."

Further was read, a letter all of the Earl's own writing, dated the 8th of October, written to the Lord Attorney, saying his being in Ireland, and the Earl here in England; signifying "that he is one to come to me, as "I must needs interest your Lordship to do what you can for him, tho'
"it is not in your power to do what you would, you shall find him a "man of better favour, than any is in Ireland. When I come thither, I "found him in good place, and sometimes he entertained me to his great "charge, which with your favour you must enable him to again. And "let it be my duty to you, to do him what good you can."

From one of these letters, it was used by Mr. Attorney, that Lord was a man wholly plotted for him. The 28th of September, the Earl of Essex came to the Court; the 28th of September, Captain Wren talks with Ty-more. Wren confideth, that Tyre fear, that within two months he should for the great alteration, and the change that ever he saw, but Wren understood him not. Then said Tyre, I hope not long to have a good time in England.

The confession of one Kernal, Secretary to Owen Roe-O'Neale, taken the 16th of February, was read, wherein was set down, That Owen Roe-O'Neale having been in Ireland, of the plot betwixt the two Earls, Essex and Tyre, wrote and sent to him twice, and desired to be admitted thereof, that he might do a thing contrary to their designs. But Ty-more grew suspicious, till the matter should break out too soon: yet the effect of the answer was this, that the Earl of Essex should be King of England, and be Vicerey of Ireland. And that for a while he should attempt nothing upon the English; and proved, that the Earl had left his barrel of powder in the North. And Kernal being asked by a Gentleman, upon his returning out of the North, what news he had, it agreed, that Essex should be King of England, and Tyre Vicerey of Ireland.

Then said Mr. Darcy, being a witness to the 31st of March, and brought the answer to the Earl, the Earl of Essex was to go to England, and take that kingdom, and they to help him; and among those whom it was reported, the Earl of Essex wrote a letter to the Earl of Ty-more, to follow his matter thoroughly: for now was the time.

The confession of Thomas Wind, father's son to John Pym-Minister, Baron of Lisson, and a man in great credit with that Baron, was read, wherein he sheweth, that being with John Pym-Minister at his house, about Macclesfield, when the Earl of Essex came over from England, Pym-Minister asked him what he heard the Earl of Essex had in England? Who said, he knew not; but heard the Earl was well received in England.
Then Pym-Minister told him, that the Earl of Essex was gone for England; had discharged many of the forces, and that the Earl of Devon had in his word, that it was agreed the Earl of Essex should be King of England, and Tyre Vicerey of Ireland.

Matheridge's confession, and some others, were spared reading; because they only concerned the Earl of Essex.

Now Mr. Attorney opened, that notwithstanding all those plots, practices, and treasons, were known to the Queen; yet, after all this to graciously her Majesty regarded him, and was pleased to cover his offences, as if he had been privately to come before her of her Privy-Council only, at the Lord Treasurer's, but one of her Secretaries came to him, offered to take in all his secret; say, Mr. Secretary told, for saving his brother, that none should take notice of any thing. They once all proposed to have gone to me to Essex-house to him, and during all the time of his restraint from Court, his letters have always had free passage to the Queen, and the ever gave the reading to any thing he wrote. Wherefore, Mr. Attorney said, the action of breaking out into this that did, it was a great mercy of the Queen's, that it signified crime were not, according to the matterial law, presently put to the issue.

And here the evidence ended against Sir Christopher Blunt.

And then Mr. Solicitor General urged new evidence against Sir Charles Dennis.

Mr. Solicitor shewing beginning, said, He would prove by Sir Charles Dennis, guilty of all the Treason that, of a plot to kill Christopher Blunt, and that he was a principal plotter, depose, officer and actor in all their treasons. In first, he was alleged to be keeper of the privy chamber, where, upon a signal given, all the Nobles to assemble, and passing to the privy-chamber to present themselves to the Queen; and so making their way thence, they should approach Sir Walter Raleigh, captain of the guard; and afterwards some of the privy-councillors, and some other Lords. There being seated upon, they should afterwards have been put in an honourable tray, and afterwards a Parliament should be called, and government established; and so principally did the Earl of Essex count upon this gentleman, Sir Charles Dennis, and to commit all his trust to him, so that before Christopher left the land, he desired his intent to him, and told him he would lay forth a plot for taking the Court, as he would not be refused. And when Sir Charles Dennis was in the Country, the Earl desired not enter into consultation about the business, until Sir Charles Dennis came up; and Mr. Rogers were dispatched privately for him. Upon his coming up, a meeting was had at Drury-house, where divers counsels were made, Dennis, Dennis, Blunt, George and Christopher being present, amongst whom it was agreed, the taking of Sir Walter to be very fit, for the better countenancing of the whole.

The chief defence and prevention that Sir Charles Dennis used, was the great love he bore to the Earl of Southampton, who however had enslaved him his pardon, and having gained him his life, he thought he owed his life unto him in any thing he should command him.

But Mr. Solicitor said, it behoved him rather to have been grateful and serviceable to the Queen, who gave him life, more than to him that feed for his life. But this was the just revenge had of God, that followed for the foul murder he had committed.

Sir Charles Dennis perceiving that his art had extended to Treason, altho' he intended counsel to the Queen's party, and as was said, he had his far longer had to do to glad Sir George; for it was not his purpose coming thither to do so, as they say, but to witness the matter. The things that he had said, were therefore considered, and it was found that the Earl did not much know how he might make his way to the Court, as that his access to her should not be refused. But this was not refused till his return out of the country. When at Drury-house, they meeting, and Lettice coming thither; at the last, it was removed, the two gentlemen of the Earl's own hand, were left, to take the Tower, for that he yielded that, it would be a continuance to the action; the taking of the Court, for which he would have many able men, as this would at any time possess all the places of the Court. The manner to be taken, Sir Charles Blunt to have the guard, Sir George Raleigh, the will, Sir John Darcy, the great chamber, Sir Charles Dennis, the privy-council, the great benefit should come all along by hand, as his coming thither, or chamber, he should put himself between the latter two, so that he should step to the earner where the guard usually lay upon their halberds against the wall and possess himself of them, so as to be them he would save his heart, and perhaps he should find of the guard, yet to take his part.

My Lord Admiral said, it was a fair warning to the Court, that they not stay farther of setting up their houses in that manner.

When the Earl was then come into the great chamber, where of the Lords should come out of the privy-chamber, and sitting him, to welcome him coming to the Court; then the Earl went into the Privy-Chamber, to take their way into the Privy-Chamber.

It being asked, what should be done with them that should make resistance to this attempt; it was answered, it was meant they should be killed upon. And the Court being asked, then to lead to justice to City; and then not long after, to call a Parliament.

A further confession of Sir Charles Dennis being read, there were set down the substance of the Earl's former actions, and these could say further proposed; as, whether the Court and Tower should be attempted at one time; and whether this attempt should be with many, or with few; if with many, where the number should assemble; and whether it should be by the Earl and some others to be armed with Privy-Couns; and whether Sir Charles Dennis should be to call of the Lord-Admiral and the Secretaries?

These and some further matters also, Sir Charles Dennis had confessed were disputed upon.

And said Mr. Secretary, since this is a World wherein Princes must be accountable for their doings to their Subjects, that men should not marvel why like proceedings were not had against Sir Charles Dennis; as these, the reason of forbearance was not that he had deserved better, as was commonly conceived of, than to be an Arch-Treaser; but because he was the instrument of saving and saving his state that were first from the Queen in Essex-house; and for this cause, as Sir Charles Dennis's Privy-Council had been taken for his Majesty for saving his life for a time, though for their opinions of him, they held him an original and principal traitor; and that he advised more maliciously than any other, for he would have had the Court fired upon the taking of it, by Sir Charles Dennis's profession, as he had done often, that he was privy and a disposer of all these plots, but never was any denier or any, or instigator of my Lord in these things. Sir Christopher Blunt for further clearing himself, says, he knew not of this plot till his coming to London, upon the Earl's sending for him; that they had allowed him to place, he knew, but to what office, he knew not. And set more to be considered, he brought the Lord Treasurer to remember what natural considerations were to be had to the Earl, being married to Mabel. Now to have many advantages the obligation of love, and following of that Earl, had before created him; the World did know; and how liberal, pious and virtuous I was of the life of mine, while it was my own, good Mr. Secretary, please to remember and report truly to the Queen. I beg of you, because I have much offended you, and have no cause to expect it, but from the bounty of your honour and charity.

Mr. Secretary told him he freely forgave whatever he conceived might give cause to him to be offended, and would truly perform for him what he desired, and would desire my Lord-Admiral in join with him in it; though he had need not seek it to them, for the Queen would require it at their hands, to be truly informed of what they had done.

Then said Sir Christopher, I must needs confess that heretofore, I having done much to his Majesty's service, advertised my life many times, as the merits of this my wretched carcass will show, beseeched my fortunate when it was at the best, and all for the honour of his Majesty, and in his service, and yet the never withheld notice of me at my service; it gave me little contentment to me, but the never had the power to have an all thought against his Majesty. Therefore once again I beseech you, that being as I was so that Earl, you please to relate to his Majesty what you said by me, and what I have said by you. And so stay any further going upon me. I have much myself guilty of all that can be said against me, and most worthy to have deserved death; wherefore requesting all justification or remission of my offence, I wholly cast myself at her Majesty's mercy. Sir Charles Dennis made the like proclamation.

And to ended the evidence against Sir Charles Dennis.

Against Sir John Dennis, Mr. Francis Bacon urged the evidence, beginning with discourse upon the former ground of Mr. Attorney's, that every admission implied destruction of the Prince, and that in the proceedings of Essex II. and Essex IV. the presence in both was as in this, against certain Subjects, the Spaniards in France, and the Treasurer in the other. And this title of treason, that treason did include the person of the Sovereign, was common in France. Likewise, the lieutenant of Scotland, had very great pretensions; but the proceeding as such in this, as no longer covering needs to prove it Treason, the act itself was Treason. The principal charges charged upon Sir John Dennis were two, one that he was a plotter, and of the Council at Drury-house. Another that in the instructions he had the custody of the Privy-Councillors in Essex-house, which had a communication with the action in the street. The plot and instruction emerged into, was to give laws to the Queen; the preparation was to have a chosen band of men for action; men not met together by constitution, but assembled upon common and letters sent. For, Mr. M. Bacon, I will not charge Sir John Dennis, although he be a man full in danger, with the he first printed abroad, but letters were sent about this matter. The things to be asked were the matters confessed of, and then to design for persons for every action; and for mutual encouragement there was a list of names down by the Earl, and their Councilors out of them were to elect fit persons to every office. The second place was in taking of the Court, and in this consultation he was ipse Philopates Irenarchus; you were Clerk of that Council-Table, and wrote all; and in the detaining of the Councilors, you were the man only trusted. And as the Earl of Arundel said, you held it a privilege to wear to detain pledges, and was so used to carry the Lord-Keeper with the Great Seal sub Ludovico, and to have had with you the Lord-Chief-Justice, a man for his honesty, honoured and well-beloved of the Citizens; and this delictus place you thought to have followed.

Sir John Davers hereupon told Mr. Bona, that, if with good manners I might, I would long since have interrupted you, and fixed you a great part of labour; for my intent is not to deny any thing I have said, or accuse that I have done, but to confute my self of any all, and submit myself wholly to the Queen's mercy. But in that you call me Clerk of that Council, let me tell you, Sir John Davers was writing, but his hand being held, I was forced to take the pen and write. But by and bye the Earl said he would speak to himself; therefore we being together so long, and drunk to little, the Earl went to his house, and set down all with his own hand, which was formerly set forth, touching the taking and juggling of the Court.

The examination of Sir John Davers was read, which was to the effect as before is set down touching their consultations of taking of the Court, but added, it was agreed they should all come by land, and make their way to the Queen's own person, and hoped to find war in the Court indifference.

Mr. Lord-Admiral then charged Sir John Davers again with the detaining of the Lords in Essex-house, and his unwillingness to have let them go, though Sir Forbes and Gargy came with a message, as he said, for letting them all go. And said the Lord-Admiral, the case was hand with their worthy Councilors, for by God he swore, though their Councilors had been in the house, yet being as he was, General of the Forces, and sent to force the house, he must and would have battered and blown it up, tho' it had been the death of them as well as the rest, and had all his own men been there, he would have done it.

It was also charged against Sir John Davers, that not ten days before this action, Sir John Davers and Sir Charles Davers were seen upon the top of the Widow's Tower within the Tower, viewing and surveying the place; but they said it was only for pleasure, to take view from thence, being there contented, that they affirmed the Tower was a place of small strength.

Then Mr. Attorney took in hand the evidence against Sir Gilly Astorick and Mr. Coffe. To Coffe, Mr. Attorney said, that he was the ancient Treasurer that ever came to that Bar; he was Poly the very father of the Earl; and since he was a Scholar and a Sophister, he would frame him a syllogism, and bide Coffe deny what part he would. The syllogism was this, Whisperer committit rebellion, utroque Rege's death; si qui committit rebellion; Ergo, you intended the Queen's death; by this syllogism, this fellow, the cunning corner of all plots, how to intrap a worthy gentleman, when I am sorry to see his overcaution, I must needs say Sir Henry Nevil: I say Coffe hearing of Sir Henry's landing out of France, watches his coming to London, privately comes to him, and sells him, he had commended him to him from the Earl of Essex, and secretly lets him know what private intelligence my Lord had received from Coffe by some his friends; that much mischief was taken at Court with Sir Henry's service in France; especially that at Bellou, Sir Henry Nevil said, it was more than he knew or had heard, but recommends his service with thanks to my Lord. Shortly after Sir Henry Nevil came to the Court, the Queen asked him very graciously. The Lords interpreted very well of his service; now at his next meeting Mr. Coffe, Sir Henry told him, he found so much matter at Court as he told him. Whereupon Coffe replied, Oh, Sir, things are altered since I saw you last, and ere long you shall for a change: my Lord is like to come in favour again, and be restored to his greatness; and using one other verse, concluded with this, Arme ferens omnia dat, quia ipsa negat. Coffe shall make report to Sir Henry Nevil, took opportunity when to disclose unto him all the Earl's plot of going to the Courts, who hearing it, objects against it, that it was a thing could not be executed but by many, and all would not keep Council. Coffe answered, that for execution they had to many come in to them, that they knew not to entertain all. A further objection being made, that tho' all places in the Court were possessed, yet Whisperer would rise, and make force; Coffe answered, we having the fate of the State, all will follow and take with us.

For manifestation of all the Narration penned by Sir Henry Nevil himself, was read in these words: "Their honours commanding him to disclose all, and his duty and conscience binding him to the same, he hath in that all-couch'd Narration set down all his knowledge. First, at his arrival out of France, he was told that he had ill offices done him at Court by divers, and found of great place, and his actions as diver, and contrary to them greatly blamed, to casting ill of the success of the peace. And by this it was told him, the Earl would have him know he was wronged, because he was one that loved him. After this, Coffe brought him a letter from the Earl, whereby desiring his love, and to hold it as his, he sides many other words only of compliment. To which letter Sir Henry returns an answer suitable to his kind provocations. But all this while I never went to him; and being in the country within ten miles of the Earl, yet I never went to visit him. But Coffe came to see from him, and told me the Earl was now at liberty, and all the world that would, might now freely come unto him: but still I put off my going, till at one time Coffe came and told me I had expelled my coming to him, and said, I say he would say Epistola for me; and if I came, and he charged me to be in the way, a Gentleman of my Lord's should attend my coming, and bring me to my Lord's closet. About eight of the clock that night I came to my Lord, and was met by a Gentleman, and brought up to my Lord; who entertained me kindly, and after a while, after many questions of his hopes, but used no unkind words of the Queen or State, I parted with my Lord, these having nothing but ordinary terms of Compliment passed us. Afterward Sir Coffe repairing Vol. VII.

"often to me, I asked him at one time how his Lord's matters stood in Court. At one time he answered me, well, and told me of great hopes conceived, at another time he answered me every life intently in these things, saying, it made no matter, he would Lord a safer other course; and last, then, was a present to lay up the Earl of Arundel, which was a warning that they meant to lay up the Earl of Arundel after him: but my Lord was resolved they should never catch him in any more. Then told me, my Lord had in purpose some matters, but I should not embark myself further in them than I liked; and desired me to give a meeting to the Earl of Arundel and Sir Charles Davers. I said, I would, but with this limitation, that nothing was intended against the Queen's person, which was per se But I detained them at two meetings, which caused them to make an ill judgment of my meaning towards them and the intended. Monday on Christmas day I standing in St. James's Palace, at the Earl of Arundel, Arundel, and Sir Charles Davers, who I had sent them of long. After that, Coffe coming to me, told me he had a commission to deliver a secret unto me, which was, that my Lord finding his life longer by men's power than by Majesty, he was resolved to make his appearance to the Queen, and go with strength for that purpose; describing the same manner of taking the Court, and making way to the Queen, as before is set down by others. This Coffe said he was to impart to me, as one in whose hand the Earl was confident. (But Mr. Secretary said, as he was grieved to strait of this Gentleman's full respect, his worth and abilities to have done the Queen great service, so at this right he would do him, that however the Earl was persuaded of him, yet he he would tend his duty to the Queen, that I think the first fault of the Earl's mind grew from this Gentleman.) The matter being propounded unto me, I made many objections, and put great difficulties in the conceiving; only perceiving of things being joined, my answer was, Multa sunt que non habentur nisi cum opore. When some persons were named for this office, I objected, that if many knew it, it would not be concealed, it was more used, it would not be perceived. The Earl of Arundel being named for one, said they would not trust him long stretched, for it he knew at but two hours before, he would tell. In conclusion, I was desired to think of the things proposed in case they were showed unto me. Afterward Coffe came unto me, to whom I related all in brief, he stood in that conference, and told me I would not allow it, except I say would consent and take an oath to keep nothing against the Queen's person, and against Mr. Secretary, and I would never do nor create to any of them, for he was more unto me, therefore they must do per se, ipse in that. Coffe said to me, they would only have me present to him things were doing; and if it tell out, that I should be hindered to dispatch it. Before that time, I might defer it by feigning sickness. By their appointment I should have been Secretary. (Here Mr. Secretary said, Coffe, this was great presumption, for though to answer me he had been so great matter, yet to take upon you to place another, this was high ambition.) Further, it was required that Sir Henry Nevil should have sent a messenger unto London, to find how the City stood affected to the Earl.

(Mr. Attorney here said, it was in their plot, so have had two hundred soldiers in the City and Country, so have blazed in palaces the fineness of this Earl's intention.) Coffe further told Sir Henry Nevil of a box in many men's mouths in London, and that there had been many given to the Mayor and Aldermen to look to the City, but of twenty-four Aldermen he doubted one of twenty at the Earl.

Mr. Secretary here speaking, opened what he found had related the Earl to to find a coalition and discovery of all things that he did. After, who was his minister, and as I may now him his confession, was a man much desired by the Earl; her Majesty was willing to yield any thing that might give comfort to the Earl's confidence, and be good for his Soul, less Mr. Doctor Dore, a very worthy man, to confer with him, and prepare him to a christian end. He perceiving confession to be the way to repentance, and amongst other first charging the Earl with this offence, his taking arms against his Prince, and relating to come upon the command of his Prince; the Earl answered, he thought that revelare non debet, and for instance showed, that David refused to come to David in the like kind, being sent for. Mr. Dore so sufficiently answered the Earl in his arguments, and finished him in this example, how difficult it was from his life, and upon what ground that that the Earl in a kind rebelling, and falling from his duties, desired charity confession with his own minister Asthor; which was yielded him. After, like a godly and very learned man, and one deserving much for this service, dealt so soundly and telephly with him, as that he made the Earl know that there was no salvation for him to hope for, if he dealt not clearly with his own conscience in the confessions of his sins, and high offences in this kind. His words so moved and moved, as that to him man he disclosed the very few in it at his house, to the purging of his soul and conscience, from the concealment of any thing he knew; and afterwards spent all the time he had to live in holy meditations, and reading of scriptures concerning the State, and discussing of the mischief intended, and most patiently forewore for the accusers and imputations he had cast upon others touching the conspiring with Spain and the Infant of Spain.

And being asked touching these men supposed to be confederates in the taking of the City, he said that Captain Brudenell, brother to Sir Henry Brudenell, and Sir John that would assist him, and that Sherriff Smith, being a Colonel of a thousand men, would bring them in all of him. And confessed by the Earl himself, that at such time as the Earl had purposed to lay down the thought of their ambitions, and had resolved contentedly in a private life, Coffe comes to the Earl, and tells him he had additions offered him, and his satisfaction was such, as his friends said he had lost a coward, with praying and hearing of sermons, and now was become a coward, whereupon Coffe persuaded him to let Sir Charles Davers come to him, who would let him know the mind of his friends, and after that time as the Earl had accused his confederates, being asked how he could prove the things discovered, answered, some of them have so much grace, as if I said but to them, they will confess it. Whereupon he wrote a ticket to the Earl Ireland, I was with him. And also all this in answer to wright against the present fact, and so I have nothing of it. That may plead mercy for me, yet for her Majesty, out of the abundance of her grace and mercy, shall afford me life. I doubt not but as I have done, so I may live with you, and as I live, I will be as ready as any subject the Queen hath to do the service for her Majesty which shall deserve my life. And this is all I wish, that since I have but a life to give unto her Majesty, that I might give it to the performance of some more acceptable service rather than to this end. But if it be refused, as I have desired, that die I think it is not life I can for; for a death I owe unto her Majesty, and will yield it cheerfully. And since the Earl that goes on, whose conduct was brought up to this due punishment, hath left a blot upon me, and he has touched me in reputation and credit, as if I had been plucked and procured him to more dangerous practices than these, I must needs think myself, that neither in foreign practices, which I count considerable, nor in my domestic duties, when I count that with diligence, in respect of their nearness to me, I have ever had to do so far, as to be so much as in the heart of the State. Against you, Mr. Secretary, I cannot but confess I have offended to too great wrong, and I am aware, that I please your Honour of your charitable disposition to forgive me, otherwise of the State I have deserved well. And in my further charge, I desire humbly to be permitted to private conference with your honour, my Lord-Admiral, and with Mr. Secretary.

Which was yielded to. And that night he was brought into the Court of Woolsack, after the Court rose.

So, when the Court being demanded what he had to say, why Judgment should not be given against him, said these words: I have nothing to say in way of Judgment, for it is but just that I be adjudged to die: only this I say, my great fault was to confess unto things propounded, for my instance was far from thought of hurt unto her Majesty. I was never any persecutor or subjugator of the Earl in these things, nay, till I was first provoked by the Earl out of the country. I was a stranger to these purposes: then when my Lord or Ambassador, to whom I owed my love and fidelity, that he was so far engaged in the business, and desired my assistance, I yielded assent to him, and gave consent to that I now repent; for there was no reason in me to seek changes, the present being better to me than alteration could promise. Ambition I had none, for my estate was goodly; discontentment could not trouble me, for I had been well used; but by all this my offence was the greater, in giving offence to the Queen, who had been so gracious unto me. Contrary to the resolution I came with, I have pleaded Not guilty, but this grew through the error of my understanding; but to the justifying of what is found, I also confess myself guilty. And though I have no cause to hope, yet do I not despair of her Majesty's mercy, and if it shall be her Majesty's pleasure to show mercy, your Lordships and all here shall feel, that none is so lost that shall not be recovered. But if her Majesty's pleasure be to execute Justice, I only request this with my best prayer, that I may die in her Majesty's favour. And these few requests I have to make, which I recommended unto your Lordships, my Lord-Admiral, and to your Honour, Mr. Secretary, that if I must die, that I may have some time given me to settle my conscience, and compose my soul, before my being having been much, my care hath been the less this way; and if it may be thought fit, I desire to have one of my servants to report to me for ordering of some things I have to do. And lastly, that your Honour, Mr. Secretary, remembering what your promise was to me, in respect of my defence and alliance to some noble blood, you will do far more me, as to be, the favour of her Majesty, than I may be denied. And one request more, I beseech you, let me make first to the Earl of Southampton before I die.

So Christopher Blount upon this said, My Lords, this week, bearded head of mine made not forget that which I minded to have begged: That in respect I have always professed Armin, and been faithful of the Field, a place of Honour, I may have some grace as is desired.

My Lord-Admiral and Mr. Secretary told them both, they would remember it to the Queen.

Sir John Davis said, I have nothing to say, but only to appeal to mercy. I confess I have highly offended, yet if it please her Majesty to extend mercy unto me, it shall not be to an unworthy servant: my former offences and disorders have not been to purchase favour, but to discover truth; and though by this I challenge no mercy, yet it estimates defect of favour. My great remorse and grief is for my past sin's sake, to think that I being so much benefited and advanced by her, must now be the means to undo her; for I hear all her estate is seized on. Wherefore I beseech this Court, that the be not afflicted for my offence, but may enjoy what was her own.

Mr. Secretary, upon occasion of this speech of Davis, what he disclosed, said, The' his place did appropiate that to him to be the deliverer and restorer of requests; yet in this business nothing had been done or said by any, but those at least of the chief Councilors of State have been privy to all that passed, and I only the Recorder stood aloof from them. And this I will say, was during all the time of the Earl's trial from the court, his Letter was always before me, and I was to the Queen, and he might write what he liked, the Queen would ever read it.

Sir Gedy Morrice. I have little to say; but let what I have done be considered, and my offence will be found less than others; but the law hath adjudged it Treason, and I must die, and not unworthily for the true being taken, the heavens shall not find. I did the office of a servant as my master bids me, but it was my fault to obey what was not just in him to command. My poor estate I pray you let be considered, it may be thought better of than it is. What it is, I shall tell it down, and humbly pray that my poor wife and children may be paid.

Coffe confessed the Jury had done but right, in discharging their consciences, yet it was true that Davies had, notwithstanding, been afterwards for some time a day, was faithful. The previous proceeding afforded, and all reasonable requests yielded, emboldened me to make those last request: When I was returned, I had not about me above two shillings. I had 350*l*. of ready money fixed upon in my chamber. When I came into the Tower, I was put into a dark place; but afterwards Mr. Lieutenant giving me, relieved me, and set me in a better place. Wherefore I pray to be released unto the same place as, for there I am now provided of things necessary; otherwise perhaps I may be coming for things of this world for necessary furniture of my house, I would now more willingly spend all my thoughts in observations.

This request was granted. My second request is to you, Mr. Secretary, that I may have the company of some Divine relating to me for the comfort of my soul, and comforting of my faith, that so at my last will in this world with joyful arms I may embrace my Saviour; and for human respects, I desire the law may be satisfied with my life, without torturing or quarrelling my Body; and the rather for favour's sake unto him, though I have neither place nor great birth to speak for that. To plead for longer or other mercy I will not; but when my body shall be executed, favour be unto my soul, if ever I intended it unto her Majesty's person. Also it was my too much love unto my Master that brought me into this, but as that last, my Master, said, now the faults were taken from him, and he was his father's son, but too late, heretofore in the course of my private state, things went so smoothly with me as I could. For, my religion was always foreign, to the profession at this day. How unlike things I would do it, but I desire to know whether now I must speak, or that I may be allowed pen and paper to write them hereafter.

It was allowed him, should have means to write what he would.

Here ended all that passed before Judgment.

The Lord Chief Justice of England, Sir John Popham, being now to pronounce Judgment, said these words:

"I am sorry to see any so ill affected to this State as to become plotters and practisers against the State, and that so strongly as you and others in this action have done. And my grief is the more in that men of worth, service and learning are the actors in this conspiracy: I shall it be said in the world abroad, that our Englishmen, now after forty-three years peace under so gracious and renowned a Prince, are become weary of the Government of such a Queen, whom all the world esteems for her government? Consider it well, whatsoever hath been hopes in this attempt of change, what would have followed upon it? Let me tell you of the fearful hurt, the blood of children, families and friends; for some of your lives can otherwise think but this action would have cost much blood. And I am sorry to think, that Englishmen should form to excite themselves by ignorance of the law, which all subjects are bound to know, and are born to have the benefit of. Some of you now at the Bar are Christians. When, I pray you, did you ever read or hear that it was lawful for the subject to command or contradict his sovereign? It is a thing against the law of God, and all Nations. God forbid but that by action men should be allowed to expand intents. Now your actions tending to a sovereignty, cannot but by your selves be expounded Treason. But your intents, if they were otherwise, as you pretend, yet are not they to expose the law. For know that, that the law, which tends principally to the preserving of the Prince's person, is more tender and precise in this than in any other point."

"And although your Example be pitiful, yet by this, let all men know and learn how high all actions treasonable do touch, and what they tend to. To leave off from further discourse, I should now remember one thing to you all, but I see you all careful of it; that is, the care of your souls, to keep them from death, whereas his is the cause, and fin is not removed but by repentance, which being truly and heartily performed, then follows what the Prophet David speaks of, My God are they as broken God compared to sin. There will be a course taken to instruct you how to kill sin in this world, which otherwise shall not be killed in the world to come, for as you leave this world, so shall it be with you in the life to come."

And then pronounced Judgment against every of them, as in case of High-Treason.

The Effect of the INDICTMENT.

FOR confounding with the Lord Grey and others, traitorously to surprise the King and young Prince at Greenwich, to carry them to the Tower guarded with force, that after the slaughter of many of the guards, should put on the guards coats, and to bring them, sending the Lord-Admiral before to signify the treason where the King was, and escape he made by the guards from Greenwich; and therefore desired to be taken in there for more safety. Which, if they could have effected, the weapons and jewels in the Tower should serve the cause for the stifling of all other purposes; that some of them of the Privy-Council, viz. the Lord-Chancellor, Treasurer, Cook, Chief-Justice, should be removed and cut off; and Mr. Watfon should be Chancellor, Brooke Lord Treasurer, and Marston Secretary; Gray Lord-Marshal and Master of the Horse, if the new Master of the Horse were otherwise preferred; but for the Lord-Chief-Justice no man named. If these passed for bringing them to the Tower laden, then to convey the King to Dover, where George Brooke presumed upon his interest with Thomas Peck; but Mr. Attorney justified his Assurance of the Lord Chief. In one of these places they have kept the King for the space of three months, and at their first entrance, they should require these things. 1. A general pardon of all their past and intended crimes against the King and Prince. 2. The King should yield to a Toleration of religion, with an equality of all Counsellors and other Officers, as well Papists as Protestants, within his Court or otherwise. 3. That he should remove and cut off the fore-mentioned Counsellors, and others who should be thought to hinder this designment, for which purpose Watfon named Peck, who was, to allege sufficient matter against them.

And for the better effecting of this their purpose, Watfon had devised under writing on oath should be administered for the profanation of the King's person, for the advancement of the Catholic religion, and for the extirpation of all heresies that should be revealed unto them. That all the actions should be proceeded withal in the King's name, and they meant to lead to the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, and they King would speak with them: when they meant to keep in life custody, till they had delivered hostages to them not to withhold their assignments, and to furnish them with all such necessities as they should require from them. Watfon was the villainous hatcher of these Treasons; and Brooke, upon the leaving of them, was at once a prosecutor, and the Lord Grey more eager and violent than he, purposing to make a run to the King for carrying over a regiment for the relief of Colours, which he would have made for the defence of his own person in this action, as having the protection of the catholic forces according to the promises of George Brooke, Marston and Watfon, and knowing not how he might be dealt withal amongst them.

Mr. George Brooke said little or nothing in his own defence, only he made a ridiculous argument or two in the beginning; viz. that, that only could be the judge, and examiner of any action, which was the rule of the action; but the Common Law was not the rule of the action, Ergo, it could not be judge or ruler of the action: and therefore appealed to the person of the King. 2. That the Commissioners or Common Law had no authority over them; because it is a maxim in the law, quis quis condemnatur, auctoritate affirmatur; but the Common Law could not absolve him, being guilty, therefore could not condemn him.

Mr. Attorney to this would have answered particularly, but was by the Commissioners and Judges willing to reduce himself to his own element.

My Lord Henry Howard undertaking to have answered him, my Lord Chief-Justice told him, that the King, by reason of his many crimes, had many under him to execute the law of Justice; but he kept in his own hands the key of Mercy, either to bind or loose the proceedings, as in his own privacy without he should think fit.

Therefore said Mr. Attorney, you, Mr. Brooke, puzzling yourself to be learned, cannot be ignorant that both your intentions have been, and you must be liable and subject yourself to the trial of the law of this nation, wherein you were born, and under which you live, Et ignemque juris sui excipit. These treasons were termed by the Lord Chief-Justice Sir, as Mr. George Brooke confessed to Watfon and the Lord Grey; but, said he, Walter Raleigh and I are charged at the Assize. Whereupon Mr. Attorney gave a touch of the treasons of the Lord Chief-Justice and Raleigh, who had procured from Armsbury five or six hundred thousand Crowns, to be disposed by the Lord Chief-Justice, who should thereafter raise forces for the extirpation of the King and his Cubbets, and putting both Ireland and England in combustion, and to upon Colchester, seven out of Spain, to meet Raleigh at the Isle of Jersey, and to put on foot both sides, both within and without the land.

Mr. George Brooke, after his first arguments, spoke little or nothing for himself, more than his own confession led him otherwise to excuse or qualify his own offence; only he gave oath of a letter, which he said, he received from his Majesty, wherein he had liberty and authority to deal in the founding out of these practices; but neither at any time before nor at his arraignment, could these the said letters. And the King being by some of the Lords Commissioners questioned withal on that point, requested his letter to be produced, and demand he wrote any such letter. Sir Griffin Marston answered exceedingly well, and truly to all things; saying nothing for his fault of Treason; but that he deferred death only on the persuasion of Watfon, by whom he was misled, and affirmed that the King before his Coronation was not an actual, but a political King; only he desired to avoid the imputation of effusion of blood in that enterprise, and (if it were possible) the brand of a Traitor for his house and posterity, protesting how careless he was of his own life, which he desired to be exposed to any hazard or sacrifice (but) it was never so desperate; which if the King would not (in mercy) yield him, yet he desired that Lordships to be inconsiderate, that he might die under the Axe, and not by the Halber.

Watfon spoke very shrewdly and deviously, without grace, or utterance, or good delivery; which (added to his forebidding villainy) made him more odious and contemptible to all the hearers.

Clarke, the other Priest (an excellent nimble-tongued fellow), of good speech, more honest in the carriage of the business, of an excellent wit and memory, boldly, and in well-behaving terms, uttering his mind, not unwilling to die, but desirous to avoid the imputation of a Traitor. Copley, a man of a whining speech, but a shrewd invention and resolution. Brookeby drawn in merely by Watfon to take the oath before-mentioned, for sake of the particulars, as the bringing the King to the Tower for the advancement of religion; but spoke with nobody to incite them to the business, nor came himself according to his Time appointed by Watfon, the 2d or 3d of June, but at that instant attended upon the Queen. Sir Edward Parham was also by that villain Watfon dead wished after he had rendered him the oath to this purpose; that he understood the Lord Grey meant with forces to set upon the King, and to surprise him, that against that time, whether he would nor dow his sword against the Lord Grey with the King's servants and friends? And if the King's servants were defeated, whether with the rest of the Catholics he would not encounter the Lord Grey, and if he could bring him to the Tower for his relief and the advancement of the Catholic religion?

Parham told him, that he would is, if he was persuaded that his intention of the Lord Grey were true, which at that time Watfon could not assure him of, for he did but hear of so much: but said he, when I have better affairs than these, which will be with in three or three days, you shall further hear of me. He laying the same, Watfon came not, and so Parham's proceedings went no further; but being urged in the point for bringing the King to the Tower, for the advancement of the catholic † Sir John Hesketh (successor General Temp. Will. III.) in his reply to Sir Bartholomew Shewar's Martyrdom and Government of England Financed, pp. 121, 122, says, the King came to London in May, and on 20th July was the pretended plot discovered; and in December following, the pretended delinquents were tried at Winchester, together with Watfon and Clarke. Their accusations were in general.

First, To cut the Crown on the Lady Arabella's head, and to seize the King.

Secondly, To have a toleration of Religion.

Thirdly, To protect and assist him from foreign princes.

Fourthly, To turn out of Court such as they disliked, and place themselves in Office.

Of these the last article is treason; what remains the rest are, it is doubtful. What of them was proved against the Lords Chief-Justice and Grey, Watfon and Clarke, or how their Treason were managed, does not appear; but for Walter Raleigh's Trial does appear, and it much like the Lord Grey's, and shews of some circumstances of it, I think, it is to be taken notice. Indeed of certainty, viz. in the Lord Raleigh's Trial, the east words of the foregoing story, and the same, were made use of in Sir Walter Raleigh's, interpreted as the Council thought fit; at which it was attending to the law, which was all that was designed by the Council, and said to the Judges. I have no need to me through all the remainder of Sir Walter Raleigh's Trial, as it is printed before the History of the World, because the parallel is too exact, and needs too close to the memory of persons gone: and I will say, that if Sir Walter Raleigh was guilty of the things he was accused of by the witnesses, though the accusation does not amount to a legal proof, it was High-Treason; but if the Lord Raleigh was guilty of the things he was accused of, he was not guilty of High-Treason.

And the same Author, says, pp. 131, I think it plain at this day, that of Sir Walter Raleigh's I thought a short story, what the Lord Raleigh's thought, the Author says, I am loath to conjecture, but if any person will give himself the trouble of reading and comparing the Trial of the Lord Raleigh with that of Sir Walter Raleigh, they will find them easily parallel in a number of other particulars.

2. Obj. by Mr. Le. d. Chief-Justice. By the Law we had nothing to do in this matter.

Ans. "Judges cannot take notice of private causes or private injuries; but we are a great deal with the Law." The Judge informed the King of the law, but out of a sort of privilege. It is true, 3. He. Yl. If the Judge relieves, that no Catholic man ought to be admitted; but that was a question of public law. It is the same of non-residence; it is a question of public law. We have done no offence to the State; let us therefore be contented with our own privilege.

3. O. Another, The King's pleasure, not we should deliver the reason of that we have done to be just.

If we clear our consciences, we have no bargained ourselves. The King's Pleasure cannot reverse their judgment; the Judges are, therefore, not the Parliament. Let us find a middle way to the Lords, then we are ready to do so, — do not undo this House.

Other, 3. re. resolution give him a private reason. Not to be informed a difference between his Majesty and the Commons. Response. As before, no answer. The question is not a matter of privilege, but of submission. Let us sit down then as Lords of the Council, and not as Lords of Parliament.

We do no ways counsel or counsel with his Majesty. The King is so very good in honour. If we go to his Majesty, they may be considered with it, in respect to the King's honour. It is the act of his Majesty, not a question of public law. "Whether the Charter of Parliament ought to have any way."

Quest. Whether we ought to, for the King's convenience?
The King's message was, that we should consult with our own selves, and resolve on our selves; then no need to confer with the Judges; if we cannot, then it is to be resolved by the Judges.

The Judges have judged, and we have judged: What need then of conference? Let it be no spark of that grace taken from us, which we have had already from his Majesty. Let our reasons be put into articles, and delivered in all humblest words unto him. Upon the conclusion of this debate in this manner, the House proceeded to question 3, and the first was,

1. Quest. Whether the House was informed in the matter?
And the question was answered by general voice, That the whole House was informed.

2. Quest. Whether the House was informed of the matter?
Response. That they shall be set down in writing; and ordered further,

That a committee should be named for that purpose, and appointed first to set them down in writing, and to bring them to the House, there to be published, and to receive their allowance.

The Committees were suddenly named, viz.

Sir Robert Worsfield.	Mr. Mordaunt.
Sir George Allen.	Sir Arthur Agge.
Sir Francis Bacon.	Mr. Francis Tate.
Mr. Yelverton.	Sir Robert Little.
Mr. Dym.	Sir Henry Nevill.
Sir Francis Hayles.	Mr. Attorney of the Woods.
Mr. Holby.	Sir John Hild.
Mr. Recorder of London.	Sir John Hild.
Sir Edward Hild.	Sir John Hild.
Sir Francis Barnington.	Mr. Hild.
Mr. Wymon.	Sir Edward d. Bedford.
Mr. Hild.	Sir John Hild.
Mr. Fisher.	Sir Robert Little.
Sir Edward Montagu.	Sir Francis Tate.
Mr. Renshaw.	Sir Robert Little.
Sir William Fitzwilliam.	Sir John Hild.
Mr. Hild.	Sir Edward Hild.
Sir Francis Chabrier.	All the Serjeants at Law.
Mr. Holby.	Mr. Nodwell Bacon.
Sir Robert Worsfield.	Mr. Hild.
Sir John Hild.

To meet this afternoon at two a clock in the Exchequer-Chamber.

The authority given unto them by the House, was this:

The House being resolved upon the question, That the reasons of their proceedings Resolution, touching the Return, Admittance and Retaining of Sir Francis Goodwin as a Member of this House, should be set down in writing, these Committees were specially appointed to perform that service, and have warrant from the House to lead for any Officer, to view and search any Record, or other thing of that kind, which may help their knowledge or memory in this particular service: And having deliberately by general consent set down all such reasons, they are to bring them in writing unto the House, there to be read and approved, as shall be thought fit.

Die Lunæ, vii. 3^o de Aprilis, 1624.

It was then moved, That Committee might be named to take the examination of the Sheriff of Buckinghamshire, who was by former order sent for, and now come. And in that end were named,

Mr. Solicitor.	Mr. Serjeant Tansford.
Sir Robert Worsfield.	Mr. Serjeant Lee.
Sir William Fitzwilliam.	Mr. Yelverton.
Sir Thomas Chabrier.	Mr. Francis Mordaunt.
Sir Robert Worsfield.

Who were appointed to take his examination presently.

Sir Charles Cornwallis made in excuse of Sir Francis Goodwin's absence from the House, and pray'd, That they would as well in their own judgment pardon it, as witness and affirm his care and modesty upon all occasions to the King, as that he had forbore, during all the time of this question, to come into the House.

The examination was presently taken by these Committees, and returned in this form.

Inter. 1. IPz he removed the County from Aylesbury to Brickhill?

He hath, it was by reason of the plague being at Aylesbury, the County being the 25th of January, at which time three were dead of the plague there: it was the only means of saving his County.

Inter. 2. Whether he were present at the Election?

Ans. He was present, and was as usual with this second place to Sir Francis Goodwin, as the first to Sir John F. was: but Sir Francis Goodwin went, having the election, he should not hold to him any Freeholders, for the election he thought would be without any Freeholders both; first to Sir John, second to Sir F. As about eight of the clock he came to Brickhill, he was then told by Sir George Fitzwilliam, and others, that the first voice would be given for Sir Francis Goodwin. He hoped it would not be so, and desired Sir George Fitzwilliam to deal with the Freeholders. After eight of the clock went to the election a great number, there being at the County After the Writ read, he fell in among the points of the Proclamation; then finally proposed Sir John F. and Sir Francis Goodwin. The Freeholders first, A Goodwin, a Goodwin. Every Justice of Peace on the bench said, A Goodwin, a Goodwin. and came down from the bench; they named any for a second place, and desired the Freeholders to name Sir John F. for the first. Sir Francis Goodwin being in a chamber near, was first by the Sheriff (the Justice) and he came down and earnestly persuaded with the Freeholders, saying, Sir John was his good friend, had been his father's, and that they would not do Sir John that injury: notwithstanding the Freeholders would not do it, but all cried, A Goodwin, a Goodwin! Some crying, A Goodwin, a Goodwin! as the number of fifty, or three hundred, and Sir Francis Goodwin, in his chamber, dealt very plainly and earnestly in this matter for Sir John F.; for that Sir Francis Goodwin did so earnestly persist it unto him.

Inter. 3. Why delayed him to make the Return so long before the day of the Parliament?

He being here in London, Mr. Attorney-General, the second of March, at the chamber in the Inner Temple, delivered him two Cap. Titles at night, and before he made his return, he went and advised with Mr. Attorney about his return, who persuaded it, and it was done by his direction: and the return being written, upon Friday after the King's coming through London, near about my Lord Chancellor's gate, in the presence of Sir John F., he delivered the Writ to Sir George Fitzwilliam, and at this time (it being about four of the clock in the afternoon) and before they parted, Sir John F. delivered him the second Writ sealed, Sir John F. Fitzwilliam, Sir George Fitzwilliam, and himself, being not above an hour together at that time, and never had but this new Writ of Parliament to him delivered.

Subscribed, Francis Chyke.

This was returned by the Committee to the hands of the Clerk, but not at all read in the House.

Mr. Speaker remembers the matter of conference with the Judges, and offered to repeat and put again the questions that were formerly made; being before uncertainly and unexpectedly left (as he said) in the case of Buckinghamshire, viz.

1. Whether the House was informed in the matter?

2. Whether they should answer such the Judges?

And at length induced the House to entertain the latter question; and, being made, was carried by general voice in the negative, no conference.

Upon this passage, it was urged for a rule, That a question being once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, cannot be questioned again; but most hard in a judgment of the House.

It was thought fit that Mr. Speaker should attend the Committee for examining the reasons in Sir Francis Goodwin's case, not by commission, but by voluntary of himself.

Die Martis vii. 3^o de Aprilis, 1624.

THE reasons of the proceeding of the House in Sir Francis Goodwin's case, passed by the Committee, were, according to former order, brought in by Mr. Francis Mordaunt, and read by the Clerk, directed in form of a petition.

To the KING's most excellent Majesty,

The humble desire of the Commons House of Parliament to his Majesty's Majesty in Sir Francis Goodwin's case.

MOST GRACIOUS, our duty and loyal Sovereign, relation being made to us by our Speaker, of your Majesty's royal clemency and assistance in hearing us, and of your princely prudence in discerning, showing affectionate desire rather to receive satisfaction to clear us, than count to punish us: we do in all humblest words our most bounden thanks for the same; possessing, by the bond of our Allegiance, that we never had thought to offend your Majesty, as whole yet we shall ever be profuse, with loyal hearts, to become ourselves and all we have for your Majesty's service: and in this particular, we could find no quiet in our minds, that would suffer us to entertain other thoughts, until we had shewed our answer to your most excellent Majesty; for which nevertheless we have prepared of the longer time, in respect we have prepared some precedents, requiring search, to yield your Majesty better satisfaction.

There were objected against us, by your Majesty and your reverend Judges, four things, to wit: our proceedings, in receiving Francis Goodwin, Knight, into our House.

Objection 1st. The first, That we offered him a false power of examining of the elections and returns of Knight and Burgess, which belonged to your Majesty's Chancery, and not to us: For the said return of Writs were examined in the Court where they are returned, and the Parliament Writs being returned into the Chancery, the returns of them ought to be there examined, and not with us.

Our

Our humble answer is, That, since the 26th year of King Henry IV. all Parliament Writs were returnable into the Parliament, as appears by any precedents of record ready to be viewed, and consequently the return thereon examined. In which year a Statute was made, That thenceforth every Parliament-Writ, containing the day and place where the Parliament shall be holden, should have this clause, viz. Et ad hoc non nisi a placito assensu nobis dante per nos vel per nos legatos nros in personam ipsorum nrorum in Convocatione expressa et de iure in forma statuti conferri solent.

By this, although the form of the Writ be somewhat altered, yet the power of the Parliament, to examine and determine of elections in manner; for so the Statute hath been always expounded ever since, by us to this day; and for that purpose, the Clerk of the Crown hath always used to send all the Parliament-writs, upon the Commons House, with the Writs and Returns; and also the Coronators, in the beginning of every Parliament, have ever used to appoint special Commissions, viz. the Barons, Judges, and other Justices, for examining comers concerning elections and returns of Knights and Burgesses, during which time, the Writs and Returns remain with the Clerk of the Crown; and after the Parliament ended, and yet before we are delivered to the Clerk of the Penchance in Chancery, to be kept there; which is warranted by reason and precedents. Reason, for that it is fit that the returns should be in that place examined, where the appearance and service of the writ is appointed. The appearance and service is in Parliament, therefore the return examinable in Parliament.

Precedents, viz. first in the 26th year of the reign of the late Queen Elizabeth, where, after the Writ was returned into Chancery for choice of Knights, and election made, and returned, a second was before the Parliament made, as an order by the Lord-Chancellor, and thereupon another election and return made; and the Commons being attended with both Writs and Returns, by the Clerk of the Crown, examined the first, allowed the first, and rejected the second. So after 23 Elizabeth, a Burgh was returned dead, and a new chosen, and returned by a new Writ; the party returned dead appeared, the Commons, notwithstanding the Sheriff's return, admitted the first chosen, and rejected the second. Also, the 24th year, a Burgh's chosen for Aul was returned lame, and a new chosen upon a second Writ; the first declined, placing the Commons examined the case, and finding the return of lamer to be true, they related him; but if it had been false, they should have rejected him. After 43 Elizabeth, the Sheriff of Northampton returned himself elected; the Commons finding that he was not eligible by Law, gave a Warrant to the Chancery for a new Writ to choose a new. After 43 Elizabeth, a Burgh was chosen for two Boroughs; the Commons, after he had made election which he would serve for, sent Warrant to the Chancery for a Writ to choose a new for the other Borough: Of which kind of precedents there are many other, whereof we have to trouble your Majesty. All which together, viz. the use, reason and precedents, do concur to prove the Chancery to be a place appointed to receive the returns, as to keep them for the Parliament, but not to judge of them; and the reasoners might be good, if the Chancery might, upon legitimate or Sheriff's returns, send Writs for new elections, and those who were returned in Parliament; for so, when fit men were chosen by the Coronators and Boroughs, the Lord-Chancellor, or the Sheriff, might displace them, and send out new Writs, until some were chosen to their liking; a thing dangerous in precedents for the time to come, howsoever we self securely from it at this present by the new Lord-Chancellor's integrity.

Objection 2d. That we do not in the case wish to such prescription, and freely for a Council of gravity, and what respect to your most excellent Majesty, our Sovereign, who had directed the Writ to be made; and being but half a body, and to Court of Record, not, rejected returns with the Lords, the other half, notwithstanding it is proved to us.

Our humble answer is, on the prescription, That we entered into this case, as in other Parliaments of like cases hath been accustomed, calling to us the Clerk of the Crown, and viewing both the Writs, and both returns, which in cases of and moreover, though not of Bills requiring three readings, hath been warranted by common usage amongst us; and thereupon, well finding that the latter Writ was awarded and sealed before the Chancery was republished of the former, which the Clerk of the Crown, and the Sheriff of the County, did both testify, and all held to be a clear fault in law, proceeded to annul it with the consent of the latter election. For our lack of respect to your Majesty, we could wish that our hearts, we were not fully in that be in consuetudine, presiding that it was, many months ago, as we said before, that you, your Majesty had taken to yourself any special notice, or directed any counsel in that case, other than the ordinary awarded Writs by your Majesty's officers in that behalf; but if we had known at much of time as I have, by your Majesty's royal mouth, we would not, without your Majesty's privity, have proceeded as that manner. And further, it is a private your Majesty to give us leave to inform you, that in the examination of the case of the Sheriff awarded unto us, That Commons agreed to yield the place of the two Knights to Sir John Fortescue, and in his own person, at the time of election, with extraordinary civilities, entered the sheriff's return to be, and caused the return to be made up on that purpose, but the sheriff's return refused to feed them. Concerning our refusing conference with the Lords, there was none desired unto us, but we were called, and then we thought, That in a matter private to our House, which, by rules of order, might not be in us asked, or might, without any imputation, refuse to confer. Yet understanding by their Lordships, That your Majesty had been informed against us, we made haste (as in all duty we were bound) to lay open to your Majesty, our good and precious Sovereign, the whole manner of our proceeding. not doubting, though we were but of a body, as to make new laws, yet for any matter of privileges of our House, as we said, and ever have been a Court of counselors, of sufficient power to discuss and determine without their Lordships, as their Lordships have said always to do for their without us.

Objection 3d. That we have, by our sentence of refusing Goodman, admitted, That our writ is makers of law, which is contrary to all laws. Vol. VII.

Our humble answer, That notwithstanding the precedents which we truly delivered, of admitting and returning Outlaws in private actions in the Commons House, and none remained for that cause; yet we received to great trouble have delivered from your royal Majesty's own mouth, with such excellent strength and light of reason, more than before, in that point, we heard or did conceive, as we have now prepared an act to give our House, That all Outlaws hereforth shall stand enabled to serve in Parliament, but as concerning Goodman's particular, it could not appear unto us, having therein by examined all parts of the proceedings against him, that he stood as Outlaw, by the laws of England, at the time of the election made of him by the County; and that for two causes; the first is, That where the party outlawed ought to be five times proclaimed to appear in the Sheriff's Court; and then not appearing, ought to be adjudged outlawed by the judgment of the Coroners of the County; a thing appertaining to their duty in the Highways of London, that Goodman was five times proclaimed, not that the Coroners gave judgment of outlawry against him; but a Clerk, lately come to that office, hath near, many years after time, and since this election, made entries, interlined with a new hand, that he was outlawed; to which new entries we could give no credit, if that the parties, if whole fact Goodman was true, have testified in their writings of release, That they never proceeded farther than to take out the Writ of Exigent for an outlawry; and being then paid that money which they thought by which we find, That Goodman was not five times proclaimed, nor adjudged outlawed, being a thing usual in London to spite that proclamation and judgment, if the party could avoid it; and so record being made for many years together, that either of them was done.

The second cause was, for that the Writ of Exigent, by which the Sheriff was commanded to proclaim him five times, was never lawfully returned, nor certified by Coroners; without which, we take it, That Goodman stood not disabled as an Outlaw.

To this, adding the two general orders by Parliament, which had cleared the outlawry in truth and fullness, (the first were) and that Goodman could not apply the pardon by Sheriff; for that so record not return was extant of the outlawry, whereas he might ground a fine for, we were of opinion, and in your Majesty's most reverend Judges would have been if they had known thus much, That Goodman stood not disabled by outlawry to be elected or serve in Parliament, but when we considered further, That the clerk taken against Goodman for drawing him into this outlawry of purpose to disable him to serve in this place, whereas the County had freely held him, was unjust; we could not, with the reputation of our place, serving as a Council of gravity, in allowance or continuance of that course, confer him to be rejected as an Outlaw; the particulars of which were these, viz.

Two Exigents awarded, the other seven years past to the Highways in London; no entry made of his proclamation; nor of any judgment of the Coroners, nor any return of the Exigents made or returned; the party plaintiff satisfied; the pretended outlaws being but upon a mere process; and as to your Majesty's dates and contents, pardoned now this Goodman was elected Knight, the Exigent now brought out since the election, procured to be returned in the name of the Sheriff, that they were, and are long force dead, and new entry made of the five proclamations and Coroners judgment; and now a return made of that old Exigent, which could be of no use, but only for a purpose to disable him for that place. Upon all which we could do no less in true discretion than certify the election made sanctum et iustum to be true.

Objection 4th. That we proceeded to examine the truth of the facts of not-lawful, and gave our sentence upon that, whereas the right to have been found by Sir John's return of the outlawry from further concernment, whether the Party was outlawed or not.

Our humble answer is, That the precedents cited before, in our answer to the first objection, do prove the use of the Commons House to examine returns of elections, and returns, and have not been tied presumptuously to allow the return; as if a Knight or Burgh were actually returned dead, or lame, yet when he appeared to the House to be living and found, they have, ever since, returned him, received him into the House, preferring the truth manifest before the return. By which device proceeding there is avoided that great inconvenience above-mentioned of giving liberty to Sheriffs, by arbitrary return to make and return whom they list, and upon the Parliament made, as now ever favour the parties in the judgment of the County or Borough that elected them.

Thus, in all humility, we have presented to your most excellent Majesty the grounds and reasons of our late action, but with no affliction, but guided by truth, warranted in our consciences, imitating precedents, maintaining our ancient privileges, honoring your excellent Majesty in all our services; to which in all loyalty and devotion we hold us in and over for ever, praying daily on the knees of our hearts, so the Majesty of the Almighty, that your Majesty and your polity may in all felicity reign over us and ours to the end of the world.

These reasons we set down and published to the House, Mr. Secretary Herbert was sent with message to the Lords, That the House had resolved of their answer to his Majesty, (in Sir Francis Goodman's case) and had set it down in writing, and that it should be sent to their Lordships before four of the clock in the afternoon; who immediately returned their Lordships answer, That they would be ready at that time in the Council-Chamber at Whitehall, with thirty of the Lords, to receive what then should be returned. Then were names thereunto to attend the delivery of the said reasons at the time and place aforesaid.

Edwin de ppe mortific.

THE House entering immediately into consultation what course was to be held with the Lords, as also falling into more length of deliberation, touching the bill of merchants, than were expected, fell some messengers to the Lords to excite their long tarrying, viz.

Sir Edward Hoby.
Sir Ro. Widdrington.
Sir Henry Knyvet.

Sir Francis Hastings.

This

This afternoon about five o'clock, the Committee appointed did attend to select the persons attended at the Council Chamber, according to appointment and order as both Houses, and they were delivered by Sir Francis Bacon, one of the Committee, with desire, That their Lordships would be punctual in the behalf of the House, for his Majesty's satisfaction.

Die Martini, viz. 4th de Aprilis, 1624.

SIR FRANCIS BACON having the day before delivered to the Lords in the Council Chamber of Writings, according to the direction of the House, their orders in writing, printed by the Committee, touching Sir Francis Goodwin's case, and the report of what passed at the time of his said delivery.

First, That though the Committee employed were a number specially designed and selected, yet that the Lords admitted all Barrells without distinction, that they offered it with to many, of their own speed and case in the business, so as that no one there, had precedence, but only the bill of it, considering that he had long respect to the weight of it, as they had not considered it to any bill of business, or other relation, but put it into writing for more convenient manner of their duty and respect to his Majesty's grace and favour: that in conclusion they prayed their Lordships, first they had more mercy, they would not rate with them for the King's imprisonment, and to deliver the writings on the hands of the Lord Chancellor, who receiving it, demanded, what they should send to the King, or first peruse it? To which was answered, That first it was the King's pleasure the should consider; they desired their Lordships would first peruse the Lord Chancellor's demand, whether they had Writure to signify, explain, or debate any doubt in question made upon the reading? To which it was said, They had no Writure. And for the writing was read, and no more done at that time.

Die Martini, viz. 5th de Aprilis, 1624.

MR. SPEAKER by a private commission attended the King this morning at eight o'clock, and there till ten.

Mr. Speaker came in his absence, by reason he was committed to attend upon his Majesty. And brought message from his Majesty to this effect: That the King had received a parchment from the House. Whether it were an absolute resolution, or relation to give him satisfaction, he knew not: He thought it was rather intended for his satisfaction. His Majesty protested, that he loved to have so the House as his loving and loyal subjects, and by the faith he did owe to God, he had as great a desire to maintain their privilege, as ever any Prince had, or as themselves. He had seen and considered of the manner and the matter, he had heard his Judges and Council; and that he was now deliberated in judgment. Therefore, for his further satisfaction, he desired, and commanded, as an absolute King, that there might be a conference between the House and the Judges; and that for that purpose there might be a select Committee of grave and learned persons out of the House: That his Council might be present, as at Legatione de iure iuris, but in respect not directly as both sides.

Upon this unexpected message there grew some amazement and silence. But at last one stood up and said: the Prince's command is like a thunder-bolt; his command upon our Allegiance like the roaring of a Lion. To his command there is no contradiction; but how, or in what manner we should now proceed to perform obedience, that will be the question.

Another answered, let us petition to his Majesty, that he will be pleased to be present, to hear, meditate, and judge the case himself. Whereupon Mr. Speaker proceeded in this question.

Quest. Whether to confer with the Judges in the presence of the King and Council?

Which was resolved in the affirmative.

And a select Committee presently named for the conference, viz.

Lawyers.	Gentlemen.
Mr. Sergeant Finch.	Sir George Cornew, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen.
Mr. Sergeant Hildard.	Sir Francis Hayles.
Mr. Sergeant Leigh.	Sir Edward Hilly.
Mr. Sergeant Shirley.	Sir Robert Heath.
Mr. Sergeant Dashiell.	Sir Henry North.
Sir Thomas Hayles.	Sir John Scudell.
Sir Francis Bacon.	Sir George Murr.
Mr. Recorder of London.	Mr. Nathaniel Benn.
Mr. Grev.	Sir Edward England.
Mr. Lovelace Hild.	Sir William Flitell.
Mr. Francis Moore.	Sir Thomas Fitzwilliam.
Mr. Richard Martin.	Sir Roger Ald.
Mr. Winder.	Sir Robert Toftell.
Mr. Dyer.	Sir John Mansfield.
Mr. Fild.	Sir Edward Smith.
Sir Roger Willobon.	Sir Robert Cotton.
Sir Francis Yax.
Mr. Doctor Tenn.
Sir Daniel Down.
Sir John Burrell.

Their Committees were selected and appointed to confer with the Judges of the Law, touching the reasons of proceeding in Sir Francis Goodwin's case, in Writings, and delivered to his Majesty in the presence of the Lords of his Majesty's Council, according to his Highness's pleasure, signified by Mr. Speaker this day to the House.

It was further resolved and ordered by the House, (upon the motion that was made by Mr. Lovelace Hild) that the select Committee should signify upon the Solicitors, and explaining of the reasons, and answers delivered upon his Majesty; and not proceed to any other argument or answer, what occasion should move at the time of that debate.

Die Martini, viz. 11th de Aprilis, 1624.

Upon Adjournment.

SIR FRANCIS BACON was expelled, and called to make a report of the conference with the Judges in the presence of his Majesty, and the Lords of the Council: but he made excuse, saying, he was not warranted to make any report; and desired permission to return home: nevertheless, upon a question, he was constrained to make a report; and amidst thereupon made.

That the Committee might first assemble in the Court of Wards, and confer among themselves, and then the report be made.

Sir Francis Bacon, after the meeting of the Committee in the Court of Wards, reporteth what had passed in conference in the presence of his Majesty and his Council.

THE King said, He would be President himself. This attendance renewed the remembrance of the last, when we departed with such admiration. It was the voice of God in many, the good Spirit of God in the mouth of man. I do not say, the voice of God, but the voice of man. I am not one of His Majesty's Ministers. A curlew sign him that he had a curlew on him that sufficed it. We might say as was said to Solomon, We are glad, O King, that we give account to you, because you discern what is spoken.

We let pass no moment of time, until we had refreshed and set down an answer in writing, which we now had ready.

That instance we received a message from his Majesty by Mr. Speaker, of two parts: 1. The one Personal. 2. The other Royal. 3. That we were as dear unto him as the safety of his person, or the preservation of his polity. 4. Royal, that we should confer with his Judges, and that in the presence of himself and his Council. 5. That we determine now as King James "that we were now done like the Conqueror, in giving account of our Judgments." That we had no leisure, in all our proceedings, to encounter his Majesty, or to oppose his Honour or Predecessor.

This was spoken by way of preamble by him you employed.

How to report his Majesty's Speeches, he knew the eloquence of a King was inimitable.

He King addressed himself to him as departed by the House, and said, He would make three parts of what he had to say. The cause of the meeting was to draw to an end the difference in Sir Francis Goodwin's case.

If they requested his absence, he was ready; because he feared he might be thought interested, and so breed an inequality on their part.

He said, That he would not hold his Predecessor's or Honour, or receive any thing of any or all his subjects. That was his Majesty's duty.

That he would confirm and ratify all just Privileges. That his Honour and Antiquity As a King, Royalty: As King James, sweetly and kindly out of his good nature.

One point was, Whether we were a Court of Record, and had power to judge of Returns. As our Court had power, so had the Chancery; and that the Court that first had passed their judgment should not be controlled.

Upon a fumish, and upon the Sheriff's Return, there grew a difference. That there are two powers. 1. Permanent. The other, Transitory.

That the Chancery was a transitory Court in the eye of the Parliament during the time.

Whatsoever the Sheriff infers beyond the authority of his mandate, a nullity. The Parliament of England not to be bound by a Sheriff's Return.

That our Privileges were not in question. That it was private jealousies without any kernel or substance. "He granted it was a Court of Record, and a Judge of Returns." He moved, That neither Sir John Fortescue, nor Sir Francis Goodwin might have place; Sir John being placed, his Majesty did meet us half-way. That when there did arise a schism in the Chancery between a Pope and an Antipope, there could be no end of the difference until they were both put down.

Upon this Report, a motion was made, That it might be done by way of warrant; and therein to be inferred, That it was done at the request of the King; and was further said, (as anciently it hath been said) That we lose more at a Parliament than we gain at a Battle. That the authority of the Committee was only to signify what was agreed on by the House for answer, and that they had no authority to confer.

It was further moved by another, That we should proceed to take away our dilution, and to preserve our liberties; and said, that in this we had exceeded our commission; and that we had drawn upon us a note of infidelity and levity.

But the acclamation of the House, was, That it was testimony of our duty, and no levity.

So as the question was precisely made,

Quest. Whether Sir John Fortescue and Sir Francis Goodwin shall both be excluded, and a warrant for a new writ directed? And upon the question resolved, That a writ should issue for a new choice, and a warrant directed accordingly.

A motion made, That thanks should be presented by Mr. Speaker to his Majesty, for his presence and direction in this matter, and thereupon Ordered, That his Majesty's pleasure should be known, by Sir Roger Ald for their attendance accordingly.

Because it hath been conceived by some, that Sir Francis Goodwin being the Member specially intended, it were fit he should give testimony of his liking and obedience in this course, being dealt withal to that end, he writ his letter to Mr. Speaker, which, before this question made, he better satisfaction of the House, was read in these words.

"SIR,

I am heartily sorry to have been the least occasion either of question between his Majesty and that honourable House, or of interruption to those worthy and weighty causes, which by this time, in all like likelihood, had been in very good furtherance. wherefore, understanding very credibly, that it pleased his Majesty, when the Communes last attended him, to take conference with them for a third time and election for the Knights of the County of Wiltshire: I am so far from giving any impediment thereto, that contrariwise, I humbly desire his Majesty's direction in that behalf to be accomplished and performed. So praying you, according to such opportunity as will be manifested, to give furtherance thereto. I take my leave, and rest

April, 1624.

Directed, To the Right Worshipful Sir Edward Phillips, Knight, Speaker of the Honourable Court of Parliament.

Yours, most assured

To be remembered,

FRA. GOODWIN."

Die Martini, viz. 12th de Aprilis.

A motion made, That Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the House, should pray accels to his Majesty, and present their humble thanks for his gracious their presence and direction, upon the bearing of Sir Francis Goodwin's charge; which was alledged unto; and Sir Roger Ayles, a servant of his Majesty's Bed-chamber, and one of the Members of the House, was privately appointed to know his Majesty's pleasure; which he did accordingly; and returned, That his Majesty was willing to give them access to the gallery at Whitehall, at two o'clock in the afternoon, the same day. Thereupon a Committee was named to attend Mr. Speaker to the King, with a general warrant to all others that should be pleased to accompany them.

The Committee especially named were,

All the Privy-Council of the House.

Mr. George Carey, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen.	Sir John Sefton.
The Lord Bacon.	Mr. Edward Seymour.
Sir John Hopton.	Sir Thomas Holcroft.
Sir Robert Overbridge.	Sir Henry North.
Sir William Fitzmaurice.	Sir Thomas Walsingham.
Sir Ralph Sandes.	Sir Thomas Bryson.
Mr. John Hales.	Sir Francis Boringham.
Sir John Sheffild.	Sir Robert Napier.
Sir Francis Hastings.	Sir Valentine Knightley.
Sir George Moore.	Sir George Carey.
Sir Robert Wingfield.	Master of the Chancery.
Sir William Kildgrew.	Sir Jerome Bowes.
Sir Francis Pytham.	Sir John Tipton.
Mr. Francis Gifford.	Sir John Lister.
Sir John Scrope.	Sir William Barclay.
Sir Richard Forney.	Sir Roger Ayles.
Mr. Toby Matreux.	Sir Robert Ayles.
Sir Thomas Ridway.	Mr. Dudley Carleton.
Sir Jonathan Trelawney.	Sir William M ^r . n.
	Sir George St. Paul.

Due Notice, viz. 13th de Aprilis, 1604.

MR. Speaker remeembred to the House the Effect of his message of thanks, delivered the last day in the name of the House to his Majesty, as also of his Majesty's answer, viz.

That he related to this House the humble and dutiful acceptance of what his Majesty had done, together with the humble thanks of the House for his zealous and paternal delivery of his Grace unto us, by his own mouth; what wonder they conceived in his Judgment, what Joy in his Grace, what comfort they had in his Justice, what approbation they made of his Prudence, and what obedience they yielded to his Power and Pleasure.

That his detestation gave all men satisfaction. That they were determined to pursue the course he had prescribed. That now they were contented, he would be pleased to receive a representation of the humble thanks and service of the House.

His Majesty answered, That upon this second access, he was forced to remember what he had said before. That this question was unhappily cast upon him, for he earned as great a respect to our privileges as ever any Prince did; he was no ground-searcher; he was of the mind that our privileges were his Strength; that he thought the ground of our proceeding was our not understanding that he had intermeddled before we had decided; that he thought also we had no wilful purpose to derogate any thing from him, for our answer was grave, dutiful, and obedient answer.

But as the devil had unhappily cast this question between them, so he saw God had turned it to two good ends and purposes.

1. One, That he knew, and had appeared our loyalty.

2. Another; That he had so good an occasion to make testimony of his bounty and grace.

That as we came to give him thanks, so did he redouble his thanks to us. That he had rather be a King of his Subjects, than to be a king of many kingdoms.

The second part of his speech directed to the Lords and Us.

That this Parliament was not like to be long, that we would treat of such matters as must concern the Commonwealth; and the bill of any thing, that concerned himself.

Three main businesses in our hands.

1. The Union.
2. Sundry Publick and Commonwealthe-Bills.
3. Matters of Religion, and reformation of Ecclesiastical Discipline.

For the Union, that it might be now prepared, and presented the next Session.

That Union, which with the loss of much blood could never be brought to pass, as now it is. That the better to bring it to pass, we should be in affections united.

That we should best with all care proceed in such laws as concern the general peace.

That all Heresies and Schisms might be rooted out, and care taken to plant and settle God's true Religion and Discipline in the Church.

That this with above all things was at his death to leave,

1. One Worshipping to God.
One Kingdom entirely governed.
One Uniformity in Laws.

Lastly, That his occasion were infinite, and much beyond those of his Predecessors; and therefore that in this Parliament we would not care from him that which we had yielded to others.

That in his afflictions he was always inferior to others, not in his desire to cure us.

The Warrant for a new Election of a Knight for Bucks, read and allowed in this form:

Whereas the Right Honourable Sir John Fortescue Knight, Chancellor of his Majesty's Duchy of Lancaster, and Sir Francis Goodwin Knight, have been severally elected and returned Knights of the Shire for the County of Bucks, to serve in this present Parliament: upon deliberate consultation, and free choice of the said knights serving the Commonalty of Parliament, it is the Duty directed and Required by the said House, That a Writ be forthwith awarded for a new Election of another Knight for the said Shire: And this shall be your Warrant.

Directed, To my very loving Friends, Sir George Caplin Knight, Clerk of the Crown, in his Majesty's High Court of Chancery.

XI. The Proceeds and Trial of ROBERT LOGAN, of Reshairig, for High-Treason, in conspiring with John Earl of Gowrie, to murder King James I. June 1604. 7 Jac 1.

IN the year 1604, the Earl of Dunbar, walking in his own Garden, and conversing with a country Gentleman, who lived near the place, falling accidentally to discourse on the matter of Gowrie's forfeiture; this Gentleman told the Earl, that he being lately in company with one Murray, a Nephew, who lived in Edinburgh, who was ordinarily employ'd in the Laird of Reshairig's service as a Notary and Trustee, and who was long acquainted with this Gentleman who was speaking to the Earl, told the Earl, that this Speyer had told him things concerning that Treason which he had never heard before; but that he had never told it, so long as their concerns were alive. The Earl was curious to have the information, which the Gentleman told him, and was in doubt:

That amongst Robert Logan of Reshairig, then dead, was a Co-partner and Converser with the Earl of Gowrie, and his brother John Alexander, in all due affair; and that Speyer had several letters, say lying by him, which he had found amongst Reshairig's papers, and some papers belonging to one, commonly call'd Laird Bess, the principal confidant of any man that Reshairig had, and who was also intimate with Speyer the Notary.

Whereupon the Earl of Dunbar acquainted the King's Advocate, and Speyer was taken and carried unto Edinburgh; who, before several Lords of the Council, did, with great remorse of conscience, acknowledge,

That he knew principally that Robert Logan, late of Reshairig, was privy to, and upon the full knowledge of Gowrie's treasonable conspiracy; and for the greater assurance of his knowledge, deposed, That he knew, that there were divers letters unaltered between them, about the treasonable purposes aforesaid, in the beginning of the month of July 1604; which Letters, James Bess, called Laird Bess, servant to Reshairig (who was employ'd mediator between them, and grew to it that Speyer had been employ'd, and secured the same to Speyer, in the place of Reshairig).

And deposed, That he did address (i.e. Read) quietly from James Bess, the principal letter written by Reshairig to the Earl of Gowrie, which Bess brought back from the Earl of Gowrie (as was the custom amongst them at that time), and that when James Bess employed him (Speyer) to deliver over papers; that he did keep the letter, and that it was yet in his possession, and was in his chest, among his writings, which he left it when he was taken; (and accordingly, the letter was found there by the Sheriff, who was ordered by Sir William Hare, Lord-Judge of Scotland, to seize the said chest, and search for this letter, which was found, and delivered to the King's Advocate).

Whereupon, the King's Advocate produced the summons of Treason, which was read by warrant under the Seal, on the 29th of February, 1604; against all the defendants and others concerned, to compare before our Sovereign Lord, or his Commissioners, and the Estates of Parliament, and Justice-General, on the 12th day of April, 1604, to answer, &c. And likewise produced the verifications of the executors, which were sworn to, by the Herald, Messengers and Witnesses, in plain Parliament; all which are contained at length in the Records of Parliament; as are also the letters of relaxation and execution thereupon, relating Robert Logan, eldest son to amongst Robert Logan the accused, from the home, and all penes thereby, which relaxations were registered in publick Records before the day of comparance; and then the Lord Advocates produced for verifying of the letter and writings, the principal letters, and did put them in the Clerk Register's hands (where they lie among the publick Records); to likewise the deposition of the witnesses, taken by the Lords of the Articles, in common form.

All which being produced in presence of his Majesty's Commissioners, and the Estates of Parliament, upon the day of 1604, the defendants cited, and not comparing; the Advocate desired the Estates declaration on the relevancy. The tract extracts whereof are as follow;.

SIR Thomas Huestler of Bonnie, Knight, Advocate to our Sovereign Lord, in his Highness's name, for proving of the points of the said summons, and reason and cause of Treason and Life Majesty continued therein, appeared divers sufficient bills, all sworn and fabricated by the said amongst Laird of Reshairig. All the verifications of the witnesses, examined before the Lords of Articles before; and before the Lords of Secret Council, George Speyer's depositions, and conviction and execution to the death, for the same cause of Treason as Gowrie; together with divers writs and other prohibitions, which were preklly produced, before the said Estates, by the said Lord Advocate, on our Sovereign Lord's name, for proving of the said summons of Treason, and the reason and cause of Life Majesty continued therein; of which said reason bills and depositions produced by the said Advocate to our Sovereign Lord's name, for proving the said summons of Treason, Cloud arising from my Lord's, wearying and tiring his Majesty with infinite supplications in this case. And now, my Lords, as if all his former craft had been lost, he presents it to me more in tears, or looks upon, but compelling his undigested thoughts into a libel, through the volume was put in quarto, delivers it to the King on Good-Friday last.

And his most princely Majesty, having it thrust up with most bitter railing speeches against a great and worthy a Judge, hath of himself commanded me this day to sit forth and manifest his fault unto your Lordships, that he might receive deserved punishment.

In this Fob's pamphlet (for this Book is bound in Fob's) he set forth his cause, the Fob of this day; wherein Mr. Wraynham saith, he had two Decrees in the first Lord-Chancellor's time, both under the Great Seal, and yet both are altered since the last Lord-Chancellor's death, and cancelled by this Lord-Chancellor in a perjurious manner; and first, without cause. Secondly, without matter. Thirdly, without any legal proceeding. Fourthly, without process. Fifthly, upon the Party's bare suggestion; and Sixthly, without cause. Mr. Wraynham is answer. And of this, my Lords, faithfully he imagines a threefold end: First, to reward Fob's fraud and perjury. Secondly, to punish his unjust Proceedings, and to reel things out of Fob's face, and Thirdly, to condemn Wraynham's estate; and thus my Lord was therein led by the rule of his own justice. Yet he stayed not here, but, as if he would set upon against my Lord, he aggravates my Lord's Injustice to be worse than Murder; saying, That in his sentence, he hath devoted him and his whole family. And secondly, as if one should follow upon another, he doubles it upon my Lord, and, in a manner, plainly gives my Lord the lie. And bearing that my Lord had said first in his Majesty in this case, he saith in his book, that he thus did it unjustly, and, to maintain it, speak untrue, adding falsehood to my Lord's Injustice; saying in his Book, it is given out by my Lord hath begged Wraynham's pardon, which, say it be the case of a gentle heart, yet argues a guilty conscience, and is but my Lord's cunning to avoid the hearing of the cause. And as if my Lord should know his own difficulty to be lost, and was unwilling to have it searched or discovered, he charged my Lord with flattery, and tells him that he hath polluted apparel with gold, pearls, and other such things; and that the height of authority makes him perjure. And to make this yet more sharp, he argues, that my Lord, to maintain this, which secret means, whereby the unbelief of his actions may not be seen, and to avoid censure; and, as if my Lord himself says, still in Magick, he saith, that my Lord hath used a report from hell of the late Master of the Rolls, which was consulted before his face, and damned before his death; in content to scandalize the living, but to far, my Lords, doth his malice overlook his wisdom, that he doth not cease, with his malice, to drag the dead out of their graves again. When it is well known unto your Lordships, that the Master of the Rolls was a man of great understanding, great piety, great experience, great dexterity, and of great integrity; yet, because this cause fell by casualty into his hands, by reverence since the last Lord-Chancellor, and he followed not this man's honour in his report, therefore he brands him with these aspersions, and adds to the rest, that he grounded this report upon Wraynham, that is, upon the most innocent, most obedient, and apparent upright. How can you but think, my Lords, that this Gentleman's head is full of poison, seeing it fell out so fall into into his pen, trampling upon the dead? And thus is an addition unto his punishment, the injury of him that is dead, because the dead yet lives, wherein his Justice is scandalized.

And now, my Lords, that you may the more detect his flanders, whereby he goes about to slander my Lord-Chancellor's Justice, give me leave to open the plain and even way, wherein this great Judge walks in this particular case. The question in Chancery at first was two, between Wraynham and Fob, upon each side, either against the other: Wraynham complains of trust broken, whereby he was defrauded, Fob upon a debt of a private reckoning demanded by Wraynham. Upon proof of both these, it was by itself altered, that Fob should assign the Lease made unto him upon trust, and Wraynham should pay the Money, so well proved to be due to Fob: by which means the Decree had, which is the last Decree.

But Mr. Wraynham, wisely supposing that Mr. Fob had intended his Lease, and if it should be assigned to him according to the Decree, it would be merely illusory, he exhibits a new bill to discover what change, as on what force, Fob had charged the land with incumbrances. And Mr. Wraynham finding the circumstances greater, upon the reference of the Lord-Chancellor to the Master of the Rolls, a bargain was mediated between them, that Fob should hold the Lease in question, and Wraynham should have after the rate of twelve years purchase, and to the both assented: so that your Lordships see that the first Decree was not cancelled by my Lord Chancellor, but discharged by himself, for by the Decree he might have had the Lease; but he consented himself with twelve years purchase.

After this, the question grew upon the value, which being referred to the last Master of the Rolls, who the value was at first, before the improvement, when it was in Lease to one Harley, and there, upon proof and oath of divers Witnesses, the Master of the Rolls returned and certified the constant pendage of the Lease to be worth 200*l.* by the year; whereupon Wraynham was to have it at twelve years purchase, amounting to 2400*l.* Mr. Wraynham seeing the land was much improved by a demolition made against the sea and other means, whereby the nature of the land was altered, and the profit much raised, moves the Lord-Chancellor into a decree from the bargain, but saith, that the Value remained was not the true value, for the land was worth 200*l.* by the year, and yet Harley retained it in his hands, 2000 Marks which he owed to Fob, and moreover lost five-hundred Pounds old Money; whereby now Mr. Wraynham had received his 2400*l.* in his Purse. And when he had himself thus received, having received and paid, so that which cost but 200*l.* now he flung upon him, and moves the Lord-Chancellor by a commission to refer the value to two Justices, that had been Farmers to the land, that they might certify the true value after the use, but L'Estrange Abbotson, who certifies the value 318*l.* yearly; and the other, Se. Henry Salomon, certifies the value to be 306*l.* yearly; and my Lord-Chancellor strikes between them, and says 312*l.* So here is a difference of values, the first of 200*l.* upon the first Decree, and so at 312*l.* yearly, without oath. The first value is at the time of Harley's Lease, the second is at the time of the commission granted, and after improvement, which, your Lordships well know in your wisdom, the difference between had been, and may even be so. The last Lord-Chancellor, according to the estimating value of 200*l.* a year, assessed the increase to Wraynham's bargain, and that he should have it, as if the lands were worth 200*l.* per ann. So that now, the 2400*l.* in his purse, had been worth 1680*l.* assessed above 200*l.* Mr. Fob finding this assessed to the bargain, and that he should be paid to pay the said purchase, and that he had choice either to pay the Money, or to part with the Lease, Fob moved the Court, that he might give up the Lease, and defend his first 2000 Marks with damages, which Wraynham assented to, so that he might have satisfaction of that which Fob had received of the profits of the land. Upon this, upon contest of parties, it was again decreed (and this is the second Decree, which Wraynham is now upon this upon, not being an absolute and positive Decree, but qualified with this). First, that Wraynham should pay the 2400*l.* with damages to Fob; and, secondly, that Wraynham should have satisfaction of such profits as Mr. Fob had received out of the land.

Mr. Wraynham moves with this second Decree, being willing to have the value of the land, not according as Fob had received, but what he might have recovered.

Now my Lord-Chancellor finding the case thus standing, thought it no injustice against Wraynham's own offer, not that Fob should lose his damages, having forborne 2400*l.* ten years, nor that Wraynham should be allowed more defalcation than Fob could receive, because he was tied to a dry rent; and finding that Wraynham was neither willing nor able to retain the 2400*l.* with damages unto Fob, my Lord-Chancellor thought fit to uphold the bargain, according to the first certificate of the Master of the Rolls appraised; because the last certificate without oath, was not so equal in the balance of Justice, as that with oath, certified by the Master of the Rolls, upon the examination of divers Witnesses.

Now, my good Lords, if this case stands thus, what Injustice is there committed? What unkindness is there in this action? or, what cause is there for my Lord-Chancellor to hide himself, that this Gentleman should in this case decline against him this day? If it were, my Lords, to make my Lord-Chancellor, for fear, to take off his hand, he will let the World know he is more constant and courageous in the point of justice, than that which he did so justly, so lightly to revoke. And if it were to this end, to make my Lord-Chancellor to dispute with Mr. Wraynham, I am to let you know from his Majesty, he will not let him forgo, nor forget his place, so much as to enter into debate with Mr. Wraynham, knowing that it were not let for him to stand to wrangle or wrangle with Mr. Wraynham, but rather to despise to mean an adversary.

My Lords, you know, that wife and just men may walk the same way, though not the same path; there are divers courses and divers ways to the same end, Justice for Justice sake, they are both to be honoured, neither to be blamed. For, my Lords, if Judges should be traduced as unjust, because they differ in opinion, they should have thankless offices, Justice in the Harmony of Heaven, but Logic determines all Logic officers. Though this Gentleman hath feared hard to lead and dare to high; I judge, yet the razor of his tongue cannot charge him that any thing came between God and his own conscience, but the merits of the cause, though it be certainly true, whilst a man carries this flesh about him, his judgments and faculties will be imperfect. Yet, my Lords, I know that my Lord is the branch of such a tree, who, though he blossom'd fall, yet took more sap from the root than any of the rest: the sun living in the memory of us worthy a father, the father living in the memory of us virtuous a son, who may say, as Agrippa once said to his father, I obey you in judging nothing contrary to law.

I am glad this Gentleman is so asked of excuse, yet heartily sorry his defamation is so foul, as to draw such a smart of punishment as this will be upon him, and here if necessity (the true defender of man's wickedness) should step in, I answer, Though necessity break through all laws, yet being into the face of Justice, it can be broken by Justice; else to Justice can be false, nor no Court keep itself from infamy.

It is well, my Lords, that this fault falls out but seldom; for being so infrequent when it happens, it cannot be foul. It is a pernicious example, for by this, when scandals are presented instead of complaints, that is but to stir divisions between the King and his great Magistrates, to discourage Judges, and vitiate Justice in the sight and mouth of all the people.

I therefore I beseech your Lordships to pardon me, if I be too long, and farther now to show your Lordships what this Court, in like cases, hath done.

In the second year of his Majesty's reign, when Se. Edward Cole, according to his place, entered against Forte in this Court, se. tenor, not petitioning his Majesty against the last Lord-Chancellor, for granting an exception for slaying of a suit at the Common Law, which your Lordships know how necessary it is) he being convicted upon his own confession, received a sharp censure. I will conclude with this one, and I shall deliver your Lordships, in this place, so low it read, and then do I humble because your Lordships to show the Gentleman at the Bar, either for no defence, or excuse.

Then Wraynham's Examinations were read in this Book and Enroll.

Then he was charged with these words following, in the end of his Epistle to his Majesty: "He that judges unjustly, must, to maintain it, speak untruly; and the height of authority maketh men to profess." Also, in facing up of his Majesty resolves what the Master of the Rolls was faulty, he said, First, the Master of the Rolls had omitted many of his material points. Secondly, he flouted off other faces. Thirdly, that he was not more without the equity of his cause. Fourthly, That he did falsify one Fob's process. And, that he grounded the report upon the deposition of Witnesses that were absent, untruly, and mere impertinent. And, lastly, as if the report had been condemned and damned before to the pet of hell, he said it was ruled as de injuria.

In his Epistle to his Majesty, he is charged with these words:

"I understood my Lord-Chancellor hath begged my pardon: it is not worthy the show of a great heart, but unworthy it argueth a guilty conscience; otherwise, at first I had been thought guilty, and had I not then have been proceeded with in Majesty for me, it and been so."

an argument of an indulgent nature, but in his opinion where there is no mercy, was manifestly done. I am his grace, and I do not in any words say, or in that of justice, or in goods, I will not with him with my grace. And the other, as it is in me to hear, or to be, or to be, or to be,
 I bid him his grace, and infinitely depletes the judgment of his Majesty.

And in the conclusion of his Epistle were these words: "I do sit to judge at your gates, as I shall due to stand in great and eminent a judge, unto to great and wise a King."

"It be should not defer to reward to Father for their land and perjuries, I know not why he should have had all out of your."

My Lord, with this his last cunning and rheumatic, hath polluted his unjust proceedings against me; for my Lord's grace and promotion upon as his speech is wanting in my writing, out of which a cloudy mist will rise to hide the verity of your princely Judgments.

"I could never say by what reason or words his Majesty hath considered his dealings to excuse himself unto your Majesty, understanding only a piece, and not the whole from your Majesty. This last move and humbly to beseech your Majesty to save my wife and children, and out of your princely justice to appoint a day of hearing, whereby these shall appear unto your Majesty, as well the innocency of my affirmations, as the unkindness of his Lordship's abuse. For I never sought contrary, but openly, and sometimes in my Lord's presence, have pointed and complained of my wrongs, and desire a public hearing before your Majesty, which the greatest subject dare not do without your grace and justice."

And in another place, Wharpham faith, "My Lord Chancellor proves nothing by record, nor delivers any thing by writing, to answer the things objected against him, but would hide himself from the eyes of your Majesty's justice."

His Majesty thus, though he receive petitions from his subjects against his highest Justice, yet he will have his Judges know, that they are subject to a account only, and to some else upon earth.

His Majesty received this petition on Good-Friday last, in which this Gentleman hath far exceeded the measure of an humble complaint, and sent a most appeal to your Lordships against him.

Then was Farris's precedent read, bearing date Mercurii decimo quarto
Novembris, anno domini huiusmodi, folio 1.

And likewise Farris's two last petitions against my Lord-Chancellor, touching which reference is had. And the Lords asked Mr. Wharpham what he could say for himself.

Mr. WRAYNHAM.

Right Honourable, and my very good Lords,
 FROM a man to perplexed with so many miseries, what can be expected? and what marvel, if I should foster, or might let fall any speech that might seem uncomely?

My Lords, I know not how to behave myself, I will not willingly offend any, but especially the King's most excellent Majesty; yet nature commands me to defend myself, for it cannot be thought he can be faithful to another, that is not so to himself. And therefore I humbly desire, that what I offer in extenuation, or defence, that neither the assent that bear it, nor your Lordships, which are to judge of it, would take it offensive.

My Lord confideth of three parts.

First, An Epistle to his Majesty.
Secondly, The body of the book, which relateth the truth of all the proceedings.

And, Thirdly, a conclusive speech in the nature of an epilogue.

Touching the body of the book, and the truth of the cause, I commend it not now called in question, for I think your Lordships will not enter into the particular; but because it hath pleased Mr. Attorney to speak something of it, I will not be silent.

My accusations, my Lord, are set forth in two things: First, that the complaint is of the Right-Honourable the Lord-Chancellor. Secondly,
 That it is in better and unrevoked terms.

For the first, I must say for succour and protection our dear Lord Sovereign Lord the King; for it pleased his Majesty, sitting here in the sacred Seat of Justice, to declare, that if any were wronged in point of Justice, in what they might come and have relief; and for proof thereof,
 I humbly desire your Lordships to hear me read a sentence or two in his Majesty's Book.

"For, first he, if any were wronged, their complaint should have come unto me, none of you but will confess you have a King of a reasonable understanding." &c.

And in another place, "Why then should you spare to complain unto me, being the high-way; therefore as you come going to the Law for Justice, &c."

"But if you find bribery or corruption, then come boldly; but beware of the justice of your cause."

First, therefore, in his Majesty's opinion, a man may be wronged in a Court of Justice.

Secondly, In that case, his Majesty is not only willing to receive a complaint, but to reform what is amiss: so that his Majesty publishing this much to all his Subjects, I hope your Lordships will not conceive that hardly to complain is a fault; especially finding that his Majesty faith,
 "Why do you spare to complain?"

The second part of my accusation is, because I have used unrevoked and bitter terms.

First, I divided the collections objected against me into two parts.

(1.) Into two sentences, which Mr. Attorney hath endeavoured to favor on the Lord-Chancellor by inference.

(2.) Into words, applied to his Lordship.

My Lords, Touching the first, I hope general speeches shall have no such contradiction.

In the 16th Psalm, the Prophet faith of himself, I have said in a fury, all men are liars. And in the 24th Psalm it is said of all men, They have all one out of the way, and are abominable; there is none that doeth good, nor is there any. And in the Epistle to the Romans, it is said, Let God be just, and every man a liar. And again it is said in Scripture, That the passion of Ape is under their lips, and their throats turn every word into a curse. And yet was never heard, that any of the Prophets and Apostles (godly men) found fault with David, saying, For I have said in a new day, and at midnight, because they would have persecuted me, therefore, my Lord, I have said in a new day, and at midnight, because they would have persecuted me, for the which the said Wright was audited, convicted, fined, and censured in the King's Bench.

By J. P. B. Baron of the Exchequer and Honourable Henry, who complained to King's Bench, III. 4. That Sir William Baron, Chief-Justice, had awarded an advice contrary to law. And the King sent it to the Judges, whereupon Henry was imprisoned, judged, fined, and pardoned; yet he had not remedy but in Petition.

The Justice hath made a sharp law against such an open scandalous news of the Chancellor, Justice of the King's Bench, &c. And because divers were punished for daunders, in petitions to his Majesty; therefore, 13 R. II. Per. 2. an. 25. the Commons desired they might not be troubled for any matter that should be contained in a petition to the King; and the King answered, "Let every man bring an, or to be with law and reason."

Wright objected a place of 20 years for his Majesty, where the Parliament hath, I have said in my life, that all were here. The next is, Do as you will; for my own sake, that all were here. The next is, Do as you will; for my own sake, that all were here.

And another thing that Wright offered in his defence, was the King's words, when he said, in his Book, that is in law. But of what I Of corruption? See Baron in Re. Per. 24 R. II. Per. 3. an. 15. If any man corrupts with his Baron, Baron is, that is in law. It is an act in the Rolls of the Parliament de plac. that the great de de was a counsel of bribery, and put from his place; and Cardinal Wolsey was convicted of a foul corruption.

But if a man, according to sincerity, give judgment, though he differ from another Judge, this is no injustice. Famous Dyer gave judgment in the Common-Pleas, and this was revealed in the King's Bench; yet he discharged his conscience; and also: it was afterwards reversed, yet it was no injustice. The like instance might be made of Sir Christopher Wright, and others. Now, in this case, my Lord-Chancellor that is living, differs from the Lord-Chancellor that is dead. This is not strange, it hath been seen, and even will be; but if a Judge's conscience be soiled and murthered with corruption, then all is naught.

The King hath the Pleas of the Crown, and upon every Judgment one of the parties is angry and displeased: But this must not presently produce a new meaning, for that will hinder all other business. For I will put you against one between a Nobleman here, and divers other Noblemen that were troubled by the Counts of Southampton, who were all Plaintiffs, and Sir John Flood Defendant; and this was Much 47 of 43 Ed. The man that was so contented in the cause, was upon an exception of a Manor (as I remember) in the Exchequer of the deci, which my Lord-Chancellor then thought good. And therefore decreed, "That my Lady" of Southampton should have all." Whereupon Sir John Flood petitioned Queen Elizabeth, that she should refer the examination of the Decree to some of the Judges; but the Queen would never refer any thing to those that were named unto her, but she referred it to two other Judges not named in the petition, who attended my Lord-Chancellor; and they then referred it against the Decree, and my Lord reversed his own Decree.

I know I have held your Lordships long; yet I cannot tell, in these cruel days, whether men will be foolish, which hath made me longer than I would have been. Therefore, to conclude, I agree, in all things, with the sentence given in Pier's case of a Yan.

Sir Giles Grenell, Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Court hath no intent to discourage the meanest subject of his lawful appeal upon his Prince; for that were to diminish the people of law, and the King of the intelligence of the oppression that might fall upon his people.

But this case I suppose not to be within the first. The matter is such case, as that a review of an inferior sentence of a superior Magistrate, my Lord-Chancellor of England; and that before he be heard, making the King his speedy execution.

But examine the nature of these accusations, and you shall find them more scandalous, and impolitic; as breaking Decrees, rewarding frauds and perjuries, palliating oppressions with greatness, wit, and eloquence.

Why, my Lord, if this liberty should spread, then I desire the indifferent brester to see in what a miserable case the subject stands, when the right of every good man shall stand in the malignity, and unequal nature of every turbulent spirit? And, my Lords the Judges, in what a case stand they, if by such clamours every delinquent shall be made Judge over them? and what privilege shall the King my Master have? For if this humour should take a little head, will it not carry both him and Justice into the field? And therefore I conclude, that this is to be punished; and is not a petition, but a presumptuous challenge, and of so far a work-nature beyond duty, as honour and universal Justice is beyond particular right: And therefore I agree with him that went before me, leaving his good parts to mercy, and his ill parts to the censure of Pier's case.

Lord Chief-Baron, Sir Laurence Tayford. This cause is a cause of a high nature, being a scandal of a great and principal Officer of the Kingdom, and of one that is an high and eminent person, which scandal is set forth in this Book, which certainly I cannot call a petition; for the petitioner hath professed too far, that it is a plain revile of a Decree. Every man knoweth, that the Chancellor hath the keeping of the Great-Seal, whereby is managed Mercy and Justice; and if this great person be troubled that is thus abused by every offender, how intolerable will this mischief be?

I doubt not but that by a right way, you may, by a petition in an humble course, and humble manner, desire his Majesty that he would be pleased to renew a sentence in Chancery, or else grant a commission to others to review the cause. But doth this man abuse this course? No, but he will be his own Judge, sentencing his own cause. I can call this Book no better, than a scandalous and malicious libel against the Lord-Chancellor; and that not without great bitterness, as I have heard.

First, he taketh him with injustice then mark the circumstances, he saith, "My Lord-Chancellor hath revealed the Decree, without cause, without law matter, without legal proceeding, without precedent, and upon a bare suggestion."

Then he goeth further, saying, "Injustice is worse than murder; for this Decree hath deserved him and his whole family."

And, not content with this, charged him with oppression, and palliating it with greatness, wit, and eloquence; that which a greater and heavier scandal cannot be.

You shall not be barred of access to his Majesty; but that by a petition you may desire to have a Decree reversed, and that his Majesty would grant a commission to review it. But no things shall be done I will, and then the law puts us, that it is to be against a Nobleman. Sir Richard Croft did sue an action for laying of false deeds against the Lord Beauchamp, whereupon my Lord-Chancellor said an action upon the Statute de Scand. Magnae. But that would be no action, because it was done legally for a man may lay a law. Write such a law, by the title of the said Writ; but be well aware that he prove it well, or else he shall be well fined in the same Court. But much more shall he deserve a de, if he hold it without Writ, or without record or proof, as Wright hath done.

And therefore, be sure I must be short, I think him fully worthy of the censure to be given upon, in all points.

Lord Hobart, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas. Mr. Attorney hath very worthily and like himself, according to his place, brought this man into the Court, to give answer for the grievous and most outrageous offence that of this kind hath been committed; in which case, I will first tell you, what I do not question, as I then what I do question.

For the first, Petitions may be exhibited to the King without controversy; nay, in some cases they must be exhibited; and God forbid, that any man's way should be locked up, or that any Subject should be barred of access to his Majesty, for when appeals fall, and when ordinary remedy is wanting, so that there is no Judge above the highest Judge, yet, you may still refer unto your Sovereign for extreme remedy: this is proper to a King, Quia capere, si capere possit; for it is an inherent quality to his Crown. So that without controversy a man may petition against a sentence; for God forbid, that we that are Judges, should draw that privilege to ourselves, to give sentence, and not to hear it examined. But it is true, it must be presented as a supplication, and you must formally to work; ordinarily you must go to the proper Courts of Justice; if that fail, the extraordinary course is open by the King; and this is no more than to draw to his Majesty, how you and yourself grieved, and then send the cause and fact to the King's wisdom.

But now let what this man hath done, he hath made neither the matter nor form of a petition.

First, for matter, he perverts, that is not saying that my Lord-Chancellor hath expressly intimated two Decrees, when he hath done nothing, only croaked in order, thus which, there is nothing more common, for they are but intoleration, and not definition.

And for form, this is no Petition, no book, as he would call it, but an express, peremptory and audacious libel. Then the manner offends yet more; for whereas a supplication imports, that a man should speak it upon his knees, for as it is in some Requis, men attempt nothing against law, but they must do it with a rope about their necks: so that he that goeth about to attempt any thing against a Decree, he doth it with a rope of the King's censure about his neck; but mark the courage of this man, how infinitely he proceeds in this case!

First, for the King, as hath been well observed, he hath, offertur Rex, as if he should bid the King arise and take revenge.

Therefore for the Decree, he saith, that the foundation of it came from hell; if that be so, then this sentence must needs be belial, when he falls upon a poor man, the Master of the Rolls: I call him poor man, because he is not living to answer for himself, but yet he was a worthy Minister of Justice, (for I had much cause to know him) and he was of as much deservency and integrity, as ever man that sat in his place, and I believe the Chancery will find out of such a man. But not content with this, he scorns my Lord-Chancellor's courtesy, and carries himself, as if he would trample all under foot.

So much for the manner: as for the matter, it is odious; the person with whom he hath done, is the principal Officer and Magistrate of Justice in the Kingdom, one that hath the nomination of all the Judges of Peace, and the Principal that carries all the Sheriff's one that keeps and carries the Seal, and his chief Judge in the Court, and sole Judge in the Chancery. And shall we think that this man is brought and held to Corruption, or Injustice, or Murder? What more words as the King's dishonour, then that he should place in the Judicature such an unworthy man? a man infinitely the more wronged, because he deserves his place, as well as any man that went before him; and yet his last Predecessor was wiser, excellent, and deserved no small commendations. But Wright London, as a man hath honours both toward the living and the dead; wherefore, there is a just and tribune due to the Master of the Rolls deceased. I would have mention made of it in the Decree, and with that addition to the sentence, I concur in all things with the President of the Court.

Sir Edward Mosses, Lord Chief-Justice. My Lord, it is a true saying, Judicium non redditur nisi in veritate. For I yet never saw any man fit down himself with a sentence that went against him.

I would not so far have blamed Wright as he is to have censured him for complaining to the King; yet the refractory I find in law, which any man may see in King Edgar's laws. "Let no man complain to the King in matters of variance, except he cannot have right at home, or that right be too heavy for him. Then let him complain to the King." Whereby it is meant, that if the laws be so that he shall complain as a Court of Equity to the King himself. Thus, to complain is not easy to any man, for all Justice comes from the King, and though he distribute his Justice to be ministered in several Courts, yet the primitive power resides still in his person. Therefore, to the Justice of his Majesty may any Subject have resort; but this must be humbly as a Petitioner, not as Mr. Wright hath done here, who is not a petitioner, but a censurer; and doth not complain, but grossly rails upon a high Judge.

Can you, Mr. Wright, charge your Judge with corruption, through fear or affection? (for I make them both alike.) Say not the chief Judge nor highest Counsellors I say, have us not, wherever you can take us. But a judgment is pronounced from the faculty of our consciences, and war-

Wherein, let me add for my last, the manner of presenting it, the wrong itself; and then withal the defence was made, which when I heard it, I was more offended than with the Book itself; and I may justly make it a question, whether he were more foolish in writing it, or more vain in defending it?

His defence is a two-fold necessity: first, a necessity to induce the King to hear him; like disloyal, that would needs for Talbot's fields on fire, to get his oil.

The other, a necessity of Estate, proceeding out of the Laws of necessity; Gravelius first manifeste injustitia. One part of speech was general, that he meant not my Lord-Chancellor; but in the general there is a major, and in the particular there is the application; and then every man can make the conclusion, as hath been well observed by Sir Edward Coke.

You are a man of a private and private spirit, and if you know not of what spirit you are, I can teach you: I say, of that spirit, that you compare yourself with Agathos and Prophetas, and you multiply Scriptures; your aim is angel's inspiration, to show a difference between living your passion, and deliberation. It comes fully home into your own breast, et pulchrum prope guttur est in.

The best part of this answer, was the last, and I would it had been all in all; and so I agree with the sentence given before me.

Vilfridus Walsingham. I am forry a man should deserve to great a censure as this man's fault will make; yet I am very glad in this bold and quick-sighted age, that other men, by his example, may take heed not to exceed the bounds of modesty.

This humour, it smothereth self-love (which believes nothing but itself) hath been that, that hath bred this Gentleman up to unmannery, that he takes care to accuse the highest and greatest Judge of the Kingdom, of Oppression, Injustice, Murder, nay, of any thing; which is not only spoken by it a tongue, but aggravated by his answer.

For to learn, he would encourage other men by the King's Book to do the like, whereto we may see the malice of this man, that will get praise from the faulsh flower, yet every foolish may take comfort in his Majesty's Book, and God forbid, that he which is wrong'd, should be encouraged to complain to his Sovereign; yet, this complaint is no Petition, but a very Libel, and deserves no better name.

The King's will it, that you should be bold, and that you should come to him; but yet you must be sure that your cause must be just and right. This is a good and gracious speech of a King; but in pity Mr. Walsingham shouldst Scripture to maintain an ill cause; and to clear my Lord-Chancellor dead, and alive, so he is worthy men as any in my time, and yet I have had a long age; and God forbid their Conscience should be led by private men's humours.

I say no more, but let every man that hears as this day, take heed, that their humours lead them not into their outrageous courses, but carry themselves with modesty. I shall not need to enlarge, but content with my Lords before me.

Earl of Arundel. I shall not need to use many words for the matter; in brief, Walsingham hath forgot himself fully against a great and high instrument of Justice, renewing complaints upon complaints; after the King had told him in my hearing, that the Lord-Chancellor had done justly, as he himself would have done; and therefore I think him very much to blame, as well deserving the censure given. And the use is (as you see by him) for malice may not so lack honesty, but reason and poise out of the wholesome flowers; as his prepossession is to be hated, so his humiliation and submission is to be pitied; yet I agree with my Lords in all things.

Probertus, Lord-Chamberlain. No man's mouth is so stopp'd, but in case of grief he may seek relief. I think there is little terapie, that either the Master of the Rolls that is dead, or the Lord-Chancellor that is living, did proceed without Justice; because it is but an order against an order, a thing very frequent and usual in this, and in all other arbitrary Courts.

For the sentence, I agree with the Court, being sorry, since his last rebellion was humble, that before he hath shewed this good part, and seld his wit to his own confusion.

Duke of Lenox. I am forry that Walsingham hath not the Grace of God to use the use of his Majesty's Book, which is not to complain without just cause; and without he could make proof of his complaint. I will not repeat the worth of my Lord-Chancellor living, or dead; but I am forry that a man of so great parts should deserve to heavy a sentence; wherewith in all things I agree.

Wrobley, Lord Privy-Seal. My Lords, I am of opinion, as formerly my Lords have been; I do hold this a very scandalous Libel, being against a person of such worth; the greater the person is, the more severe should the punishment be for the offender: and so I consent in opinion with my Lords before me, and do think this offence to have exceeded his punishment; and therefore if a great fine had been laid upon him, I should have agreed unto it.

Arlet, Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. The Lord, the Fountain of Wisdom, hath for this glorious war of the World in the order and beauty whereto it stands, and hath appointed Princes, Magistrates, and Judges to hear the causes of the people, not so much out of authority, as out of justice and reason: for if no such persons were to hear and determine other men's causes, every man must be his own Judge, which would lead to nothing but ruin and preposterous confusion: God therefore, in his wisdom, order'd and ordain'd their bounds, in the Magistrate on the one side with infirmitie, and the Subject on the other side with protection; which infirmitie when he flowed them, the King's Throne is upheld by justice; and Daniel was commanded to rule his people with justice and judgment; and the like commandment is given to others in subordinate places, not to pry the person of the poor, nor to stand in awe of the face of the mighty, but to weigh the simplicity and integrity of Conscience. For mark the example of the most holy and reverend Judges, Moses, Sonath, and the rest, to whom their greatest comfort was, that they could say, Whoso Go or Ar have I taken? From when have I received a reward? And by the course of piety and duty, we that for sometimes to Judge others, are at another time to stand at a higher bar, to receive judgment from Heaven.

With the great grace, and beauty of protection, God calls them by his own name, God's Children of the Highest; God being present amongst 'em to direct them, and defend them; God himself in the Congregation of Princes, he is amongst all the People; thou shalt not detract nor slander the Judge, nor speak evil of the Princes of the people. And in two several Epistles, both in Peter and in James, it is said, "That in the latter days there shall be wicked men, that shall speak evil of Magistrates, and men of authority, blaspheming 'em;" as if it were blasphemy, tho' not against God, yet against those that are the Image of so great a God.

And therefore, since Walsingham hath blasphemed, spoken evil, and slander'd a chief Magistrate as any in the Kingdom; it remaineth, that in honour to God, and in duty and justice to the King and Kingdom, that he should receive severe punishment; for it is his cause to-day, and it may be ours every day; and have not some, for justice sake, been before'd to endure the threatening of their heads? Wherefore, if greater punishment had been given him, I should have assented, for justice brought to us, but liberty to our gracious Sovereign. Wherewith I agree in all things with the sentence before given.

Bosfield, Lord-Treasurer. I perceive, as the prisoner at the bar was charged at first, that he had foolishly offended, and ought to have yielded himself at the feet, and not to have made his offence greater, by defending a bad cause.

My Lords who have heard his fault in part led out, and transferred him, I think they have done very worthily. For the party himself, I would I could come to him with a little better charity than I can, for his answer did more displease me, than his cause; for I see his spleen and his humour grows, rather to defame a worthy man, than to free himself, how unjustly, I appeal to the whole World; who came to his place with as much satisfaction to all hearts, and applause, with as good carriage as any man I ever heard come before him.

The thing that I would conclude with, is, that I would be glad that all that here we might take us right that are Judges, we desire not to be forbidden by any Sage's tongue, that hath cause to complain; and therefore do it not for any particular respect to ourselves, but for the public course of justice; and for the care we have of the publick good, and for nothing else.

For the fault itself, it hath been so well opened by all the Lords, that I will spare to hold you longer in speaking of it. And for the sentence, I think it very fit and just: and therefore agree with the rest.

XVI. Proceedings on the Habeas Corpus, brought by Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heveningham, and Sir Edmund Hampden, Nov. 1627. 3 Car. I. at the King's-Bench, in Westminster-Hall.

THE King having deprived himself of the prospect of all parliamentary Aids, by dissolving the Parliament, and yet resolving to prosecute the war; it was necessary to project all possible ways and means of raising money; to which end letters were sent to the Lords-Lieutenants of the Counties, to return the names of the persons of ability, and what sums they might spare; and the Comptroller of the King's Household issued forth letters in the King's name, under the Privy Seal, to several persons returned for the Loan-money; some were affixed 20 £, some 15, and others 10 £; and Commissioners were appointed with private instructions how to behave themselves in this affair, and divers Lords of the Council were appointed to repair into their Counties to advance the Loan*. Collectors were also appointed to pay into the Exchequer the sums received, and to return the names of such as refused, or discovered a disposition to delay the payment of the sums imposed. This assentment of the general-Loan did not pass currently with the people, for divers persons refused to subscribe or bond at the rate proposed; the non-subscribers of high rank in all Counties were bound over by recognizances to tender their appearance at the Council-board, and perform'd the same accordingly, and divers of them committed to prison: which caus'd great murmuring. But amongst these many Gentlemen who were impos'd^d throughout England, for refusing to send upon the Commission for Loans, only five of them brought their Habeas Corpus, viz. Sir Thomas Darnel, Sir John Corbet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heringham, and Sir Edmund Hampden.

* Sir Randolph Cromwell being so zeal for the advancement thereof, was then removed from his place of Lord Chief Justice, and Sir Michael Hale succeeded in his room: a person who, for his parts and abilities, was thought worthy of this profession; yet nevertheless came to the same with a persuasion, coming in the place of one so well known to be suddenly removed. Raynolds, Vol. I. † Cromwell Charles 1. pag. 31. Meant upon Friday the 10th of Nov. Sir Randolph Cromwell, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, was discharged of that place, by Writ under the Great Seal, for some cause of disaffection conceived against him; but for what, was not generally known.

Arguments upon the Habeas Corpus.

Sir Thomas Darnel hic Cujus, Michaelis, 3^o Caroli, Baro Regis.

SIR Thomas Darnel, Baronet, being imprisoned in the Fleet, by virtue of a warrant signed by the King's Attorney-General, upon the third of November, by Sir John Heringham, his assigned Council, moved the Justices of the King's Bench to grant him a Writ of Habeas Corpus conco, directed to the Warden of the Fleet, to show that Court the cause of his imprisonment, that thereupon they might determine whether his restraint were legal or illegal, and it was granted by the Court returnable Thursday following, the 8th day of November.

On Thursday, Sir Thomas Darnel expected that his Writ should be returned, but it was delayed, and it was moved that the return should be on Saturday, the 10th of November, which was made Sir Thomas Darnel the more ready in suing out an alias upon his Habeas Corpus.

On Saturday the Writ was not returned, and thereupon the King's Attorney-General gave order for an alias upon the Habeas Corpus for Sir Thomas Darnel, returnable upon Thursday morning the 15th of November; by virtue of which Writ, the Warden of the Fleet brings Sir Thomas Darnel to the King's Bench, and presents at followeth:

Ex parte ipsius Regis parte in quodam scholae antea hinc brevi.

The return was this.

"*Ego Henricus Lilie Miles gradumque pfectus Domini Regis de

"ted to your custody, these are to require you still to continue him; and to let

Et hoc est causae detentus gradus Thome Darnel.

Serj. Brampton. MAY it please your Lordship, I did not expect this cause at this time, neither did I hear of it until I came now into the Hall; and therefore I shall now humbly shew you what my Client hath informed me since my coming hither. I understand by him that he expected not his coming to this place to-day, the Writ by which he was brought hither was not moved for by him, but was procured without his privity; and being his case is so, and that he perceives the cause of his coming, which before he knew not, his motion to your Lordship is, that you would be pleased to let him have the copy of the reason, and give him leave to speak unto it, and that this Writ being now sent out by his procurement, may not be filed.

Head, Attorney-General. My Lords, it is true that this Gentleman, Sir Thomas Darnel, being imprisoned in the Fleet, did heretofore move your Lordships for a Habeas Corpus, &c. and it was granted him, and his Majesty being made acquainted therewith, was very willing that he and all his people might have equal justice; and when they desire that which seems to accord with the rules of the law, they should have it. But it fell out so, that on the day when the Writ should have been returned, the Warden of the Fleet did not return it, as it was his duty to have done; he did forbear to do it upon a commandment, because it was conceived, there being live at that time to appear, the Court would have been frustrated for want of time: but I imagined that these Gentlemen who did desire the Writ before, should have again been earnest to renew them, which it seems they did not. Then Habeas Corpus was sent out by special command, because these Gentlemen gave out in speeches, and in particular this Gentleman, I that they did wonder why they should be hindered from Trial, and what should be the reason their Writs were not returned. Now, his Majesty did tell me, that they requested that the King did deny them the course of Justice, and therefore he commanded me to renew the Writ, which I did, and think I may do it ex officio.

Sir Thomas Darnel. My Lords, I know not until now, but that I was concerned by Sir Attorney's Warrant only, and thereupon I did desire a Habeas Corpus at the bar, which you were pleased to grant me; but now I understand that my restraint is by another means, and therefore I shall crave Michaelis, 3^o Caroli Regis. Thursday 23 November, 1627.

Sir John Corbet, Baronet, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Heringham, Sir Edmund Hampden, Knights, were brought to the Bar.

Serj. Brampton. MAY it please your Lordship to hear the return read, or shall I open it?

L. C. Jusse. Let it be read.

Mr. Justice read the return, being the same as that of Sir Thomas Darnel.

Serj. Brampton. May it please your Lordship, I shall humbly move upon this return on the behalf of Sir John Heringham, with whom I am of Council; it is his petition, that he may be bailed from his imprisonment. It was but in vain for me to move that to a Court of Law, which by Law cannot be granted; and therefore in that regard, that upon this return it will be questioned, whether at this return it made, the Gentleman may be bailed or not? I shall humbly offer up to your Lordship the case, and some reasons out of mine understanding, arising out of the return itself, to satisfy your Lordship that these prisoners may, and, as their case is, ought to be bailed by your Lordship.

The exception that I take to this return, is as well to the manner and substance of the return, as to the manner and legal form thereof: the exception that I take to the matter, is in several respects.

That the return is too general, there is no sufficient cause shown in special or in general of the commitment of this Gentleman; and as it is insufficient for the cause, so also in the time of the first imprisonment: for howsoever here hath appeared some upon the second Warrant from the leave to have some time to speak to it. And as for the words alleged against me, as if I had spoken them, I humbly pray they may be no disparagement to my Cause, for I do purposely refer myself to your grave censures, as being accused of a fault whereof I am no ways guilty.

Hydr. L. C. Jusse. You give a temperate and fair answer; and now you may perceive the upright and sincere proceedings that have been in this business. You did no sooner petition to have Counsel assigned you, but you had it granted to you, for indeed we cannot deny it, and I know not but that any Counsel might have moved for you, without having been assigned for you, and yet have had no blame, for it is the King's pleasure his laws should take place and be executed, and therefore do we sit here. When you made a motion for a Habeas Corpus, that was likewise granted, whether the commitment be by the King or others, this Court is a place where the King doth sit in person, and we have power to examine it, and if it appears that any man hath injury or wrong by his imprisonment, we have power to deliver and discharge him; if otherwise, he is to be remanded by us to prison again. Now it seems you are not ready to speak to this return, if you desire a further day, we ought to grant it.

Sir Th. Darnel. My Lords, I humbly desire it.

L. C. Y. I know no cause why it should be denied.

Serj. Brampton. My Lords, we shall desire the Writ may not be filed, and that we may have a copy of the return.

Attorn. Gen. You cannot deny the filing of the Writ, if you do not have a copy of the return.

L. C. Jusse. Although you be remanded at this time to prison, because you are not ready to speak to the return, we can adjourn you to a new day upon the Writ, and so you may prepare yourself; but if you will not have this filed, then must go out a new Habeas Corpus, and thereupon must be another return.

Serj. Brampton. My Lord, we desire sometime, that we may be advised whether we may proceed or not.

L. C. Jusse. Will you forbear yourself to the King?

Sir Th. Darnel. My Lord, I desire some time to advise of my proceedings: I have moved many men, and offered to retain them of my Counsel, but they refuse me, and I can get none to be of Counsel with me without your allowance.

L. C. Jusse. You shall have what Counsel assigned you you will have or desire; but no offence will be taken against any man that shall advise you in your proceedings in Law.

Attorn. Gen. I will pass my word, they that do advise you, shall have no offence taken against them for it; and I shall give content to any way that you shall desire, either that it may be filed, or that it may not be filed; for if you desire Justice, you shall have it, and the King will not deny it; but if it shall be considered, as it is returned, that there was a denial of Justice on the King's part, you must know that his Majesty is very tender of that. And for the Gentleman, now he is brought hither, I conceive, but yet I leave it to your Lordship's judgment, that the Writ must be filed, and you must either deliver him, or remand him, or else it will be an escape in the Warden of the Fleet.

Sir Th. Darnel. I would not have it thought that I should speak any thing against my Prince, and for those words I do deny them; for upon my conference they never came into my thought: perhaps you shall find that they have been spoken by some other, but not by any of us.

L. C. Jusse. Sir, you have made a fair answer, and I doubt not but Mr. Attorney will make the like relation of it; you move for the not filing of the Writ; if you refuse to have it filed, whereby it should not be of record, you must have no Copy of it, but if you will have it filed you shall have a Copy of it, and further time to speak to it, choose whether of them you will.

Serj. Brampton. We desire to have the return read once more.

And it was read as before.

Serj. Brampton. So as the Writ may not be filed, we will desire no copy of the return.

L. C. Jusse. Then the Gentleman must return back again into the custody of the Warden of the Fleet; and therefore I ask you, whether you desire to come hither again upon this Writ, or will you have a new one?

Sir Th. Darnel. I desire your Lordship that I may have time to consider of it.

L. C. Jusse. Then in God's name take your own time to think of it.

Lords of the Council to detain him still in prison, yet by the return no time can appear when he was first imprisoned, tho' it be necessary it should be shown; and if that time appear not, there is no cause your Lordship should remand him; and consequently he is to be delivered.

Touching the matter of the return, which is the cause of his imprisonment, it is expressed to be per speciale mandatum domini Regis: this is too general and uncertain, for that it is not manifest what kind of command this was.

Touching the legal form of the return, it is not, as it ought to be, fully and positively the return of the Keeper himself only, but it comes with a procurator, or procurator, that he was committed per speciale mandatum domini Regis, as appears by Warrant from the Lords of the Council, not of the King himself, and that is not good in legal form.

For the matter and substance of the return, it is not good, because there ought to be a cause of that imprisonment.

That Writ is means, and the only means that the subject hath in this case to obtain his liberty; there are other Writs by which men are delivered from restraint, as that of habeas replegiandum, but extends not to this cause, for it is particularly excepted in the body of the Writ de mancipatione, et de custodie admittenda, but they lie in other cases: but the Writ of Habeas Corpus is the only against the subject hath to obtain his liberty, and the end of this Writ is to return the cause of the imprisonment, that it may be examined in this Court, whether the parties ought to be discharged or not: but that cannot be done upon this return for the cause of the imprisonment of this Gentleman at first is so far from appearing particularly by it, that there is no cause at all expressed in it.

This Writ requires that the cause of the imprisonment should be returned, and if the cause be not specially certified by it, yet should it at the least be shewn in general, that it may appear to the Judges in the Court, and it must be expressed so far, as that it may appear to be none of those causes for which by law of the Kingdom the subject ought not to be imprisoned, and it ought to be expressed that it was by imprisonment a vi et contra, and not upon petition or suggestion made to the King and Lords, which is against the Statute made in the 25 Edw. III. c. 4.

43 Edw. III. c. 3.
By the Statute 25 Edw. III. cap. 4. it is ordained and established, That no man from henceforth shall be taken by prison or imprisonment made to the King or his Council, but by indictment or course of law; and accordingly it was enacted, 42 Edw. III. cap. 3. the title of which Statute is, None shall be put to answer an accusation made to the King without imprisonment. Then, my Lord, it being so, although the cause should not need to be expressed in such manner as that it may appear to be some of those causes mentioned in the Statute, or else the subject by this return justify the benefit and advantage of these laws, which be their birth-right and inheritance: but in this return there is no cause at all appearing of the first commitment, and therefore it is plain, that there is no cause for your Lordship to remand him; but there is cause you should deliver him, since the Writ is to bring the body and the cause of the imprisonment before your Lordship.

But it may be objected, that this Writ of Habeas Corpus doth not demand the cause of the first commitment, but of the detaining only; and so the Writ is satisfied by the return; for though it show no cause of the first commitment, but of detaining only, yet it declareth a cause why the Gentleman is detained in prison: that is no answer, nor can give any satisfaction; for the reason why the cause is to be returned, is for the subject's liberty, that if it shall appear a good and sufficient cause for your Lordship, this to be remanded; if your Lordship think and find it is sufficient, he is to be enlarged.

This is the end of this Writ, and this cannot appear to your Lordship, unless the time of the first commitment be expressed in the return. I know that in some cases the time is not material, as when the cause of the commitment is (and that is specially) returned, so that the time is not material, it is enough to show the cause without the time, as after a conviction by Trial had by Law, but when it is in this manner, that the time is the matter itself; for intend what cause you will of the commitment, you though for the highest cause of Treason, there is no doubt but that upon the return thereof the time of it must appear; for it being before Trial and Conviction had by law, it is but an accusation, and he that is only accused ought by law to be let to bail.

But I beseech your Lordship to observe the consequence of this cause. If the law be, that upon this return this Gentleman should be remanded, I will not dispute whether or no, a man may be imprisoned before he is convicted according to the law; but if this return shall be good, then his imprisonment shall not continue on for a time, but for ever; and the subjects of this Kingdom may be restrained of their liberties perpetually, and by law there can be no remedy for the subject; and therefore this return cannot stand with the laws of the Realm, or that of Magna Charta, nor with the Statute of 28 Edw. III. cap. 3. for if a man be not bailable upon this return, they cannot have the benefit of these two laws, which are the main pillars of the subject.

If your Lordship shall think this to be a sufficient cause, then it goeth to a perpetual imprisonment of the subject: for in all those causes which may concern the King's subjects, and are applicable to all times and cases, we are not to reflect upon the present time and government, where justice and money floweth, but we are to look what may befall us in the time to come, hereafter.

It must be agreed on all sides, that the time of the first commitment doth outstrip in this return; but by a later warrant from the Lords of the Council, there is a time indeed expressed for the continuing of him in prison, and that appears, but if this shall be a good cause to remand these Gentlemen to prison, they may lie there these seven years longer, and ten years after then, nay, all the days of their lives. And if they sue out a Writ of Habeas Corpus, it is but making a new Warrant, and they shall be remanded, and shall never have the advantage of the laws which are the best inheritance of every subject.

And in Edw. VI. c. 16. the laws are called the great inheritance of every subject, and the inheritance of inheritances, without which inheritance we have no substance.

These are the expressions I desire to offer up to your Lordship touching the return, for the insufficiency of the cause returned, and the defect of the time of the first commitment, which should have been expressed.

I will not labour in objections till they be made against me, in regard the Statute of Writs after prison is so frequent in every man's mouth, that at the Common Law those men that were committed in four cases were not releasable; viz. those that were taken for the death of a man, or the committing of the King, or for Justice for the Forest. I shall speak something to it, though I intend not to spend much time about it, for it toucheth not this case we have in question.

For that is concerning a case of the Common Law, when men are taken by the King's Writ, and not by word of mouth, and it shall be so expressed, as Mr. Stoughton, fol. 73. yet it is nothing to this case, for as I will take the true meaning of that Statute, it extends not at all to this Writ of Habeas Corpus, for the words are plain, they shall be releasable by the common Writ, that is, by the Writ de habeas corpus, directed to the Sheriff to deliver them, if they were bailable: but this shall not be the Sheriff, and he is not to be Judge in it, whether the cause of commitment be sufficient or not, as it appears in Fitz-Herbert, de habeas corpus, and many other places, and not of the very words of the Statute. This is clear, for there be many other causes mentioned, as the taking of a man, the committing of the Justices, &c. in which the Statute is clear, men are not releasable. But will a man conceive that the meaning is, that they shall not be bailed at all, but live in perpetual imprisonment? I think I shall not need to spend time, in that it is so plain, let me but make one inference.

A man is taken de motu hominis, he is not bailable by Writ, saith this Statute; that is, by the common Writ: there was a common Writ for this case, and that was called de adv. &c. as, apparently, Bracton, Cap. 34. That is the Writ issued by the Statute, which is a common Writ, and not a special Writ, but, my Lord, as this Writ de adv. &c. was before the Statute, for it was afterwards taken away by the Statute of 28 Edw. III. cap. 3. But before this Statute, this Writ did lie in the special case, as it sheweth in Co. l. 1. q. 11. re. 1. the Palmer's case, and the first of this Writ was, that the subject might not be too long detained in prison, as till the Justice of Eyre discharged them. So that the Law intended not that a man should suffer perpetual imprisonment, for they were very careful that men should not be kept too long in prison, which is also a liberty of the subject, and, my Lord, that this Court hath bailed upon a false plea of High-Treason, I will offer it to your Lordship, where I shall shew you precedents in these cases of a committal by the Privy-Council, or by the King himself: but before I offer these precedents unto your Lordship, of which there be many, I shall by your Lordship's favour speak a little to the next exception, and that is to the matter of the return, which I find to be per speciale mandatum domini Regis. And what is that? It appears by this Writ, there may be further commands by the King, we find a special command often in our Statute, as in the Statute of Marl. cap. 8. they who were imprisoned Rege shall not be delivered without the special command of our Lord the King. And in Bracton, de Abolitione, the last chapter, where it appears that the King's commandment for imprisonment is by special Writ, so by Writ again men are to be delivered, for in the case of Rege, or Rege, if it shall be removed by a Carta, that is by a special Writ so Rege persons. So that by this appears, that by the King's commandment to imprison, and to deliver in those cases, is understood this Writ, and so it may be in this case which we have heard.

And this return here is a special Mandatum; it may be understood to be under some of the King's Seals, 42 Ass. and ought to be delivered; and will you make a difference between the King's command under his seal, and his command by word of mouth? What difference there is, I leave it to your Lordship's judgment, but if there be any, it is the more material that it should be expressed what manner of command it was, which doth not here appear; and therefore it may be the King's command by Writ, or his command under his seal, or his command by word of mouth alone. And if there is any of these commands of an higher nature than the other, doubtless, it is that the Writ, or under seal, or by word of mouth, and in their the person may be bailed, and why not in this? As to the legal form, admitting there were falsitudes in the return, yet there wants legal form; for the Writ of Habeas Corpus is the commitment of the King to the Keeper of the prison, and thereupon they are to make reason both of the body, and of the cause of the commitment, and that cause is to appear of them who are the immediate Officers. And if he doth it by feignation from another, that return is defective in law, and therefore this return cannot be good, for it must be from the Officer himself, and if the cause returned by him be good, it binds the prisoners.

The Warrant of the Lords was but a direction for him; he might have made his return to have been expressly by the King's commandment, there was Warrant for it, I shall not need to put you cases of it; for it is not enough that it seems that he was certified that the commitment was by the King's commandment, but he must of himself return this fact as it was done.

And now, my Lord, I shall offer to your Lordship precedents of divers kinds, upon commitments by the special command of the King, and upon commitments both by the King and the Lords together. And hereafter I conceive, which I submit to your Lordship, that our case will not stand upon precedents, but upon the fundamental laws and Statutes of this Realm; and though the precedents look the one way or the other, they are to be brought back unto the laws by which the Kingdom is governed. In the fifth of Henry VIII. Re. Parl. c. 1. one Harris was committed to the Marshalsea by the command of the King; and being removed by Habeas Corpus into the Court, the cause returned was, that he was committed per mandatum Domini Regis, and he was bailed.

In the fourth of Elizabeth, Thomas Weston was committed to the Marshalsea by the commandment of the Queen, and the Lords of the Council; and being removed by an Habeas Corpus, upon the general return he was bailed.

In 8 Jack, one Croft was committed by the King's commandment, and this being returned upon his Habeas Corpus, upon the examination of this case it doth appear that it was committed, that the return should be amended, or else the prisoner should be delivered.

The precedents concern the commitment by the Lords of the Council, are in effect the same with these where the commitment is, by the reason why the cause of the commitment should not be shewn, holds in both cases, and that is the necessity of fact; and therefore Mr. Stoughton makes the command of the King, and that of the Lords of the Privy-Council, to be both one; and to this purpose, if they speak, he speaks; and if he speaks, they speak.

The precedents that we can shew you, how the subject hath been delivered upon commitment by the Lords of the Council, as in the times of Henry VIII. and in the times of Queen Elizabeth, and Queen Mary, are infinite, as at length of Lizabell, Thomas Lawrence was committed to the Tower by the Lords of the Council, and bailed upon an Habeas Corpus. In the 43rd of Elizabeth, Gahin's case.

In the 28 of Elizabeth, Forbes's case. These were committed to High-Treason, and yet bailed; for in all these cases there must be a conviction at due time, or a deliverance by law.

There be divers other precedents that might be shewn to your Lordship. In 13 Jack, Miles Rowland. In 27 Jack, Re. 155. Richard Brevint's case. In 14 Jack, Sir Thomas Merlyn was committed for Treason to the Tower of London, and afterwards was brought hither, and bailed; and once our case stands upon this return, and yet there is no sufficient cause in law expressed as the return of the detaining this Gentleman; and since those precedents do warrant our proceedings, my humble fear is that this Court is, that the Gentlemen, Sir John Humezburgh, who hath presented tioned his Majesty, that he may have the benefit of the law, and his Majesty hath signified it, it is his pleasure that justice according to the law should be administered at all times in general to all his subjects, and particularly to these Gentlemen, which is their birth-right: my humble suit to your Lordship is, that these Gentlemen may have the benefit of that law, and be delivered from their imprisonment.

Mr. Noy's Arguments of Counsel with Sir Walter Earl at that Time.

May it please your Lordship, I am of Counsel with Sir Walter Earl, one of the prisoners at the bar: the return of this Writ is as those that have been before, they are much of one tenor, and as you have heard the tenor of that, so this Gentlemen coming hither by an Habeas Corpus, I will by your Lordship's favour read the Writ.

My Lord, the first Habeas Corpus beara date the 4th of November, then there is an Alia Habeas Corpus after that, and the tenor thereof is a command to the Warden of the Fleet, quod Habeas Corpus Walteri Earl, coram talis ad subjectionem et respectum ex quo verba ista de se, ordi' curie'. And the Warden of the Fleet, he certifies as your Lordship has heard. May it please your Lordship, I desire as before was desired for the other Gentlemen, that Sir Walter Earl may be also bailed, if there be no other cause of his imprisonment: for if there were a cause certified, and that cause were not sufficient to detain him still in prison, your Lordship would bail him; and it is a man should be in a worse case, when there is no cause certified at all, than would be very hard.

The Writ is, that he should bring the Prisoner coram nobis, before the King, the end of that is ad subjectionem et respectum: now I conceive, that this there be a signification of the King's pleasure to have this Gentlemen imprisoned, yet when the King grants the Writ to bring the prisoner further, ad subjectionem et respectum, his pleasure is, that he have the prisoner let go, if by law he be not chargeable; or otherwise to detain him still in prison, if the case so require it.

I will put your Lordship in mind of a case, and it was Paget, 9 Edw. III. 2. I will cite by the Plowde, because my Book is not paget as other Books are; it is in the case of a Captive.

In that case there was two things considerable: the one that there was a signification of the King's pleasure, and that determined with him the other, that though there was a signification of the King's pleasure before, yet there comes after that a Writ, and that was another signification of the King's pleasure, that the Prisoner shall be brought further ad subjectionem, et subiectum hinc: in punishment, if he have delivered it, or ad subjectionem, to receive his enlargement, and be delivered, if there be no cause of his imprisonment.

And if upon an Habeas Corpus, a cause of commitment be certified, that cause is to be tried here before your Lordship. But if no cause be shown, then the proceeding shall be as it is before of men's captivities, the Court must do that which stands with Law and Justice, and that is to deliver him.

My Lord, I shall be bold to move one word more touching this return: I conceive that every Officer at a Court of Justice must make his return of his prisoner, or of the act of another, and not what he is certified of by another.

But in this case the Warden of the Fleet doth not certify himself, of himself, that this Gentleman was committed to him by the King, but that he was certified by the Lords of the Council, that it was the King's pleasure that he should detain him. But in our case the Warden of the Fleet must certify the immediate cause, and not the cause of the cause, as he doth by this return; Dantes est sub custodia mea per speciale mandatum Domini Regi mihi significatum per Warrantum eorum de Privata Cancilio; that is not the use in law, but he ought to return the primary cause, and not the subsequent cause, as in 31 Edw. III. return, Rex adfuit 87, in a Writ de habeas corpus, against an Abbot, the Sheriff returns, that he hath sent to the Bailiff of the Abbot, and he delivered him, that the party was the Abbot's villain, and to be so not deliver him; that is held an insufficient return, and a new cause is granted. But if the Sheriff had returned, that the Abbot did certify that he had been good; but he must not return what is certified him by another.

In one of the precedents that hath been cited, as in Perley, 22 Hen. VIII. there the Guardian of the prison certifies, The Parker detinetur sub custodia mea per mandatum Domini Regi mihi significatum per Robertum Peck; now our case is by the assent of many, but as law major: Et minus est nocere in finibus, the certification of one of many is of the same effect, although in moral understanding there may be a difference.

Trin. 4 Edw. III. 2. 45. in this Court on 21 Edw. III. in the printed Book there is a piece of it: the Abbot of Bath brings a petition into this Court, the Bishop of Norwich pleaded in bar of that, Spod mihi significatum quod certior in finibus, that he is excommunicated; there were two exceptions taken to this case in this precedent, and that both in one case: the first was, that no cause appeared, why he was excommunicated; there may be cause why he should be excommunicated, and that he should be bailed, and there may be cause why the excommunication should not be put on him; for it may be the excommunication was for bringing the petition, which was the King's Writ, and therefore because there was no cause of the excommunication returned, it was ruled that it was not good. The other reason is that upon the Roll, which is made by the King.

Now every man, when he will make a Certificate to the Court, Preceptum subjectionem non alterius signum est de se, he must inform the Court of the immediate act done, and not that such things are told him, or that such things are signified unto him; but that was not done in this case, and therefore it was held insufficient, and so in the case of ours I conceive the Return is insufficient in the form. There is another cause, my Lord, for which I conceive that return is not good.

But first I will be bold to inform your Lordship, touching the Statute of Magna Charta cap. 29. Nadus Rex bene capere vel imprisonare, &c. nec jure suo minus nisi per iudicium legitimum prius sit nisi per legitimum iudicium.

That in this Statute these words in Curiam are inserted out of the printed Books: for it should be so seen in the original edition. For these words per legitimum iudicium, what Legitimum should be, I will not take upon me to conclude, otherwise then I find them to be expounded by Acts of Parliament; and this is, that they are understood to be the process of the law, sometimes by Writ, sometimes by Attachment of the person; but whether speciale mandatum Domini Regi be intended by that or no, I leave it to your Lordship's exposition upon two petitions of the Commons, and answer of the King, in 36 Edw. III. 25. q. and N^o. 20.

In the fifth of them the Commons complain that the great Charter, the Charter of the Forest, and other Statutes were broken, and they desire that for the good of himself and of his people, they might be kept and put in execution, and that they might not be infringed by making an arrest by special command, or otherwise: and the answer was, that the assent of the Lords established and obtained, that the said Charter and other Statutes should be put in execution according to the petition, and that without any disturbance by arrest by special command or otherwise, for it was granted, as it was petitioned.

In the fourth petition, for they were very careful of this matter, and it was necessary it should be so, for it was then an usual thing to take men by Writs passiones de capiti, and many of these words called many Acts of Parliament; and it may be some of these Writs may be shown; and I say in the same year they complained that men were imprisoned by special command, and without indictment or other legal Course of law, and they desired that thing may not be done upon men by special command against the great Charter.

The King makes answer, that he is well pleased therewith: that was the first answer, and for the future he hath added further, if any man be grieved, let him complain, and right shall be done unto him. This, my Lord, is an explanation of the great Charter, as also the Statute of 37 Edward III. 2. 45. is a Commentary upon it, that men would not be committed upon suggestion made to the King, without due proofs of law against them, and so it is enacted twice in our year.

We find more printed Books, as in Hen. VI. Adfuit de factis, Foca, 282. which is a strong case, under favour, as an Adfuit of trespass for cutting down trees. The Defendant saith, That the place where the trees are cut, is parcel of the Manor of B., whereas the King is situate in fee, and that the King did command him to cut them; and the opinion of the Court was, that this was no good plea, without shewing the speciality of the command; and they said, if the King commanded me to arrest a man, and I arrest him, he shall have an action of false imprisonment against me, although it were done in the King's preference.

In 1 Job. 27. 7. 26. 46. it is in print, and there we leave it.

Highly Chief Justice saith, that Sir John Methuen told King Edw. IV. that he could not arrest a man upon suspicion of Felony or Treason, as any of his subjects might, because if he should wrong a man by such arrest, the priors could have no remedy against him, if any man shall stand upon it. Here is a signification of the King's pleasure, not to have the cause of the commitment examined; he hath here another signification of his pleasure by Writ, whereby the party is brought further ad subjectionem et respectum, that he hath made your Lordship judge of that, who is should be objected against this Gentleman, and either to punish him, or to deliver him; and if there be no cause shown, it is to be intended that the party is to be delivered, and that it is the King's pleasure it should be so: and the Writ is a sufficient Warrant for the doing of it, these being no cause shown of the imprisonment. And now, my Lord, I will speak a word to the Writ de habeas corpus, and no other Writ, for that was the common Writ, and the four causes expell'd in this Statute, to-wit: the death of a man, the command of the King, or his Justice, or Sheriff, were excepted in that Writ before that Statute made, or appears Bract 233. so that the Writ was at the Common-Law before that Statute.

It was mentioned to be Leandro Brown's case, so Ellis knows what it is, but it is like to be of the same value as the rest; Procedo in se non servatibus, &c.

And thus, my Lord, I have gone through those precedents that were assigned to me before your Lordship; and now I will come to those precedents that were brought to me, and not mentioned here.

The first was John Brown's case, in 22 H. VIII. My Lord, these precedents came not to me before Leandro Brown's case, about candle-lighting; and yesterday was no time fitting to search out precedents, and how could I then search for this?

The next was William Roper's case, of the same time. But the cause is expressed to be for disruption of Felony, which is a cause within the jurisdiction of this Court.

Neaper's case was the next, in 14 & 5 Phil. & Mar. and so was Thomas Leaver's case, of Ellis, and John Herriot's case, 5 Edw. which was for disruption of Felony. Richard Bucknall's case, not Brown's, as was stated, for they have mistaken both names and matters, was committed for James' malicious disseizin Regis, and the Record hath he was hanged. But it was by reason of a letter in the Lords of the Court.

The cause of Four Miles's commitment in the 4 and 5 of Philip and Mary, appears to be for intoxication of Felony and Robbery.

Forster's case, it is true, came with Richard's, and were both for the same thing. In the 13 Edw. VII. our Reverend was committed for disruption of Felony, and it was for a criminal cause, and he was afterwards indicted, and acquitted of all offences.

And there is another precedent thereof, that faith, he was afterwards arraigned, condemned, and hanged; we have the Record of it.

And now, my Lord, I will show these former precedents on the King's side, where most have been committed by the commitment of the King, and by the command of the Council, and have been taken away again by their dissolution; and of this kind there be two in the Tower, that were committed by Warrant, to go to Warrants again for the same thing, were delivered by the officers were against the writ, and so were they.

In the 4th Edw. III. M. 4. Edward de Neuper in Tynne was committed for an offence committed by him in the Forest. And M. 5. John de Neuper was likewise committed for an offence by him done in the Forest; and then he was taken to his home.

M. 20. John de Warr was the like, and there was a letter from the King, Quid faceret in Disruptione ipsius de Foresta Officiis.

They were officers within Habeas Corpus process, and there be several Warrants to hold them.

The Clerk of this Court hath many Records, by which it appears, that many have been committed by the command of the King and of the Queen, and of the Council, and brought their Habeas Corpus, and captured; and that most of them were committed to the same prison, and were removed to the Marshal of this Court: the reason was, for that many of these were to appear here, their causes being brought here; and it would have been a great trouble to send them back to sit to prison as into the County; and therefore they were delivered to the Marshal of the King's household; again, many had their trials in the Court, and were justified, and some were delivered by special command, as they were committed by their commitment.

The number of such of this nature are infinite that have been in our times; we have found many forty precedents of men committed out of the Chancery, and by the High-Commission, for contempt, and abuse by the Barons of the Exchequer, and some in London, that have been brought hither by Habeas Corpus.

Of this I shall say no more, but in the 1st Tynne, there was a private commitment to Leaver, made between the whole Barons, that they might have one by another, and the one was to make the other's liberty; and for some time after the commitment, the one was committed to prison, as Thomas Herriot's case, and Leaver's case, they had a Habeas Corpus, and the cause was shown to be against the said Commitment, and the reason the prisoners were sent back to Leaver, to abide the order of the Mayor, for my Lord, this Court hath been very careful not to examine the Deeds of the Chancery, or Court of Requests, but have only looked whether the cause is within the jurisdiction of this Court, nor have they called in Justice Waller's and other considerations of Law, but they find them back to the Court of Justice that committed them.

And hath this Court been careful of these infirm Courts to this which is the case; and when the King, who is the Head of Justice, shall commit a man, shall not they be careful to do the like Justice to him? But when we have taken them, The commitment was by my Warrant and Commission, and I was careful of this, and whether this commitment be good or no? I hope you will not.

And now, my Lord, I shall say some precedents which have been taken out of the Tower, and I shall make it appear, that as they have been committed by the King or Council, so they had Warrants also to discharge them; and my Lord, are two ancient Records, the first is H. VII. Rot. 6. the other, Rot. 73. The first was Thomas Brown's case, he was committed to the Tower by per execution dissonis Regis, & alibi verba de capiti; and afterwards, the Records say, Deus non Rex quod Causa solvitur mandata Regis, not be worthy led, and there it lay by it.

My Lord, I will conclude, I could be infinite in this kind of precedents, but through the want of your Lordship's knowledge, what right or precedents, it is not enough to show this was done, but also to show the reason why it was done. I will shew your Lordship no longer, but if any man shall shew me that there is any precedent be truly proved which is fit to be touching the Record or Statute, I can say no more, but that the Statute has been used, and the Warrant is truly proved out to be sent to your Lordship.

I shall say no more, but I shall say in this case, to answer the last rather than the first, it is to be of the same value, this may be a cause of great damage to the whole of England, who shall make it appear that they have been committed by the King or Council, so they had Warrants also to discharge them; and my Lord, are two ancient Records, the first is H. VII. Rot. 6. the other, Rot. 73. The first was Thomas Brown's case, he was committed to the Tower by per execution dissonis Regis, & alibi verba de capiti; and afterwards, the Records say, Deus non Rex quod Causa solvitur mandata Regis, not be worthy led, and there it lay by it.

My Lord, I English it not, for I apply it to the case, and may make use of it as he pleases; and so I conclude it to be of the same value, and manner of the reason, which I refer to your Lordship's judgment, whether it is fit to be returned that these words, per execution dissonis Regis, be not sufficient. And for the matter, whether it is fit to be returned, I shall not build it, I have showed your Lordship, that by the first of all, these are not sufficient, but have been remanded back.

And the next I pray your Lordship, that these Gentlemen may be committed, and left to go to the right way, for the first of all, which is by a petition to the King. Whether it is a Petition of right or of grace, I know not, it may be, I am sure, to the King, in which I am partially and stand that these Gentlemen did never yet present any Petition to him that came to his knowledge.

L. C. Justice. My Attorney, this much we may say to you, you have taken a great deal of pains, you having had so short a time to consider of this case, it is a deal of every great weight and expectation, and we do not intend that you shall expect long for our resolution, for that the Gentlemen are in prison, and desire no doubt to know where they must trust; I hope we shall resolve according to the reason of former times, and according to our consciences; but this I must tell you, as I did that that argued, you must bring in your precedents, for though we have face some of them, yet some of them we do not fear, therefore we desire that your precedents you have mentioned on the King's part, for we intend to meet this afternoon, and you shall have our opinions tomorrow, and I must tell you on the other side, that this case being of such weight, Counsel should be wary how they speak any thing to us, or to the Court.

Touling such precedents as you argue as former times, and we have them for such a great weight and expectation, for you have not only told us of such things as be shown, I speak it to the purpose, and to prejudice the cause, so to deliver my opinion, which it comes me not, but in this, that Counsel should be careful, and this I desire, more is matter, that the precedents themselves that lead to another case, if they were committed.

The 1st now goes away, you shall not be long in expectation, we will meet this afternoon, and we will see our opinions tomorrow.

My Lord. We desire that Mr. Attorney may bring the precedents of 34 Elizabeth with him.

Mr. Attorney. I will show you the 1st, but my Lord, I shall be held to stand the present of this place, as the King's Counsel, where the King's Attorney, with such a, there shall be no more, next after that, but if you ask to see any thing, you shall have it.

L. C. Justice. It is not we are at, that time and night now appear, and let us finish the one or the other part, but it is not desired to make use of by way of reply, but for the sake of the cause.

Mr. Attorney. My Lord, for the precedents I cited, I did think they should have been brought and read in the Court, that your Lordship might be there.

L. C. Justice. You shall need no Apology, the Records and Precedents shall be brought to the Court, and read openly, for the Court will not wrong you, and you shall for the difference between them, and your relation of them, nor you will not wrong us with your written version.

ON Thursday, the twenty-eighth of November, Michaelmas, 34 Elizabeth, Chief Justice Hall, Justice Dunning, Justice Tynne, and Justice Widdowes on the King's side, but John Greke, Sir Walter Earl, Sir John Herriot, and Sir Leonard Hopton on the Bar.

L. C. Justice. I am sure you have expected the resolution of the whole Court, as touching yesterday's case, and you shall have it.

But as a case of great weight and expectation, and it had been fit we should have taken more time, but we have not time, and it is not fit that we should say no more to you for this case, but we shall know what you shall think, I am sure you expect it, since then we are, and I shall say no more to you, but I do Justice to all men according to our best skill and knowledge, for it is our duty and duty to be done, and I am sure there is nothing fit, excepted of us. We are sworn to maintain all Privileges of the King, that is one branch of our oath; and we are likewise sworn to administer Justice equally to all people.

We cannot, I tell you, deliver in full our arguments, and give the judgments of every one of us touching this case, as the way is thereof required; but we have not time to do so, and we have duly and formally considered of it, and of all that which has been spoken on either side, and we are agreed to a resolution, and my Brothers have agreed to deliver to you the resolution of the whole Court, and there is nothing fit to be delivered in my mouth, it is the resolution of the whole Court, I hope I shall not mislike the thing of their intention in so delivering; but I do, you are fit here by me, and I shall not take it ill if they say, let us.

Therefore I must tell you, there hath been many good learnedly spoken at the Bar, which we shall not touch, or give our Resolution upon, but send our resolution to the Bar in judgment here.

These three Statutes, as for example, the Statute of Magnum Charta, 28 E. III. and 35 E. III. and the Statute of Witchamere, and do other Statutes that have been made, and particularly a printed of, we acknowledge and resolve, that they are not Law, and that they be of force; but the last of them of which is most belongs not to us, for we are sworn to another power, and though the meaning of them broken to the use of the oil, yet our judgment shall be the same, for the which is now to be judged by us in this, Whether our that is committed by the King's authority, and so cause the red of his commitment, coming as this, it is upon this return, whether we ought to deliver him out, or to send him back again? Whether you must know this, your Counsel I will tell you, we can take notice only of the return, when the case appears to come to us in return, than by the return, we are not bound to search the truth of the return, but the sufficiency of it, for there is a great difference between the false, and the truth.

We cannot judge upon rumors or reports, but upon that which is set forth as returned, and therefore the Return is considerable by us, while it be sufficient or not.

The exceptions which have been taken to this Return were two: the one for the form, the other for the substance.

Vide this Record in Mr. Ballou's Argument in the Case, at, 3 of 4 Carole Regu, and to all the rest pages.

should have been better from them in that behalf, and you say they were bailed.

Ans. The Record in Mr. Sides's affidavit.

Now you shall for the direction to bail him, he was bailed by the direction from the Lords of the Council, as appears by their letter. Fide as aforesaid.

Now we come to Croft's case, in 8 Janu. you argued that to this purpose: you say he was committed to the Marshal, who upon a Habeas Corpus returned, that he was committed per specialem mandatum domini Regis, and you say, because the return was to general, the rule of the Court was, that it should be amended, or else he should be discharged. I will open to you what the reason of that rule was, for that notice was taken, that the Keeper of the prison had said a false return, and had usurped the name of the King; I know not how, but the commitment was not by the King's command, and that was the cause that he had a day given him to amend his return, but his lady was remanded in prison, as you shall see by the Record. Fide the Record, Life.

I be left you to say that you used, was that of Sir Thomas Molyneux, and that was to notice you, and to say, that I marvel that was offered at all, it might be judgment of all the rest, that was to no purpose; and now I have omitted none you brought me. Fide the Record.

By this Record you may see that he was committed by direct Lords of the Council, and it was for the suggestion of the death of Sir Ysa. Ch. Henry, and it is notoriously known, that he was brought hither to plead his pardon.

I will not tell you that you read all the precedents, for you read them, but argue them here before us, but we required you to bring them in, and they were brought to us, Mr. Croft brought them all but one, and that Mr. N. H. brought, it was in the 22 Hen. VIII. Parker's case; and our Mr. Holmes, a man whose face I never saw before, nor is he now in my memory, did rehearse being us one precedent to this purpose, and it was Sir Ysa. Ch. Henry's case, in 7 Ysa. he was committed to the Castle, and upon a Habeas Corpus, the Keeper returned that Commissio fuit per Directionem Domini de Prædicto Consilio, upon return ignitur in hoc verbo, viz. To the Keepers of the Castle, et cetera. Fide Mr. Sides's precedents, but the upon what ground he was bailed, it was a special command of the Lords of the Council. Fide the Record.

These are all the Records and Precedents that you mislead us to in your argument, and that were delivered unto us, for I have dealt faithfully with you; and now you have seen them in the case, I would have any man judge of the conclusion which you made the last day, then when a man is committed, and the case not known, but it is testified to be by the King's special commandment, and the Habeas Corpus is procured by yourselves and spread by the King, that we can discharge or bail them.

Then the precedents are all against you every one of them, and what shall guide us in this point, since there is nothing alleged in this case but process in 7 Hen. VIII. in case of the commitment be expressed, it is to be presumed to be for matter of State, which we cannot take notice of; you see we find none, not one, that hath been delivered by bail in the like cases, but by the hand of the King or his direction.

If we should take here, you see you have thrown nothing to bat spes, and we know that you that be of their Council, will satisfy your Conscience therein.

But you shall see that we have taken a little pains in this case, and we will show you these precedents on the other side, and I believe there be five hundred of this nature, that may be cited to this purpose. I shall go retrograde, and go backwards in citing the years of the precedents that I shall mention.

I will begin with 7 H. VIII. Edward Poper, he was brought hither by the Steward of the Marshal, who returned that he was committed per mandatum domini Regis, and he was remitted, so that he was not delivered upon this general return, but he was remitted.

The next was in 16 H. VII. these you shall see a precedent where one was committed, his name was Thomas Joy, he was committed for felony, and also per mandatum domini Regis, and the King's Attorney came hither and returned the King's command, and thereupon he was bailed.

Mr. Nayr. It is all one with Parker's case.

L. C. Joy. No; for here were two cautes of the commitment, Holmes was then the King's Attorney, and he signified in open Court that he was discharged by the King's command, and Ejusque traher in habeas per specialem mandatum.

The next was Humphrey Brach, 9 H. VII. Ret. 14. you shall find it much to that purpose as the other was before; he was imprisoned for an outwary, and by the commitment of the King also, and after that the release of the King's commandment was certified to the Chief-Justice, he was thereupon discharged. Fide the Record.

The next in 7 H. VII. Thomas Brown, Ysa. Redding, Rufus Harston and others, were committed per mandatum domini Regis, and for felony, outwary, and other causes, as appears by the Records, and after the King released his commandment, and that the outwary should be reversed, and for the felony he was bailed. Fide the Record.

So that you may see the offences mentioned in the Warrant for the commitment were eligible here, and when the King released his commandment they were bailed for the rest, but they that were committed by the commandment of the King were released by the King.

In 7 H. VII. the case of William Bartholomew, Henry Carr, William Gyles, and others, it is to the same effect, by all which you may see, that while the King released his commandment, they were bailed for the rest, and as they were committed by the King's commandment, so they were released by the King's command.

Now have I told trouble you with no more precedents, and you see your own what conclusion they produce. And as to these Strong precedents alleged on the other side, we are not wiser than that they were before us; and the common custom of the law is, the Common Law of the land, and that hath been the continual common custom of the law, to which we are to submit, for we cannot not to change the law, but to submit to it.

As I have looked upon that precedent that was mentioned by Mr. Attorney; the resolution of all the Judges of England, in 34 Edw. We have considered of the time, and I think there were not but two, not have been since, more upright Judges than they were, Way was one, and Andrieux another; in Edw. Terms this was certified under the hands of all the Judges of England, and Barons of the Exchequer in a duplicate, whereof the one was delivered to the Lord-Chancellor, and the other to the Lord-Treasurer, to be delivered to the Queen. We have compared our copies, not taking them the one from the other, but bringing them; we have long had them by us together, and they all agree word for word, and that which Mr. Attorney laid, he had out of Judge Andrieux's Book, and it is to this purpose, to omit other things, that it is a man be committed by the commitment of the King, he is not to be delivered by a Habeas Corpus in this Court, for we know not the cause of the commitment. Fide this at the latter end of the fifth part of Mr. Sides's argument, as aforesaid.

But the question now is, Whether we may deliver this Gentleman or not? You see what hath been the practice in all the Kings times heretofore, and your own Records, and this resolution of all the Judges heretofore, and what can we do but walk in the steps of our forefathers? If you ask us which way you should be delivered, we shall tell you, we trust not could you.

Mr. Attorney hath told you that the King hath done it, and we trust him in great matters, and he is bound by Law, and he bids us proceed by Law, as we are faine to do, and so in the King; and we make no doubt but the King, if you seek to him, he knowing the cause why you are imprisoned, he will have mercy, but we leave that. If it be Justice we ought to deliver you, we would do so, but upon these grounds, and such Records, and the precedents and resolutions, we cannot deliver you, but you must be content. Now I have mistaken any thing, I desire to be lighted by my Brethren, I have endeavored to give the resolution of us all.

They continued in custody till the eighth of January following, when his Majesty in Council ordered all the imprudent Gentlemen to be released, and Writs being issued about this time for electing Members of Parliament, to meet March the sixth, those Gentlemen who suffered for the Lords, were released in many places. On the eighth of March the House met, and Sir Ysa. Ch. Henry was chosen Speaker. On the tenth, the House forced their Committee, and the next day spent in speaking the Grievances, as Billing of Soldiers, Lawes by Knowledge and Propriety, and the imprisoning certain Gentlemen who refused to lend upon their Assents, who afterwards bringing their Habeas Corpus, were notwithstanding remanded to prison, nor did the House incline to supply his Majesty till these Grievances were redressed.

To which purpose Sir Francis Seymour spoke thus:

THIS is the great Council of the Kingdom, and here (if not here alone) his Majesty may see as a true glass the state of the Kingdom; we are called hither by his Majesty's Writs to give him faithful counsel, such as may stand with his honour, but it is we must do without flattery: we are sent hither by the Command to discharge that trust reposed in us, by delivering up their just grievances, and thus we must do without fear: let us not therefore be like Cambyses's Judges, who being demanded of their King whether it were not lawful for him to do what in itself was unlawful? They, either to please the King, than to discharge their own consciences, answered, that the Perseus Kings might do what they listed. This false flattery tends to mischief, being false for respect both to justice, and to flattery, so fear takes away the judgment: let us not then be possessed with fear or flattery, of corruption the least. For my own part, I shall stand both the one, and speak my conscience with as much duty to his Majesty as any man, but not neglecting the Public, in which his Majesty and the Commons call me in place; but how can we show our Affection, whilst we mislead our fears? or how can we think of giving of Subsidies, till we know whether we have any thing to give or not? For if his Majesty be persuaded by any to take from his subjects what he will, and where it pleaseth him; I would gladly know what we have to give! It's true, it is all with those subjects that shall give laws to their Princes, and as all with those Princes which shall use force with their laws; that thus hath been done, appeareth by the billings of Soldiers, a thing no way advantageous to his Majesty's service, but a burden to the Commonwealth, it shall appear by the bill of Money against an Act of Parliament. Again, Mr. Speaker, what greater proof can there be of this, than the imprisonment of certain Gentlemen for the Loans, who if they had done the contrary for fear, their fault had been as great as theirs that were the prisoners in it; and to countenance these proceedings, hath it not been resolved (or rather printed) in our Pulpit, that all we have to do is the King's, Thy Obedience thy time-reckoner, they forsake their own functions, and turn ignorant Statute-men: we see how willing they will be to exchange a good Conscience for a Bellsopstick; and (Mr. Speaker) we see how easy it is for a Prince, how full and good to wit, to be abused, in regard he must see with other men's eyes, and hear with other men's ears. Let us not flatter his Majesty, it is too apparent to all the World, the King and people suffer more than ever before, his Majesty in his Affairs abroad, and his People in their estates at home: I hope I will know the reason of all this? Let us look backe the actions of former Princes, and we shall find that these Princes have been in greater wealth and extremity more exalted most of these subjects, and most unadvised in the choice of their Ministers, and to have failed most in their counsels, happy is that Prince that hath those that are faithful to his Council. This which his Majesty wanted in the management of his Affairs concerning France and Spain, I am sure, was his want of faithful Council to advise the reason in place, a Prince is brought by manifold and wide Council; I would I could truly say, such have been employed abroad. I will con-

* Mr. Walsley in his Memorials of the English Affairs, Page 2. (Edw. 12.) Sals. "One of the imprudent Gentlemen, by Habeas Corpus were brought to the King's Bench, and (by their Councils advice) took exceptions to the Return, for that it had not the cause of their Commitment, but of their Discharge as Prisoners, per specialem mandatum Regis." Nayr, Sides, Bromfield, Gardiner and others, who were out of Court for the Petition, joined they might be released and discharged.

Walsley the King's Attorney, in another day argued in maintenance of the Return. Walsley, Chief Justice, defended the opinion of the Court, that the Return was just and obligatory to the King's special commandment, and the suggestion of it by the Lords of the Council is only to transfer the Cause. And that the Habeas Corpus is not to be made in the case of the Imprisonment, but of the Detention in Prison, that the matter of this Return is justifiability, and the Cause is not to examine the truth of the Return, and must not be as it is. So did Petitioners were concerned.

"judged for the heir, and that the gift thereof by the Conqueror was void."

If then it were thus in the Conqueror's time, and by his own sentence and judgment, and hath continued in all the successions of our King's reigns since, what doubt can we have, but that his most excellent Majesty, upon his humble petition proffered at his feet, (which, as was well said, is the best passage to his heart) will vouchsafe unto us one ancient liberty and birth-right, with a thorough consideration of this and other just grievances? And is it humbly ever possible of this honourable House, that I have made a short lesson long.

Upon this and other arguments made in this case of the Hobbs Corpus, the House referred the whole business to a Committee, to examine all the proceedings: concerning which, Mr. Selden afterwards made report to the House, that Mr. Peacock, a Clerk in the Crown-Office, being examined before the Committee, did confess, that by direction from Sir Robert Heath, the King's Attorney-General, he did write the draught of a judgment in the case before-mentioned, which was delivered to Mr. Attorney. And Mr. Kirby being examined before the Committee did confess, that after Mr. Heath left, the Attorney-General withheld him to make a special entry of the Hobbs Corpus: to which, as he answered, he knew no special entry in those cases, but only a Remitter: but said to Mr. Attorney, that if he pleased to draw one, and the Court after should see it, he would then enter it. The Attorney did accordingly make a draught, and the Copy thereof Mr. Kirby produced to the Committee. And further said, that he carried this draught to the Judge, but he would not enter it in a special entry: nevertheless, the Attorney-General divers times told him, and told him there was no remedy, but he must enter it. Yet 2 week before the Parliament met, the Attorney-General called for the draught again, which accordingly he gave unto him, and never heard of it since.

Sir Robert Philips, upon this report, gave his opinion, "That this is indeed judgment in the Hobbs Corpus, with a draught made by some man, thus delivered to strike at our all our liberties, but the Judges justly refused it. But if the Judges did intend it, we fit not here (said he) to enforce the writ, we are first for, if we present not this matter to his Majesty. Let this business be further searched into, and let here this judgment lies against us, and what the Judges do say concerning "the law."

Whereon the House proceeded in further debate of the liberty of the subject. When Sir Harshall resumed the debate of the matter concerning the Hobbs Corpus.

"The law judgment (said he) which lies in law, is only an award, and an judgment; and as the Lord Chief-Justice's argument, there was no writ spoken, that the King might commit or detain without cause."

"For the King to commit a man, is ex officio Regis Mercy and his power flows immediately from the King, Judgment and Justice are his too, but they flow from his Ministers, the sword is carried by force him, but the sceptre is in his hands. There are true emblem of a good King."

"The Law admits not the King's power of detaining in prison at pleasure."

In ancient times prisons were but per vias, carceres are of power, sed ad usum. Admit the King may commit a man, yet to detain him as long as he pleases in dangerous, and then a man shall be punished before his offence. Imprisonment is a satisfaction of the body, and hence to the mind, it is in toto per merit."

Then the House commanded that case in the Lord Chief-Justice's Book, all of his own hand-writing, to be openly read. The words of the Report were these:

Divers personarum fuerunt committes a feveral times a feveral persons, per pleasure facere cum causa punit de quibus essent animes in hunc le

[We hear Majesty's Justice of both Bench, and Barons of the Exchequer, desire your Lordships, that by Letter good means some order may be taken, that his Majesty's Subjects may not be committed or detained in prison by commandment of any Noblemen, or Counsellor against the laws of the Realm, either else help us to have access to his Majesty, to the end to become freer to him for the same, for divers have been imprisoned for long ordinary causes and suits at the Common Law, until they have been constrained to leave the place against their wills, and put the law to order, albeit judgment and execution have been had thereon, to their great indignation etc. for the said of which petitions, her Majesty's Writs haveundry times been directed to sundry persons, having the custody of such persons unlawfully imprisoned, upon which Writs, no good or lawful cause of imprisonment hath been shewed or certified. Whereupon, according to the laws, they have been discharged of their imprisonment, some of which persons to deliver, have been again committed to prison in secret places, and not to any common or ordinary prison, or lawful Officer or Sheriff, or other lawfully authorized, to have kept a Gaol, & that upon complaint made for their detainer, the Queen's Courts cannot tell to whom to direct her Majesty's Writs, and by this means Justice cannot be done. And moreover, divers Officers and Sergeants of Leodes have been many times committed to prison for lawful executing of her Majesty's Writs, fund faith of her Majesty's Courts in Widdowes, and thereby her Majesty's Subjects, and Officers are tormented, that they dare not go or execute her Majesty's Laws, her Writs and Commandments: divers others have been sent for by Parliament, and brought to Leodes from their dwellings, and by unlawful imprisonment have been constrained, not only to withdraw their lawful wives, but have also been compelled to pay the Parliament, for bringing forth person, great sums of money. All which, upon complaint the Judge, are bound by office and oath to relieve and help, by and according to her Majesty's laws. And when it pleaseth your Lordships to will divers of us to sit down in what calls a prisoner, sent so custody by her Majesty as her Council, are to be detained in prison, and not to be delivered by her Majesty's Court or Judges, we think, that if any person be committed by her Majesty's command, from her person, or by order from the Council-board; and if any one or two of her Council commit one for High-Treason, such persons to be in the cases before committed, may not be delivered by any of her Courts, without due trial by the law, and judgment of acquittal had: Nevertheless the Judges may award the Queen's Writ to bring the bodies of such persons before them; and if upon review thereof, the causes of their commitment be certified to the Judges as it ought to be; then the Judges in the cases before, ought not to deliver them; but to remand him to the place from whence he came, which cannot be conscientiously done, unless notice of the cause in general, or of one in special, be given to the Keeper or to other that shall have the custody of such prisoners. All the Judges and Barons did subscribe their names to these Articles, For Petition 34. Edw. and delivered one to the Lord-Chancellor, and another to the Lord-Treasurer: after which time there did follow more quietness than before, in the case before-mentioned.]

After the reading of this Report, Sir Edward Coke said, That of my own knowledge this Book was once with my Lord Arden's own hand, it is no flying report of a young Student. I was Solicitor then, and Treasurer Barthol was as much against commitment: as any of this Kingdom, it was the Barthol that made this libel. Let us draw towards a conclusion: the question is, Whether a Freeman can be imprisoned by the King, without shewing cause? I hear it as late as Rogers's Case, they to it argue against it, Hamer not to be remanded, Barthol, that in case it is, the Common Law has alienated the King's Preerogative, that it would be a prejudice the inheritance of the subject, and the Law gives the Preerogative to that which is taken, it would have been time then, they, the more what would follow. I shall have an Estate of inheritance for life, or for years in my land, or property in my goods, and I shall be content at will for my liberty, I shall have property in my own lands, and not liberty in my person, For person was not for sale. The King, both distributed his judicial power to Courts of Justice, and to Ministers of Justice, it is too low for so great a Monarch as the King is, to commit men to prison; and as against law, it must be held to be committed, and no contrivance. I would not press this, but that I hope my good friend will hear of it; yet it is not I Edward Coke that speaks it, but the Records that speak it. We have a national property Law in this Nation, which is the law.

I was first heard, and testified we live and liberties of the subject first time. Since I came, I look here on oath to defend the King's prerogatives and rights. I profess, that once I was of Council, and now I speak for my try, for the Gentlemen in the Hobbs Corpus, yet now I speak according to my knowledge and common sense.

The question is, whether any subject or Freeman, that is committed to prison, and the cause is not shown, is in the Writs, he ought to be bail or delivered? I think, I could desire it belongs to every subject that is not a Villain that he ought to be bail, or delivered.

I shall speak in this course. 1. I will show the reasons. 2. Acts of Parliament. 3. Precedents. 4. Answer objections.

1. Reasons drawn from three heads.

1. From remedies provided by the Common Law against imprisonment.

For persons that of liberty there are of more remedies, by which it appears, if no law will cause it, further detainer, he is to be delivered. I will not mention the action of habeas corpus, but the Writ of ad idem, which is not taken in law, for that it is in Magistris Charta. That Writ was first to know, if the party imprisoned were committed for any cause of malice and hatred, and that was not to be required in 3 day. For the Writ de habeas corpus, if he is imprisoned upon a writ, the Sheriff, he must be delivered, if he be not detained for a cause for which he is not responsible. For the Hobbs Corpus, the Keeper is to bring the body of judicandum or reipondere. If there be no cause, how can the Court consider of the cause? For appeal, by the old law in the time of Hen. I. one imprisoned might have his appeal, as appears by Bracton, c. 25. lib. de personis. Plato, c. 43.

2. The second reason is from the consideration of Freeman and Villains. All admit we are liberi homines, but do but consider the difference of Villains and Freeman, and I know no difference in their persons, but only the one cannot be imprisoned, as the other may. Whoever can lay I can imprison him, I will say to us a Villain. It is the sole distinction of Freeman, that they cannot be imprisoned at pleasure.

In old time none but Freemen and Villains could be imprisoned, and confined. The Freemen were as free as the Villains of the King, he could send to them to lend money, and if they did not, he imprisoned them.

For matter of punishment. When any thing is declared by any new Statute to be an offence, it goes, That he shall be fined and imprisoned. To what end were this in any Act of Parliament, if imprisonment was at the King's will?

II. For Acts of Parliament, Magistris Charta, c. 19. In that Act when it was first made, it was an act in common animis, 17. lib. de Statute was made, and then it had their words. The course then was to find down all Acts of Parliament and Charters to the Abbey to be enrolled. Magistris Charta, 34. lib. de Statute recites that Charter of 17. lib.

They object in Magistris Charta, there is in terra, and by the law one may be imprisoned.

For answer is the process of law, for the law imprisons no man at all, but it is more the process of law, 3. Edw. III. Upon some occasion it was enacted, I but now be attached contrary to the great Charter and the law of the land. 25. Edw. III. divers were committed to the Tower, and no man knew wherefore, whereupon was 25. Edw. III. made, 28. Edw. III. c. 3. 36. Edw. III. c. 9. an act imprisonment, per personam inducendum.

III. For Precedents, 18. Edw. III. c. 33. Hen. I. Hen. VIII. c. 10.

IV. Objections against it. First, Against the reason, a man may be committed for a point of State that may not be known: I understand not matters of State, I expect not the objection in a Court of Justice, and it may be a word for any King to try the courage of his Judges, and to suppose there is a cause of State, when perhaps there is no cause against to them. It is as if they sent him back to prison, they knew not wherefore; which cannot be in a Court of Justice, where they are sworn to judge.

Secondly, as to the Acts of Parliament, the Judges give no answer, but only contended them; but the Attorney answered them with one blow to strike them all; that they are to be considered for common and ordinary cases, that happen in Windsor-hall only. But do not consider Alagna Clerie, which respects upon the King; an Appel can be made. By the Law, if I bring an Appel of Murder against a Nobleman, who is in my fault, he shall not be tried by his Peers; but if he be indicted for Murder, which is the King's fault, he shall; which shews, that but which is in Alagna Clerie is meant of the King, though it be not in this third Person.

This Objection is against the Statute of Windsor 1. c. 13. But the King's command is the command of the King by his Justice; and also the word, Replevibile, never signifies bailable; bailable is in a Court of Record, by the King's Justice; but replevibile, is by the Sheriff. The Statute is to the Sheriff, and it shews the particular cause, and concludes that the Sheriff shall lose his bailiwick. The Sheriff could never excoise for M. riel, or matters of the Forest; but in the King's Bench or Mares, or matters of the Forest they may, 3. aff. 19. 25. Edw. IV. 25. Hen. VI. 48. Novus. If any may be taken by our command, or by the command of the King, if the Sheriff take the party, he must come to us, we will grant a Writ.

Fourthly, They object against the precedents cited; they are all of this kind, they were supplied per mandatum domini Regis, or Consilii, without cause, or the cause is exposted. When the cause is exposted, and is within the cognizance of the Court, there they hailed them; but when it is for Felony or Treason, it may be done beyond the seas, and then the Court has no cognizance of them. When so cause is set, yet bailment is allowed; then they answer divers were to hailed, but the cause appears by Paper-Books; but I never saw these Books to be Records, and Judges of Record make their judgment in Records, and the cause only appears by Record.

But the Resolution cited 34 Edw. all precedents were read, Acts of Parliament indeed were pulled over, and yet that was not read. As we have that liberty here, I do dare say, no Prince in Christendom doth afford this power to imprison any without any cause. I find no trace or signification of any such power.

Secondly, March 29, 1628. Mr. Sollicitor spoke as followeth:

My care when I spoke last was to give satisfaction that the Judges did not set their law Resolutions; but if they did, it was then pertinent. The Judges know nothing of the cause of the Government's imprisonment; if they had known the cause of their imprisonment in private, they would have appeared to his Majesty for his Grace. For to restrain all the authorities I will not, I have something to say in the point, to put into the scale, which might have been then said, had it not been for the unwelcome difference that might have been between the two Courts in Windsor-hall, the King's Bench and the Chancery Court.

In 13 Jac. divers were committed for disobedience to the Decree of the Court of Chancery, as namely Rafford and others, and it was resolved, That the Judges could not deliver such; and at the same time some were committed by Warrant from the King and the Lords of the Council, and this came in Qualific. Mich. 13 Jac. and continued divers Terms. There was then recourse had to these arguments, and I have a report here of that time what the Judges did then, part whereof I will read.

It was resolved by Coke, Crom, Darbridge and Hargrave, that the return was good, and that the writs need not be dissolved, being per mandatum Consilii, as Arden Regis (and the report followeth) that in 34 Edw. it was resolved accordingly, and by Coke was said, That if the Privy-Council consent, one is not bailable by any Court of Justice, and Stanford's opinion is so, fol. 72. See what opinion the Judge had of the resolution in 34 Edw. and of Stanford.

To this Sir Edward Coke replied: This report moves not me at all; that report is not yet twenty-one years old, but under age, being in 13 Jac. In truth, when I read Stanford, I was of his opinion at the first, but since, looking into these Records before-mentioned, I was of another mind. It brings in an ill time 13 Jac. when there was clashing between the Court of King's Bench and Chancery, as also there were then many of the Traitors that were of the Powder-Treason, committed per mandatum Consilii.

A CONFERENCE desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses, concerning the Rights and Privileges of the Subject.

Sir Dudley Digges.

My Lords, I shall, I hope, sufficiently begin this conference this day, with an observation out of an Holy Story, in the days of good King Jehoiakim (2 Chron. 34.) when the Land was purged of Idolatry, and the great men went about to repair the House of God; while money was sought for, there was found a Book of the Law which had been neglected, and afterwards being presented to the good King, procured the blessing, which your Lordship may read in the Scriptures. (2 Chron. 34.)

My good Lords, I am confident your Lordships will be cheerfully join with the Commons, in acknowledgement of God's great blessing in our good King Jehoiakim, as the King, Citizens, and Burgeses of the House of Commons, by their unwearied cry, do thankfully remember his most religious and truly honorable invitations of them to the late Parliaments, for cleaning this Land from Popish abominations; which I may truly call a necessary and a happy repairing of the House of God. And, to go on with the parallel, whilst we the Commons, out of our good affections, were seeking for money, we found, I cannot say a book of the Law, but many, and those fundamental points thereof neglected and broken, which hath occasioned our desire of this conference; wherein I am fully commended to them to your Lordships in general, that the Laws of England are grounded on reason, more ancient than books, consisting much in common customs, yet so full of justice and true equity, that your most

Upon Monday, April 1, the debate began at seven o'clock. Sir Robert Phelips moved, That considering the House was now ready for the Question, it might have the resolution made, (fall the Judges in 34 Edw. about this matter.)

Then Sir Edward Coke stood up and said, The Clauses of Time was over, and forcing out upon as both retarded us; when I spoke against the Lease and this matter, I expected blows, and indeed that was spoken, though not to the matter.

Cause, saying that (that hath been objected) I did when I was a Judge, I will say I know not. Indeed a man was made, but no argument of debate, or a solution upon advice, I will never publish with any House, there is no Judge that hath an upright heart; I could and a clear heart as the world, but I shall leave Warren to say every thing that he doth. I conclude when I read St. John's 1. c. 13, and had it in my hands, I was of that opinion as the Council I dare say, when I perceived that some Members of this House were taken away, even in the face of this House, and sent to prison, and when I was not off from it, that place myself. I went to my book, and would not be quiet till I had finished my life. Stanford at the first was my guide, but my guide had departed, so, therefore, I moved from it. I have now better guides, Acts of Parliament and other precedents, there are now my guides. I desire to be free from the imputation that hath been laid upon me.

As for the copy of the intended Judgment, I fear, had it not been for this Parliament, I had it in my hand, as this was a Parliament brings Judges and all other men into good order; if any Judge had drawn this draught, he would have done it to a scandal, and there can be no precedent found that warrants it, and therefore I believe that other others did it.

This draught of the judgment, should it be entered, will bring us to death, quis vult capere vitam, eam perdat, and it seems that it appears to be by the Records. I posted myself till, Attorney drew it; I had a copy of my Lord Arden's report of the Judges' resolution, 34 Edw. long ago, but I don't recollect it (and it was in that copy) for that it was Apocryphal, and did not deliver his sanity that made it, and yet it was cited in the King's Bench. That all the Judges of England read it.

Then the House of Commons came to the following Resolutions.

Resolved upon the questions, Memor. contrahentes.

I. That no Freeman ought to be detained or kept in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King or Privy-Council, or by other, unless some cause of the commitment, detainer, or restraint be exposted, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained.

II. That the Writ of Habeas Corpus may not be denied, but ought to be granted to every man that is committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained, though it be by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, he praying for the same.

III. That if a Freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise restrained by the command of the King, the Privy-Council, or any other, no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint being exposted, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained, or restrained, and the same be returned upon Habeas Corpus, granted for the said party; then he ought to be delivered or bailed.

And then taking into consideration the Property of the Subject in his goods, they came to this Resolution, to which there was not a negative; viz.

That it is the ancient and indubitable Right of every Freeman, that he have a full and absolute property in his goods and estate; that no Tax, Tallage, Loan, Benevolence, or other like charge ought to be commanded or levied by the King, or any of his Ministers, without common consent by Acts of Parliament.

The Commons having shewed their Care of the Subjects in the Liberty of their Persons, and Property in their Goods, did now prepare to transmit their resolutions to the Lords for their concurrence, and several Members were appointed to manage a conference with the Lords concerning the same; and Monday, April the 7th, the conference was held, and opened by Sir Dudley Digges.

honourable Predecessors and Ancestors many times propounded them with a solemn matter; and so ancient, that from the Saxon days, notwithstanding the injuries and ruins of time, they have continued in most parts the same, as may appear in old remaining monuments of the Laws of Edward, the first Christian King of Brit. the King of the West-Saxons, Offa of the Mercians, and of Alfred the great Monarch, who united the Saxon Kingdoms, while Laws are yet to be seen, published, as those that, by Parliament, as he lives to that end, Ubi sit sit regis, sit sua lege regem. And though the book of Edward, speaking of the troublesome times of the Saxons, says that then Ubi sit sit regis, sit sua lege regem, Ubi sit sit regis, sit sua lege regem, yet, by the blessing of God, a good King Edward, commonly called St. Edward, did awake those Laws, and as the old words are, Restituit, repositit, repositit decreta, decreta confirmavit. Which arguments shew, that good King Edward did not give such Laws, which William the Conqueror, and all his Successors, since that time have been since.

And here, my Lords, by many cases frequent in our modern Laws, disagreeing concerning with those of the ancient Saxon Kings, I might, if time were not precious, demonstrate that our Laws and Customs were the same.

* De Heredit. Mat. sit. Title to make a Motion. Yesterday a learned Argument was made by Mr. Sollicitor, and Sir Zach. I was cited by him, which makes clearly for the Subject, also for that Johanna party. I am sure that Johanna party of Johanna party. And Johanna party of Johanna party. By the Law of the Empire were to be committed those thirty days, and the Order is under a penalty to certify the cause of the Privilege's commitment; and if the Order be such, he is to be held. When they speak before the Judgment given to the King's Bench, they say the Precedents were not read. Let a Sub-committee search out those judgments and Precedents. I heard here a question, and there is nothing to be considered. The Cause of the Office is to enter process, &c. and that is all they be delivered by Law, and is all the Judgment that can be. Ex Mili. Zephania. See Advers. lib. in his Works.

1. Coke was then a Judge, and is Errol at Court.

2. Coke of one mind, when a Judge, and is Errol; of another, when out of Court, and disinterested.

he were delinquent, or not, or not. 2. Is ignis expressly, that he was brought thither, and brought in an Adiutor of it, as another Man's fault, no defect of his own, is so delivered, or bailed, and then if he were remanded, it is as we say, manifest to the question in hand. But that which is most relied upon, is the opinion of Steynf in his Book of Pleas of the Crown, lib. 8. cap. 13. fol. 72. 73. in his Chapter of Mainprize, where he reciteth the statute of Witton, l. c. 15. and then saith thus. "By this statute it is appointed, that in four cases the Common Law a Man was not repleviable, 1. to wit, those that were taken for the death of a man, by the command of the King, or his Justices, or for the French;" thus far he is well right. Then he saith, "and 2. As to the command of the King, that it is understood by the command of his own mouth, or his Council, which is interpreted in two, and spoke with his mouth, or otherwise every Wit or Captain to take a man, which is the King's command, would be as much; and 3. to the command of the Justices, that is meant that it is a delate commitment, for if it be by their ordinary commitment, he is repleviable by the Sheriff, if it be not in some of the cases prohibited by the Statute."

The answer that I give unto this is, that Steynf had said nothing whether a man may be committed without such by the King's command, or whether the Justices ought not to bail him in such case, only that such a case is not repleviable, which is agreed for that he is well right. And because no man should think he meant any such thing, he concludes the whole sentence touching the command of the King and the Justices, that one committed by the ordinary command of the Justices, is repleviable by the Sheriff, or at least it appears not that he meant that a man committed by the Justices, and he hath given no opinion in this case what he would have said, if he had been asked the question, cannot be known, neither doth it appear, that by any thing that he hath said, he meant any such thing, as would be inferred out of him. And now, my Lords, I have performed the commands of the Commons, and as I move shall clear the delation of personal liberty, an ancient and undoubted right, furnished with seven Acts of Parliament, and not repeated by any Statute or Authority of Law whatsoever. So Luttrell is repeated after Mr. Selden.

Mr. Selden's Argument.

MY LORDS, Your Lordships have heard from the Gentleman that last night, a great part of the grounds upon which the House of Commons, upon mature deliberation, proceeded to their resolution touching the right of the liberty of their persons. The many Acts of Parliament, which are the written Laws of the Land, and are expressly in the point, have been read and opened, and such objections as have been by some made to them, and some objections also made out of another Act of Parliament, have been cleared and answered. It may seem now perhaps (my Lords) that little remains (needful to be further added, for the enforcement and maintenance of so fundamental and established a right and liberty belonging to every Freeman of the Kingdom. But in the examination of questions of Law of Right, besides the Laws or Acts of Parliament, that ought chiefly to direct and regulate every man's judgments, whatsoever hath been put in practice to the contrary, there are commonly used also former judgments, or precedents, of Law, and of Acts of Parliament, both been laid by, and relations have been made, and that in this very point, only upon the interpretation and apprehension of precedents. Precedents, my Lords, are good modes, or proofs of illustration or confirmation where they agree with the express Law; but they can never be proof enough to overthrow any one Law, much less seven several Acts of Parliament, as the number of them is for the point. The House of Commons therefore taking into consideration, that in this question, being of so high a nature, that never any exceeded it in any Court of Justice whatsoever, all the several ways of just examination of the truth should be used, have also most carefully examined themselves of all former judgments and precedents concerning this great point either way, and have been so less careful of the due prosecution of his Majesty's just Prerogative than of their own Rights. The precedents here are of two kinds, either merely matter of Record, or else the former resolutions of the Judges, after solemn debate in the point.

This point that concerns precedents, the House of Commons have commanded me to present to your Lordships, which I shall as briefly as I may, lay I do it faithfully and perspicuously. To that end, my Lords, before I come to the particulars of any of those precedents, I shall first remember to your Lordships, that which will seem as a general key for the opening and true apprehension of all these Records, without which key, no man, unless he be very in the nature and course of the King's Bench, can possibly understand them.

In all cases, my Lords, where any Right or Liberty belongs to the Subjects by any positive Law written or unwritten, if there were not also a remedy by Law, for the enjoying or regaining this Right or Liberty, when it is violated or taken from him, the positive Law were well vain, and to no purpose; and it were to no purpose for any man to have any Right in any land or other inheritance if there were not a known remedy, that is, an Adiutor or Writ, by which, in some Court of ordinary Justice, brought recover it. And in this case of Right of Liberty of Person, if there were not a remedy in the Law for regaining it, when it is violated, it were of no purpose to speak of Laws, that ordain it should not be violated. Therefore in this case also, I shall first show you the remedy that every Freeman is to use for the regaining of his Liberty, when he is against Law imprisoned, that is upon the legal course and form to be held in using that remedy, the precedents or judgments upon it, for all Judgments of Record life out of this remedy, may be easily understood. There are in Law diverse remedies for violating of a Freeman imprisoned, as the Writs of Adiutor Adiutor, and of Habeas Corpus, besides the common or most known Writs of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum causa, as it is also called.

The first two Writs are so to be directed to the Sheriff of the County, and he in some particular cases, or in which it would be suitably for me to trouble your Lordships, because they concern not that which is committed to my charge. But that Writ of Habeas Corpus, or Corpus cum causa, is the highest remedy in Law, for it is writ that is imprisoned, and the only remedy for him that is imprisoned by the special command of the King, or the Lords of the Privy Council, who have power of the commitment; neither is there in the Law any such thing, as was there ever committed of any such thing in the Laws of this land, as a Person of Right to be imprisoned in such cases for Liberty of the Person, nor is there any legal course for enlargement to be taken in such case, if howsoever the contrary hath upon no ground or colour of Law been pretended. Now, my Lords, if any man be so imprisoned by any such command, or otherwise, in any prison whatsoever through Exigat, and define by himself, or any other in his behalf, this Writ of Habeas Corpus for the purpose in the Court of King's Bench, the Writ is so to be granted to him, and ought not to be denied him, no otherwise than another ordinary original Writ in the Chancery, or other common process of Law may be denied; which amongst other things the House resolved also, upon mature deliberation, and I was commanded to let your Lordships know to such. This Writ is directed to the Keeper of the prison, in whose custody the prisoner remains, commanding him that after a certain day, he bring in the body of the prisoner, and deliver it up to the judge, justis quodcumque confiderentur, et sic cum causa capere et detinere, et aliter non cum causa detinere only, capere is being committed.

The keeper of the prison therefore returns by what Warrant he detains the prisoner, and what reason he hath for it, brings the Prisoner to the Bar at the time appointed; when the matter is thus made, the Court judges of the sufficiency or insufficiency of it, only out of the body of it, without having respect unto any other thing whatsoever; that is, they suppose the return to be true whatsoever it be. If it be false, the prisoner may have his action on the Case against the Keeper that brought him. Now, my Lords, when the prisoner comes thus to the Bar, if he desire to be bailed, and that the Court upon the view of the return think him in Law to be bailable, then he is always first taken from the Keeper of the prison that brings him, and committed to the Marshal of the King's Bench, and afterwards bailed, and the entry perpetually in Commissio Magistratus et justiciarius in Roll for the Court never bailing him, until he first becomes their own prisoner, and is in Carcer Magistratus of that Court. But if upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, it appear to the Court, that the prisoner ought not to be bailed, nor discharged from the prison whence he is brought, then he is remanded or sent back again, there to continue, until by course of Law he may be delivered; and the entry in this case is Remittitur carceris francigenis legem deliberatam juris, or Remittitur carceris juris, which is all one, and the highest act or judgment that ever was or can be given upon an Habeas Corpus. But if the Judges doubt only whether in Law they ought to take him from the prison where he came, or give a day to the Sheriff to amend his Writ, as often they do, then they remand him only during the time of their doubt, or until the Sheriff hath amended his return, and the entry upon that is Remittitur only, or Remittitur prisonis post, without any more. And to remittitur generally it is of less moment in the award upon the Habeas Corpus, than remittitur prisonis, &c. howsoever the vulgar opinion raised out of the late Judgment be to the contrary. All these things are of most known and common use in the Court of King's Bench, as it cannot be doubted but your Lordships will easily know from the grace and learning of my Lords the Judges.

These two courses, the one of the entry of Commissio Magistratus et justiciarius in Roll, and the other remittitur prisonis, &c. is remittitur generally, or remittitur prisonis post, together with the nature of the Habeas Corpus, thus stated it will be easier for me to open, and your Lordships to believe, whatsoever shall occur to the purpose in the precedents of Record, so which I shall come now in the particulars. But before I come to the precedents, I am to let you know the resolutions of the House of Commons touching the releasing of a man committed by the command of the King, or the Privy Council, or any other, without cause showed of such commitment. It is thus, That if a Freeman be committed or detained in prison, or otherwise released by the command of the King, the Privy Council, or any other, and no cause of such commitment, detainer, or restraint be expressed, for which by Law he ought to be committed, detained or restrained; and the same be returned upon an Habeas Corpus granted for the party, then he ought to be delivered and bailed.

This resolution, as it is grounded upon the Acts of Parliament already shewn, and the reason of the Law of the Land, which is committed to the charge of another, and soon also to be opened to you, is strengthened also by many Precedents of Record.

But the Precedents of Record that concern this point are of two kinds, for the House of Commons hath informed itself of such as concern in either way. The first, I shall shew expressly, that Persons committed by the command of the King, or of the Privy Council, without other cause showed, have been enlarged upon bail when they prayed it, whence it appears clearly, that by the Law, they are bailable, and by the Habeas Corpus to be let at liberty. For tho' they ought not to have been committed without a cause showed of the commitment, yet it is true that the reversed Judges of this Land did pay respect to such commitments, by the command of the King, or of the Lords of the Council, (as also to the commitment of some of inferior persons) that upon the Habeas Corpus, they rarely used officiously to discharge the persons indubitably, but only to enlarge them upon bail, which is manifestly against the Liberty of the Subject, according to the Laws that your Lordships have already heard, not in any of the cases is there any difference made between such commitments by the Lords of the Council, that are incorporated with him. The second kind of precedents of Record are, such as have been presented to prove the Law to be contrary, and that person to be committed ought not to be let at liberty upon bail, and are in the nature of objections out of Record.

I shall deliver them hither to your Lordships with all truth, and also true copies of them; out of which it shall appear clearly to your Lordships, that of those of the first kind, there are no less than twelve, most full and directly in the point, to prove that persons to be committed are to be delivered upon bail; and amongst those of the other kind, there is not so much as one, not one, that proves at all any thing to the contrary. I shall first, my Lords, go through them of the first kind, and in observe them to your Lordships, that such examples as have been made upon them by some that that is, the other, clears this.

So far as I know, Page 7 H. VII. Ret. 13, John Remond's case is the same in all ways with those other two, and the self-same answer still satisfies. (1877, 1878, 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887, 1888, 1889, 1890, 1891, 1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896, 1897, 1898, 1899, 1900, 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, 1905, 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, 1914, 1915, 1916, 1917, 1918, 1919, 1920, 1921, 1922, 1923, 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, 1928, 1929, 1930, 1931, 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935, 1936, 1937, 1938, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, 1944, 1945, 1946, 1947, 1948, 1949, 1950, 1951, 1952, 1953, 1954, 1955, 1956, 1957, 1958, 1959, 1960, 1961, 1962, 1963, 1964, 1965, 1966, 1967, 1968, 1969, 1970, 1971, 1972, 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976, 1977, 1978, 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, 1983, 1984, 1985, 1986, 1987, 1988, 1989, 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994, 1995, 1996, 1997, 1998, 1999, 2000, 2001, 2002, 2003, 2004, 2005, 2006, 2007, 2008, 2009, 2010, 2011, 2012, 2013, 2014, 2015, 2016, 2017, 2018, 2019, 2020, 2021, 2022, 2023, 2024, 2025, 2026, 2027, 2028, 2029, 2030, 2031, 2032, 2033, 2034, 2035, 2036, 2037, 2038, 2039, 2040, 2041, 2042, 2043, 2044, 2045, 2046, 2047, 2048, 2049, 2050, 2051, 2052, 2053, 2054, 2055, 2056, 2057, 2058, 2059, 2060, 2061, 2062, 2063, 2064, 2065, 2066, 2067, 2068, 2069, 2070, 2071, 2072, 2073, 2074, 2075, 2076, 2077, 2078, 2079, 2080, 2081, 2082, 2083, 2084, 2085, 2086, 2087, 2088, 2089, 2090, 2091, 2092, 2093, 2094, 2095, 2096, 2097, 2098, 2099, 2100, 2101, 2102, 2103, 2104, 2105, 2106, 2107, 2108, 2109, 2110, 2111, 2112, 2113, 2114, 2115, 2116, 2117, 2118, 2119, 2120, 2121, 2122, 2123, 2124, 2125, 2126, 2127, 2128, 2129, 2130, 2131, 2132, 2133, 2134, 2135, 2136, 2137, 2138, 2139, 2140, 2141, 2142, 2143, 2144, 2145, 2146, 2147, 2148, 2149, 2150, 2151, 2152, 2153, 2154, 2155, 2156, 2157, 2158, 2159, 2160, 2161, 2162, 2163, 2164, 2165, 2166, 2167, 2168, 2169, 2170, 2171, 2172, 2173, 2174, 2175, 2176, 2177, 2178, 2179, 2180, 2181, 2182, 2183, 2184, 2185, 2186, 2187, 2188, 2189, 2190, 2191, 2192, 2193, 2194, 2195, 2196, 2197, 2198, 2199, 2200, 2201, 2202, 2203, 2204, 2205, 2206, 2207, 2208, 2209, 2210, 2211, 2212, 2213, 2214, 2215, 2216, 2217, 2218, 2219, 2220, 2221, 2222, 2223, 2224, 2225, 2226, 2227, 2228, 2229, 2230, 2231, 2232, 2233, 2234, 2235, 2236, 2237, 2238, 2239, 2240, 2241, 2242, 2243, 2244, 2245, 2246, 2247, 2248, 2249, 2250, 2251, 2252, 2253, 2254, 2255, 2256, 2257, 2258, 2259, 2260, 2261, 2262, 2263, 2264, 2265, 2266, 2267, 2268, 2269, 2270, 2271, 2272, 2273, 2274, 2275, 2276, 2277, 2278, 2279, 2280, 2281, 2282, 2283, 2284, 2285, 2286, 2287, 2288, 2289, 2290, 2291, 2292, 2293, 2294, 2295, 2296, 2297, 2298, 2299, 2300, 2301, 2302, 2303, 2304, 2305, 2306, 2307, 2308, 2309, 2310, 2311, 2312, 2313, 2314, 2315, 2316, 2317, 2318, 2319, 2320, 2321, 2322, 2323, 2324, 2325, 2326, 2327, 2328, 2329, 2330, 2331, 2332, 2333, 2334, 2335, 2336, 2337, 2338, 2339, 2340, 2341, 2342, 2343, 2344, 2345, 2346, 2347, 2348, 2349, 2350, 2351, 2352, 2353, 2354, 2355, 2356, 2357, 2358, 2359, 2360, 2361, 2362, 2363, 2364, 2365, 2366, 2367, 2368, 2369, 2370, 2371, 2372, 2373, 2374, 2375, 2376, 2377, 2378, 2379, 2380, 2381, 2382, 2383, 2384, 2385, 2386, 2387, 2388, 2389, 2390, 2391, 2392, 2393, 2394, 2395, 2396, 2397, 2398, 2399, 2400, 2401, 2402, 2403, 2404, 2405, 2406, 2407, 2408, 2409, 2410, 2411, 2412, 2413, 2414, 2415, 2416, 2417, 2418, 2419, 2420, 2421, 2422, 2423, 2424, 2425, 2426, 2427, 2428, 2429, 2430, 2431, 2432, 2433, 2434, 2435, 2436, 2437, 2438, 2439, 2440, 2441, 2442, 2443, 2444, 2445, 2446, 2447, 2448, 2449, 2450, 2451, 2452, 2453, 2454, 2455, 2456, 2457, 2458, 2459, 2460, 2461, 2462, 2463, 2464, 2465, 2466, 2467, 2468, 2469, 2470, 2471, 2472, 2473, 2474, 2475, 2476, 2477, 2478, 2479, 2480, 2481, 2482, 2483, 2484, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2488, 2489, 2490, 2491, 2492, 2493, 2494, 2495, 2496, 2497, 2498, 2499, 2500, 2501, 2502, 2503, 2504, 2505, 2506, 2507, 2508, 2509, 2510, 2511, 2512, 2513, 2514, 2515, 2516, 2517, 2518, 2519, 2520, 2521, 2522, 2523, 2524, 2525, 2526, 2527, 2528, 2529, 2530, 2531, 2532, 2533, 2534, 2535, 2536, 2537, 2538, 2539, 2540, 2541, 2542, 2543, 2544, 2545, 2546, 2547, 2548, 2549, 2550,

The cry like is in Ent. g. H. V. L. Rev. 14. The c. of H. Beale, which proves no more far than the rest of this kind already c. ed.

Next is Hobbes, 431 ff. Rat. Ep. when divers Gentlemen of the City by force were imported by the command of the Privy-Council, the Citizens being grievously displeased to enlarge them, sends a commandment to the Judges of the King's-Bench, that they should take care, for determining them upon such as they should think fit: and they did so, and enlarged them upon such as they thought fit: and they did so, and enlarged them upon such as they thought fit. Follows it thereof, that this might not have been done by Law, if the parties themselves had endured it?

So in Tram. a Jen. rec. 30. Sir John Smith being committed to the Gatchaife, is returned to Bondswomen per wanden prison Cauchy, and he is enlarged everisworn a Graille prindils. But the same answer that comes for the rest before cited. Arrive for this affe.

The latter of these, in Rogers's tale, in Black Lion, vol. 119. He was committed to the Galleys by the Lords of the Council, and being brought into the King's Bench by Halow Corpus, a married upon bail; but still they lay was upon a letter written from one of the Lords of the Council to the Judges. It is true, that such a letter was written, but the answer to the former precedents of this nature, are sufficient to clear this

1. 'That it appears not, that the party ever desired to be enlarged by the Court, or was denied it.

2. Letters with r from the King or Council cannot alter the law in any case. So that hitherto nothing hath been brought on the contrary part, that hath was false, or colour of reason in it.

We come, now, my Lords, to those precedents of the other square cited against the liberty of the subject: that is, such as have been said to include the persons to whom they may not be applied by the Court.

The first four of them are exactly in the same words, saying that the names of themselves and the persons differ, I shall therefore recite them all one after another, and then clear them together.

The first is Rubens's Edward's hall, Hall, 7 Edw. VII. ru. 18. He and others were designated to the Martyr's of the Household, per monasterium Regis, and so returned upon a Baron's Corpus into the King's Bench, whereupon the entry is: by the monasterium Mari, etc.

The second of Diels & Han. VII., Richard Cherry's tale; he was committed to the Mayor of Hindjir, per manuscript deus Regis, and I ret. and upon a Helio. Corvus, and the entry is only, Deus esse nunc. Marc. 17.

The third is Hall, 9 Hec. VII. no. 14. On Stephen Barret's wife, who was committed to the Albion of the Household, per mandatum domini Regis, and so returned up in an Holborn Carpent, and the entry is likewise, By consent of Alms. &c.

The fourth is George Wyndham's case, Pp. 150-155. VII. 24. 19. He was connected to the Sheriffs of London, per mandatum domini Regis, and returned to serve his Hobbs Crown. The commission March 17.

These four have been used principally, as expert precedents, to give that a preference to committed cannot be enlarged, and perhaps at the first sight, so men that know not, and observe not the cause and reason of it.

night, to men that know not, and strive not the course and end, nor the Court of King's Bench, they may be approached to prove as much: be- lieve in truth they rather prove the contrary, at least there is no colour in them of any fault, either in their being seized for. To repeat myself, I be-of any such matter: they have been used for, To which purpose I believe your Lordships to call to your memories, that which I first observed to you touching the course of that Court. When a professor is enough in the Prætorian Court, he is to be heard as a commander, not as a in by John Coyle, he is [if he be of to be remained] full come into the Marshal on the Court, and thus baid as his case requires, "this is to certify, as it can never be otherwise. Now the men bring thus comin cited = the explicit command of the King, are left, you let, taken I = the prison whither they were first committed; whereas you may observe, my Lords, that if a general suspension of matter of State were at force, it at such a case, it might be too difficult in spirit of State, to have the professor remain at his post, where the King will furnish an abject commandment, and instead him, to have him still come on . . . When they had taken them from the place where before — they were, they carried them to the Marshall of Orleans Coast, which was the first step to building there. Now it seems so indeed that they were hailed, as then Treacher a Ball had felt well, as nothing, as it appears that they were denied it, perhaps they could not, or rather could not and luck as were sufficient to build them. And in return, which was the last thing that they did, the prince in a Rapier would be for Diable or Saint, only /me that Court, no entrance had in the Rapier for Diable as in their flag safe.

The seventh of them, the wife of Jean Desjardins, Edouard Durbin, and a few others that were there, are now connected to the Marchés of the Hospital, for Edouard Durbin has, and is returned upon Hôtel Capet, and it is true, that the mill flows that they were remained, but the remaining one only upon advantage. And indeed the grave and upright judge of that time, who is a noble, left upon the entry of the resistance, they had a number of it, a single perhaps without posterity is to that point, that the world, especially here, the word (innocent) is to be the Resurrection, that is all that the world must with the roll of the Marchés, and the Marchés of the Marchés, and not upon any degree in the section. And behind, that the world is a great one, which is really added, where the light award upon the roll of the Marchés, which kind is a noble, where.

The second strike is, the call of Schlagad, i. e. Hill. 12 Jan. Sir James Balfour was committed to the Prig. He would have been a Regis, and been in the Court of Prig, for disobeying an order of that Court, and it turned upon his Hill. Cryps, to be there or not. And it is true that a Regis is a Prig. But it is only a Prig.

...but, for all that, it is not a per se violation of the Fourth Amendment, and it is not an ex post facto law. ... The Court gave the Waller officers three full oral and written times to amend the return, and in the interim Waller was free and. ... Certainly if the Court had thought that the return had been good, they would not have given the officers 14 days to have amended it, for at that measure a de novo right had been sufficient in the case, why not a de novo amendment?

The north and tail of this is, δ , 127° , α , 6° , i. the end of the line is S , 30° , 10 miles; it is returned by M , under the K , on the east before, and generally, round the δ in the δ , which gives nothing at all, that there is the Court thought to be not by, lay be enlarged, and be done.

Thus, all that have been possible for the seigneur in this great point, and upon the view of them the seigneur is to your Lordships, it is plain it being added for that letter, or any testimony of it, he could produce none at all; but said, he thought the testimony of it was burnt, among many other things of the Council-table at the burning of the Banqueting-House.

To the 9th, being Hammerton's case, Fafile, 40 Elix. Ret. 62. the self-same objection was made by him, but no warrant was shewed to maintain his objection.

To the 10th, which is Catby's case, in vacancies Hill, 43 Elix. he said, that it was by direction of a Privy-Council from the Queen; and to that purpose he shewed the Privy-Council of 43 Elix. which he at large among the transcripts of the Records concerning bulls taken in cases, where the King or the Lords attended. But it was replied, that the Privy-Council was made only for some particular Gentleman mentioned in it, and for none other, as indeed appears in it; and then he said, that it was likely that Catby here had a Privy-Council in this behalf, because these other had say which was all the force of his objection.

To the 11th of these, which is Bushell's case in Hill, 23 Jac. Ret. 159. he said, that the Lords of the Council sent a letter to the Court of King's-Bench to bail him. And indeed he produced a letter, which could not by any means be found when the arguments were made at the first conference; and this letter, and a copy of an obscure report made by a young student (which was brought to another purpose, as it hereafter directly), were the only things written of any kind that Mr. Attorney produced, besides the particulars shewed by the House of Commons at the first conference. To this it was replied, That the letter was of no moment, being only a direction to the Chief-Justice, and no manner of Record, nor any way concerning the rest of the Judges; and besides, either the prisoner was bailable by the Law, or not bailable; if bailable by the Law, then he was to be bailed about any such letter; if not bailable by the Law, then plainly the Judges could not have bailed him upon the letter, without breach of their oath, which is, That they are to do justice according to the Law, without having respect to any person whatsoever. So that the letter in this case, or the like in any other case, is far point of Law to no purpose, nor hath any weight at all by way of objection against what the Record and the Judgment of the Court there are.

To the 12th and 13th of these, which is Sir Thomas Marjale's case in the 14 Jac. Ret. 147. the first objection only was made over by him, which was mentioned and clearly answered in the argument; and that one ground which is infallible, That the judgment upon a return is to be made only out of what appears in the body of the return itself, was again insisted upon in this case, as it was also in most of the rest. And indeed that alone which is most clear Law, fully finishes almost all kind of objections that have been made to any of their precedents, which, thus rightly understood, as many simple reflections of the Judgment of the Court of King's-Bench, touching in this point, in the several ages, and signs of the several periods under which they fall.

After his objections to the twelve, and the replies and satisfactions given to these objections, he came next to those wherein the assent of the King and Privy-Council appears to have been upon the enlargement; but he made not to any of these any other kind of objections whatsoever, than such as are answered and clearly answered (as they were now again) in the argument made at the first conference. And for so much as concerns letters of assent or direction, the same was here said again by way of reply to him, as is before said touching the letter in Bushell's case.

After these were dispatched, he came to urge the eight precedents, which seemed to make for the other side against the resolution of the House of Commons: which eight were used, and copies of them also were given in to the Lords at the first conference.

Of these eight, the first four were urged by him, as being of one kind; the difference of the only being such, that, first only in the names of prisoner and of persons, they are but the following.

To the force of these four he objected thus: that Richard Eversard (for the purpose) in the first of them, which is 5 H. VII. Ret. 13. Roger Cherry in the second of them, which is 8 H. VII. Ret. 12. George Burton, in the third of them, which is 9 H. VII. Ret. 14. and Christopher Urquhart in the fourth of them, which is 10 H. VII. Ret. 23. were returned into the King's-Bench upon several Writs of Habeas Corpus, to have been committed and detained in the several persons whence they came per mandatum Domini Regis, and that upon that return they were committed to the Marshal of the King's-Bench; and that however it had been objected against these precedents, that this kind of commitment was by the course of that Court, always done before the bailing of the prisoner, yet that it did not appear that they were bailed.

The Reply to this objection was, That by constant course of King's-Bench, whosoever came in upon Habeas Corpus, or otherwise upon any Writ in that Court, cannot be bailed until he be first committed to the Marshal of that Court; and that thence it was, that all these four were committed to the Marshal, as appears by the entry, Qui commisit Marjale, &c. which is the usual entry in such a case, and that the Clerks of that Court acknowledge this course and entry to be most convenient. So that all the interest, that can be made out of these four, is that four prisoners being brought from four several prisons by Habeas Corpus into the King's-Bench, and returned to stand committed per mandatum Domini Regis, were so far from being remanded by the Law, that in all these four cases, they were first taken from the several prisons, wherein they had been detained, by such a general command (which could not have been if they had not been adjudged in every one of the cases to have been bailable by the Court), and that this commitment of them to the Marshal of the King's-Bench, was the first step towards the bailing of them, as in all other cases. But that it appears not, that either they were demanded to be bailed, or that they were able to find sufficient bail; and if they did not the one, or could not do the other, it may follow indeed that they were not bailed. But this commitment to the King's-Bench being the first step to the bailing of them (as by the constant course it is) they are most plainly that they were bailable by the Law, which is the only thing in question. So that also these four precedents were ranked among them, that may seem to make against the resolution of the House of Commons, which was done, both because they have this small colour in them for the other side, to any man that is not acquainted with the use and seasons of the entries, and entries in the Court of King's-Bench, and also because all or some of them had been used in the late great case in the King's-Bench, as precedents, to make against the entry claimed by the subject; yet, in truth, all of them do so fully prove their resolution, that is, they plainly shew that the Court of King's-Bench in every one of them resolved, that the prisoners so committed were bailable, otherwise they had been remanded; and thus they committed to the Marshal of the King's-Bench. And this was the reason to the objection made by Mr. Attorney upon these four precedents, in all all of the time of King Henry the eighth.

To the fifth of these eight, being Edward Pender's Case, in 11 VIII. Ret. 23. Mr. Attorney objected thus: H. VIII. that Edward Pender was committed to the Marshals of the Household, per mandatum Domini Regis, Habeas Corpus replevit. Ret. Qui commisit Marjale, &c. H. VIII. Marjale Replevit. By which it appears, as he said, that the Court is now to him back to the prison of the Marshals of the Household, and he said, that wherein it had been objected at the first conference, that there was some mistaking in the entry; he conceived, indeed, that there was a mistaking; but it was that the Clerk had entered commitment for remittitur and that it should have been Qui remittitur Marjale Replevit Domini Regis, but when he considered they remanded the prisoner, committitur, and not remittitur should be entered. And that mistaking being in such a manner understood, he conceived it was a direct precedent against the resolution of the House of Commons.

To this it was answered by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, That there was no doubt, indeed, but that a mistake was in the entry by the Clerk, but that the mistaking was quite of another nature. The addition of those words, Replevit Domini Regis, was the mistaking, and the entry should have been, per committitur Marjale, &c. only; that is, he was committed to the Marshal of the King's-Bench, and it was said, that the force of this precedent should be, but just the same with the first four; but the ignorance of the Clerk that entered it, knowing not how to distinguish between the Marshal of the Household and the Marshal of the King's-Bench, was the cause of the addition of those words, Replevit Domini Regis.

And to confirm fully, this kind of interpretation of that precedent, and of the mistaking of it, it was offered by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that there is in the margin of the Roll an infallible character that justifies to much. For by the course of that Court, who is a prisoner is committed to the Marshal of the King's-Bench and not remanded, the word Marjale is written in the margin first by Mares' man's hand, and that is never written there, but when the meaning and ends of the entry is, that the prisoner is committed to the prison at the last Court. Now in this case Mares in the Margin is likewise written; which most clearly shews that the truth of this case was, that this entry was committed to the Marshal of the King's-Bench, and not remanded, which it would have been, neither could the entry have been committitur, nor should the margin of the Roll have had Mares written in it.

And thus they have answered Mr. Attorney's objections touching this precedent, and concluded that now, under the fifth foot of the eight, they had answered, and as free to prove, that a prisoner committed per mandatum Domini Regis, generally was bailable by the judgment of the Court. However, it appears not in their particulars that they were bailed, which perhaps they were not, either because they prayed it not, or because they could not find sufficient bail.

The fourth of these precedents, being the case of Thomas Caylor, in the 8 Jac. Ret. 149. Mr. Attorney objected in it thus: That Caylor being committed per mandatum Domini Regis to the Marshals of the Household, was returned upon Habeas Corpus to be so committed, and thence he descended in prison; and that the entry is, Qui commisit perjane Marjale, prodest, by which it appears clearly, that he was remanded to the last prison from whence he came.

To this the Gentlemen of the House of Commons gave this answer: They said, that the usual entry of a remitter, when it is to show that the Court by way of judgment, or award upon a remission, or debate, remands the prisoner, is, remittitur quousque secundum legem deliberationis sue it but when they advise, or give way to the Keeper of the prison to amend his return, or the like, then the entry is only remittitur generally, or remittitur perjane prodest. But it was indeed affirmed by Mr. Aulack, a Clerk of great experience in that Court, that the entry of a Remitter generally, or remittitur perjane prodest was in fact actually used for the time, as remittitur perjane prodest. Yet it was expressly shewed by the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that there was sometimes a difference, and that so it might well be in this case. For in the last of these eight precedents, which is Saboyall's case, they object that remittitur perjane prodest is often used, and that it is twice used only for a remanding, during the time that the Court gave leave to the Warden of the Fleet to amend his return, which shews plainly, that the remittitur perjane generally, and remittitur perjane prodest, may mean the same, yet sometimes it doth not. And that in this case of Caylor it doth not mean any other, but only so much as it doth twice in that of Saboyall's case, was proved also by rule of the Court, which was citation of the rule-book of the Court of King's-Bench, by which rule the Court expressly declared, that unless the Sheriff and Marshal of the Household be sufficiently return in the Writ of Habeas Corpus for Caylor, that he should be discharged. The words of the rule are, Nisi per seculum Sequestrum et Alia quodlibet Expositum Domini Regis sequestrum revertendum ad verba de Habeas Corpus, Tha Cajus de Admittitur perjane prodest quousque Secundum Legem deliberationis sue perjane prodest quousque Secundum Legem deliberationis sue. And this was the opinion of the Court, which shews that the Court was so far from remanding him upon the return, that they refused it, that unless some better return were made, the prisoner should be discharged of his first imprisonment, though it appeared to them out of the body of the return (upon which they were only to judge), that he was committed per mandatum Domini Regis only. And the rule not only shews the opinion of the Court then to have been agreeable to the resolution of the House of Commons, but also that that Remittitur generally, or Remittitur perjane prodest, doth not always imply a remanding upon judgment or debate. And this answer was given to this of Caylor's case, that is the sixth of this number.

that without any disparagement to them) such opinions as they may well, and ought to charge upon further inquiry, examination, and full debate, had before them, and mature deliberation taken by them. Now plainly in that of 13 Yes, there is not so much as a pretence of any debate at the Bar or Bench. All that is reported to have been, is reported as spoken of the fudden. And can any man take such a sudden opinion to be of value against solemn debates and mature deliberations since had of the point? And indeed this great point, and all circumstances belonging to it, have within this half year, been fully examined and searched into, that it may well be affirmed, that the most learned men whatever that hath now considered it, hath within that time, or might have, learned more reason of satisfaction in it, than ever before he met with. Therefore the sudden opinion of the Judges to the contrary is of no value here, which also is to be said of that opinion absolutely delivered in the Common House in 18 Yes, as Mr. Attorney objected out of the Journal of the House. But besides, neither was the truth of that report of that opinion in the Journal any way acknowledged; for it was said on behalf of the House of Commons, that their Journals were for matters of Orders and Resolutions of the House of such authority, as that they were at their Records. But for any particular man's opinion, need in any of them, it was far from being of any authority with them, that in truth no particular opinion is at all to be entered in them, and that their Clerk offends, whenever he doth to the contrary. And so conclude, no such opinion whatsoever can be sufficient to weaken the clear Law comprehended in their Resolutions of the House of Commons, grounded upon so many Acts of Parliament, so much Reason of the Common Law, and so many Precedents of Record, and the Resolutions of all the Judges of England; and against which not one Law, written or unwritten, one Precedent, nor one Reason hath been brought, that makes any thing to the contrary.

And thus ended the next day of the Conference desired by the Lords, and had by a Committee of both Houses.

Serjeant Ashley's Argument, forwarding Mr. Attorney, in the behalf of his Majesty.

I Hope it will be neither offensive nor tedious to your Lordships, if I said somewhat to second Mr. Attorney: which I rather desire, because yesterday it was taken by the Gentlemen, and argued on the behalf of the Commons, that the cause was as good as gained by them, and yielded by us, in that we acknowledged the Statute of Magna Charta; and against which not one Law, written or unwritten, one Precedent, nor one Reason hath been brought, that makes any thing to the contrary.

That therefore no man could be committed, or imprisoned, but by due process, judgement or indictment.

Which we say is a Negatius upon such our acknowledgment, for then we would follow by necessary consequence, that no imprisonment could be justified but by process of law, which we utterly deny. For in the case of the Confiscable cited by Mr. Attorney, it is well clear, that by the ancient law of the land a Constable might, ex officio, without any Warrant, arrest and detain a man to prevent an affray, or to suppress it. And so is the authority 38 Hon. VII. Brant's alleged. So may be, after the affray, arrest and commit to prison the person that hath wounded a man that is in peril of death, and that without warrant or process; as it is in 38 Edw. III. fol. 6.

Also any man that is no Officer may apprehend a Felon without Writ, or Warrant, or pursue him as a Wolf, and as a common enemy to the Commonwealth, as the Book is 14 Hon. VIII. fol. 16. So might any one arrest a Night-walker, because it is for the common profit, as the reason is given 4 Hon. VII. fol. 7.

In like manner the Judges in their several Courts may commit a man, either for contempt, or misdemeanor, without either Process or Warrant, other than Take him Sheriff, or Take him Marshal, or Warden of the Fleet. And the adversaries will not deny, but if the King will alledge cause, he may commit a man per mandatum as the Judges do, without Process or Warrant.

And various are the cases that may be intimated, wherein there may be a lawful commitment without process. Wherefore I do positively and with confidence affirm, that if the imprisonment be lawful, whether it be by process, or without process, it is not prohibited by the law.

Which being granted, then the question will apply be made, Whether the King or Council may commit to prison per legem terræ, were only that a part of the Municipal Law of this Realm, which we call the Common Law? For there are also divers jurisdictions in this Kingdom, which are also reckoned the law of the land.

As in Cowley's case in Cal's 6th report, fol. 1. the first Enrolment Law is held the law of the land, to punish Blasphemers, Schismatics, Heretics, Simony, Infanticide, and other sins, for a good reason there rendered, viz. That otherwise the law should be so diverse, that Justice to his Subjects in all cases, not to punish all crimes within his Kingdom.

The Admirals jurisdiction is also lex terre, or things done upon the Sea: but if they exceed their jurisdiction, a prohibition is awarded upon the Statute of solus Nave here, by which appears that the Statute is in force, as we have acknowledged.

The Martial Law likewise, though not to be exercised in times of peace, when recourse may be had to the King's Courts, yet in times of warlike, or other times of Hostility, when an Army-Regiment in the field, and offences are committed, which require speedy redress, and cannot expect the solemnity of legal Trials; then such imprisonment, execution, or other Justice done by the Law Martial is warrantable, for it is then the law of the land, and ex potestate, which ever serves for a supply in the defect of the Common Law, where ordinary proceeding cannot be had.

And so it is also in the case of the Law of the Merchant, which is mentioned 13 Edw. IV. fol. 49. where a Merchant-Stranger was wronged as his goods, which he had committed to a Carrier to convey to Santampnia, and the Carrier imbezelled some of the goods: for remedy whereof the Merchant sued before the Council in the Star-Chamber for redress. It is there said thus. Merchant-Strangers have by the King full authority for coming into this Realm; therefore they shall not be compelled to attend the ordinary Trial of the Common Law, but, for expedition, shall sue before the King's Council, or in Chancery, de iure in iudicio &c.

hæret in iure, where the case shall be determined by the Law of Merchants.

In the like manner it is in the Law of State; when the necessity of State requires it, they do and may proceed to natural equity; as in those other cases where the law of the land provides not, there the proceeding may be by the law of natural equity: and infinite are the occurrences of State, unto which the Common Law extends not. And if these proceedings of State should not also be executed the law of the land, then we do fall into the same inconvenience mentioned in Cowley's case, that the King should not be able to do Justice in all cases within his own Dominion.

If then the King nor his Council may not commit, it must needs follow, that either the King must have no Council of State, or having such a Council, they must have no power to make Orders, or Acts of State; or if they may, they must be without means to compel obedience to those Acts; and so we shall allow their jurisdiction, but not compel obedience to those Acts, but not correction, which will be then as fruitless as the command. Præter potentia sine imperio imperator in statu. Whereas the very Act of Witchamper the fifth, shews plainly that the King may commit, and that his commitment is lawful, or else that Act would never have declared a man to be arraignable when he is committed by the command of the King, if the Law-makers had conceived that his commitment had been unlawful. And Divine Truth intreats us, that the Kings have their power from God, the Psalist calling them the Children of the Most High, which is in a more special manner understood than of other men: for the form of Adam are by election the sons of God, and all the sons of Abraham by recreation, or regeneration, the children of the Most High. In respect of the power which is committed unto them, who hath also furnished them with ornaments and arms fit for the exercising of that power, and hath given them scepters, Swords, and Crowns; scepters to institute, and swords to execute laws; and Crowns an Emblem of that power and dignity, with which they are invested. Shall we then conceive that our King hath so far transferred the power of his Sword to inferior Magistrates, that he hath not reserved so much supreme power as to commit an offender to prison? 10 Hon. VI. fol. 7. it appears that a Steward of a Court-Lect may commit a man to prison, and shall not the King, from whom all inferior power is deduced, have power to commit? We call him the Fountain of Justice, yet when these streams and rivulets, which flow from that fountain, congregate and fall, we would be so foolish that sometimes, as to leave it dry. But they that will admit him so much power, do require the execution of the cause; I demand whether they will have a general cause assigned, or a special? If general, as they have instances for Treason, Felony, or for Contempt, (so to leave fencing, and to speak plainly as they intend it) was. If Loss of money should be required and relaid, and thereupon a commitment ensue, and the cause signified to be for Contempt, this being unequal inconvenience from yielding, the remedy is sought; in the next Parliament would be required the expiation of the particular cause of the commitment. Then how unfit would it be for King or Council in cases to express the particular cause, it's easily to be adjudged, when there is no State, or Policy of Government, whether it be Monarchical, or of any other frame, which have not known Secrets of State, not communicable to vulgar understandings.

I will instance but one; if a King employ an Ambassador in a Foreign Country or State, with instructions for his Negotiations, and he pursue on his instructions, whereby offence and damage may ensue to the Kingdom, is not this communicable?

And yet the particular of his instructions, and the manner of his misbehaving, is not fit to be declared to his Keeper, or by him to be certified to the Judges, where it is to be opened and debated in the presence of a great audience.

I therefore conclude, for offences against the State, in case of State Government, the King and his Council have lawful power to punish by imprisonment, without shewing particular cause, when it may tend to the diffusing of State Government. It is well known to many that know me, how much I have laboured in this law of the subjects liberty very many years before I was in the King's Service, and had no cause then to speak, but to speak ex animo; yet I did then maintain and publish the same opinion which now I have declared concerning the King's supreme power in matters of State, and therefore cannot justly be censured to speak at this present only to merit my Master. But if I may freely speak my own understanding, I conceive it to be a question too high to be determined by any legal direction; for it must needs be an hard case of contention, when the Conqueror must fall down with irreparable loss, as in this case. If the Subject prevails, he gains liberty, but loseth the benefit of that State Government, by which a Monarchy may soon become an Anarchy; or if the State prevails, it gains absolute Sovereignty, but loseth Subjects: not then subjection, for obedience we must yield, the nothing be left to us, but yet retain our minds, but yet submit the best part of them, which is their affections, whereby Sovereignty is established, and the crown itself, fix on his royal head. Between two such extremes there is no way to moderate, but to find a medium for the accommodation of the difference; which is not for me to prescribe, but only to move your Lordships, to whom I submit.

After Mr. Serjeant's speech ended, my Lord-President said that to the Gentlemen of the House of Commons. That though at this free conference, liberty was given by the Lords to the King's Council to speak what they thought fit for his Majesty, yet Mr. Serjeant Ashley did so authoritatively, or directum from above in such manner he had done. And he was committed into custody, and afterwards, being sorry for any hasty expression he might have used, was discharged.

The Objections of the King's Council, with the answers made thereto, at the two Conferences touching the same matter.

IT was agreed by the Attorney-General, Sir Robert Heath, that the seven Statutes urged by the Commons were in force, and that Magna Charta did extend most properly to the King. But he said, 1. That some of them are in general words, and therefore conclude nothing, but as to be expounded by the precedents; and other that be more particular, are applied to the suggestions of subjects, and not to the King's command simply of itself. Hereunto it was answered, That the Statutes were as direct as could be, which apperly by the reading of them, and that though some of them speak

Which generally before by the Parliament was otherwise conceived; for now they say, it was but an award and no judgment, will such a notorious Act upon so important an occasion as to publish a peace be quickly forgotten? No, will not the memory of it for ever remain upon records? Is not our case then much better than when we came hither?

And I, Will not the resolution of this House, and all our arguments and reasons against imprisonment without a writ, be (which no doubt by the course we have taken will be translated in policy) be a great reason to lay the Judge's resolution from declaring any judgment to the contrary, especially of those be likelihood of a Parliament? Is not our case in this very much amended?

Lastly, Have we not received Propositions from the Lords, wherein (amongst other things) they declared, that they were not of force with our proceedings? Is not this a great strengthening to us? But after all long debate amongst them about it, they cannot take any full exception to it; and such not this also much amend our case?

From all these reasons, I conclude that the second objection, that by a continuance we are in a better case than when we came together, is also a weak objection.

Now forasmuch as we are to proceed in the course of accepting a confirmation: First, We have his Majesty's gracious Promise to yield to a confirmation of the old Laws, from which we may well infer he offered he will not dispute, if we tender him, without our Proposition to be enacted, we have cause to doubt that we shall lose both the one and the other.

Secondly, We are so left assisted of the Lords joining with us, for in their Propositions first to us they have delivered themselves to that purpose: then a tacit assent of giving force to that of great advantage to us, as we have great hopes, and in a manner assurance on this side, so on the other side we have great doubts and fears, that by offering our resolution to be resolved, we shall lose all.

For first we have had already experience of the Lords, that they are not very forward to join with us in a declaration of our Position to be Law, if they stand in a declaration, much more will they, in yielding to make a Law in the same point.

And have we not much more cause to doubt that his Majesty will not yield unto it, seeing it toucheth him so near? Is it not the essence of his pleasure that which wrought thus with the Lords?

If we should carry our Bill with one Proposition, and it should be rejected by the Lords, or by the King, is not our resolution much weakened by it; and are we not then in far worse case than before we made it? Our resolution for the rejecting of our Proposition, will tend to a justification of all that hath been done against us in this great point of our Liberty.

Let us also, the next way, inform our desire to our hopes, and guide our steps by probabilities, rather than by our desires and our wishes.

This is my poor opinion in this weighty business.

And to the day following they had further debate upon that matter, the House being turned into a Grand Committee, and Mr. Herbert in the chair.

Some said that the subject had suffered more in the violation of ancient Liberties within these few years, than in three hundred years before, and therefore care ought to be taken for the time to come.

Sir Edward Coke said, That that Royal Word had reference to some message formerly sent by his Majesty's word was, that they may sever themselves any way, by Bill or otherwise, be granted to give way to us. And in the end that this might not touch his Majesty's honour, it was proposed, that the Bill come not from the House, but from the King: We will and grant for our and our successors, and that we and our successors will do thus and thus; and it is the King's honour, he cannot speak but by Record.

Others desired the House to consider, when and where the late promise was made; was it not in the face of both Houses? And Kings have been careful to perform their promises, yet, though they have been unlawful, as Herald. Therefore if we rest upon his Majesty's promise, we may as well ourselves of the performance of it; besides, we bind his Majesty, by relying on his word: we have laws given, it is the execution of them that is our life, and it is the King that gives life and execution.

Sir Thomas Watson concluded the debate, saying, That now House of Parliament traffick more in the pockets of their King. For their own private accounts, than the people; but we are ambitious that his Majesty's pockets may remain to posterity, and we are accountable to a publick trust: and therefore fearing there hath been a publick violation of the laws by his Ministers, nothing will satisfy him but a publick amendment; and our desire to vindicate the subjects right by Bill, be no more than are had done in former Laws, which were made provision for infraction, performance and execution.

Which was well agreed with the House, that they made it the subject of a message to be delivered by the Speaker to his Majesty.

Amidst these deliberations, another message was delivered May 3, from his Majesty by Mr. Secretary Cook, That his Majesty was pleased in this business we have in hand, which his Majesty will not doubt, but to be according to our confident profession, and so as he may have cause to give what he will; yet his resolution is, that both his royal care, and liberty and tenderness towards all his loving subjects, shall appear to the whole Kingdom, and all the World, that he will govern us according to the laws and customs of this Realm; that he will maintain us in the liberties of our persons, and properties of our goods, so far as we may enjoy as much liberty as our forefathers in their best times; and that he will multiply what hath been, or may be found ancient amongst us, so that hereafter there may be no just cause to complain. Whereas his Majesty will be much obliged of strength the better of our Kings, and those he hath no occasion to touch or invade our lawful liberties, as right, so he will have us in such civility with the best subjects, not by increasing upon their ancient and prerogative, which God hath put into his hands; nor our power, but by containing ourselves within the bounds and laws of our forefathers, whose resolutions, or enlarging them by new explanations, interpretations, opinions, or additions in any sort; which, he hath said, he will not give way unto.

That the weight of the affairs of the Kingdom, and Christendom, doth grow more and more, and that the time is now grown to that point.

of maturity, that it cannot endure long debate or delay; so that this Session of Parliament must continue no longer than 7 May (next-eight at farthest); in which time his Majesty, for his part, will be ready to perform what he promised, and if the House be not ready to do that is fit for themselves, it shall be their own fault.

And upon assurance of our good dispatch and correspondence, his Majesty declared, that his royal intention is to have another Session of Parliament at Michmas next, for the perceiving of such things as cannot now be done.

This message was debated the next day, being Saturday, May 3, whereupon Sir John Elliot spoke to this effect:

The King, I am sure, will rank himself with the best of Kings, and therefore he would have us rank our men with the best subjects; we will not incommence upon the King's subjects, but we will stand by his side; this makes me fear his Majesty is not contented as what we gathered; let us make force enlargement, and put it before him, that we will not make any thing new. As for the time of this Session, it is but short; and look how many resolutions we have, it is many more, and we do not expect, and not from conclusions to be made, but to be made.

Sir Ald. A. F. of counsel said, that the King's Majesty, that his Majesty is of great importance, we are to be a moderate time, the best of this Parliament will be the greatest such, that our bill is, the King of Christendom are upon this Parliament, the King of all our Protestant Friends are ready to be followed up by the Emperor's Forces, and our own Kingdom is in a most perilous point, for the danger of our Religion that is invaded by the Roman Catholics, by the colour of a commission, which is intolerable; the danger of our Realm by blipping is decayed, the King's revenue is sick and poor, when his Majesty's revenue is obtained by the Parliament. Now we are in the way, let us proceed by way of Bill, in pursuance of the King's will, as well as the fundamental Laws in pursuance of our oaths, and liberty of our persons: It was declared to us, that among by Law and by judgment were not lawful, let us touch them in our Bill, and that all persons and judgments leaving to the contrary, be void; and that all enactments against the Law be removed, and that we be provided against the fear of continuance.

Mr. MASON spoke.

I AM of opinion with the Gentlemen that speak, that, in our proceedings in the matter now in debate, we should have use of the title of the Statute, called de officio again; for it concerns the liberty of our persons, without which we are not to enjoy our lives.

The SPEAKER.

Whether in this Bill for the explanation of Magna Charta, and the rest of the Statutes, we shall provide that the words of the commitment shall be expensed upon the commitment, or upon return of the Habeas Corpus?

Before I speak to the question itself, I shall propose some observations, in my conceits, especially conducing to the debate of the matter.

1. That we ought to take care, and to provide for potency, as our predecessors have done for us, and that this provide care cannot be expounded to be any detriment of the prerogative of his Majesty's gracious declaration, this Act providing for prerogative, to which his Majesty's power, unless it were by Act of Parliament, cannot extend.

2. That we having solemnly and solemnly renewed our rights and privileges by virtue of this Act, as if now we shall renew these declarations, and these resolutions, as an Act, we shall ever be careful to be confined within the bounds of what an Act, being made in our own, and to be the basis of the Perpetuity in that respect, and it being an Act of explanation, which shall receive no further explanation than itself contain.

3. That by this Act we shall provide a remedy against the persons which detain us in prison, for as to the commitment, there can be no certainty.

Concerning the Question itself.

It hath been solemnly and clearly resolved by the House, that the commitment of a Freeman, with out expending the cause at the time of the commitment, is against the Law: If by this Act of explanation we shall provide only that the cause ought to be expensed upon the return of the Habeas Corpus, then out of the words of the Statute, it will necessarily be inferred, that before the return of the Habeas Corpus the cause need not so be expensed, because the Statute hath appointed the time of the expensation of the cause, and it will be allowed, that if the makers of the Statute had intended that it should be so, it would have been from them, they would have provided for it by the Act; and then the Act, which we term an Act of explanation, will be an Act of the changing of Magna Charta, and the rest of the Statutes, so if this Act do make the commitment without expending at the time, to be lawful, yet it will clearly amount to a violation of the commitment, without expending the cause, and the Habeas Corpus, or to a general or perpetual dispensation, beginning with, and continuing as the Law in it. And as my understanding the words in this Statute of Law, that no Freeman can be committed, without our cause expensed, as I saw that Statute can be construed, with the nature of the Habeas Corpus, be that commits a Judge of the cause, or at least hath a licence by this Law will that none to exceed the cause, and the Gaoler is not subject to any action for the detaining of the Prisoner upon such command. For if the prisoner demand the cause of his imprisonment of the Gaoler, it will be a sufficient answer for him to say that he detain a prisoner by warrant, and that it belongs not unto him to deliver those which commit the prisoner to their cause until he return the Habeas Corpus. And if the prisoner be a Stranger to know the cause from those that committed him, it will be a sufficient answer for them to say, they will repeat the cause at the return of the Habeas Corpus. In this case there will be a wrong, because the commitment is without cause expensed, as I saw that Statute that wrong, yet the party imprisoned, and yet no such wrong done but may excuse, if not justify himself by this Law.

In making of Laws, we must consider the inconveniences which may ensue, and provide for the prevention of them, as we can do for them. I have taken into my thoughts these inconveniences which shall expose to your consideration, not imagining that they can happen in the time of our gracious Sovereign, but in an Act of Parliament, we must provide for the prevention of all inconveniences in future times.

directed to the House of Commons, and the Petition of Right would close all difficulties: For (said he) from give it out, as if the House went about to touch the King's Privilege. But the farther debate of this matter took up several days.

May 27. The Lords proposed, at a conference, an addition to be made to the Petition of Right, which was delivered by the Lord-Keeper, to this purpose:

YOU the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes of the House of Commons, my Lords have commanded me to present unto you the singular care and affection they have to preserve that unanimity and order, which the two Houses, both in this and former Parliaments, to the happiness of this Kingdom, have heretofore enjoyed.

This command is also to you know, that they have no less care and affection to bring that great business, the Liberty of the Subject, to an happy issue. And whereas, at the last conference of both Houses, there were some things proposed, that came from their Lordships, out of a desire the Petition might have the easier passage with his Majesty, not intending to alter in any manner the substance of the Petition, but it was then thought fit, that there was another part of the Petition, of an great importance and weight. My Lords, since the time of that conference, have employed themselves wholly to reduce the Petition to such a frame and order, that may give both to you and them hope of acceptance.

And after many deliberations, and much advice taken, my Lords have resolved to represent to you something which they have thought upon, yet not as a thing conclusive to them or you; and according to their desire (having mentioned it in the beginning) have held it fit to conclude of nothing, till that you be made acquainted with it, and that there may be a more intimate agreement between you and them, in that there may be the happy conclusion in all their business.

Thus being the determination of the Lords, that nothing, that is now offered unto you, should be conclusive, yet they thought it convenient to present it unto you.

This alteration (not alteration, but addition) which they shall propose unto you, to be advised and conferred upon, which is no breach of the same, they think it meet, if it shall stand with your liking, to be put in the conclusion of the Petition which I shall now read unto you.

We present this our humble Petition to your Majesty, with the care not only of preserving our own Liberties, but with due regard to those rights that Sovereign Power, whereunto your Majesty is trusted for the Protection, Safety, and Happiness of the People.

This is the thing the Lords do present unto you, the Subject of this conference, concerning the adding of this in the conclusion of the Petition; and as an answer, that this is no fault finding, and that you cannot possibly give an inkrow to it; therefore they desire you, that you do with some speed consider of it, and their Lordships will be ready this afternoon.

This addition produced several speeches.

Mr. Ayres.] Let us look [said he] into the Records, and see what they say, what is Sovereign Power? And faith, That it is free from any condition, by this we shall acknowledge a Royal, as well as a Legal Power: Let us give that to the King, that the Law gives him, and no more.

Mr. Pym.] I am not able to speak to this question, I know not what it is: All on Petition is for the Laws of England, and this power seems to be another distinct power from the power of the Law. I know how to add Sovereignty to his Person, but not to his Power: And we cannot leave to him a Sovereign Power, when we never were possessed of it.

Mr. Hachwell.] We cannot admit of those words with safety, they are applicable to all the power of our Petition: It is in the nature of a Saving, and by it we shall imply, as if we had incroached on his Privilege; all the Laws we cut are without a Saving; and yet now after the violation of them we must add a Saving: I have seen diverse Petitions, and where the Subject claimed a Right, there I never saw a Saving of this nature.

Sir Edward Coke.] This is against in parvo, this is proposed to be a conclusion of our Petition: It is a matter of great weight; and, so speak plainly, it will overthrow all our Petition; it reaches to all parts of it: It lies at Leans, and at the Oath, and at Imprisonment, and Solliciting of Soldiers; this runs all about again. Look into all the Petitions of former times, they never petitioned, whereas there was a favour of the King's sovereignty. I know that Petitioners in part of the Law, but foreign Power is no Parliamentary word. In my opinion, it weakens Magna Charta, and all our Statutes; for they are absolute, without any saving of sovereign Power. And shall we now add it, we shall weaken the foundation of Law, and then the building must needs fall; let us take heed what we yield unto: Magna Charta is such a fellow, that he will have no foreword. I wonder this sovereignty was not in Magna Charta, or in the confirmations of it: If we grant this, by implication we give a sovereign power above all the Laws: power in Law, is taken for a power with force: The Sheriff shall take the power of the County, what it means here, God only knows. It is a repugnance to our petition, that is a Protest of Rights, grounded on Acts of Parliament. Our Petitioners could never desire a save from any, so none but the King of old could endure for the Clerk, save before the Duke of Exeter. We shall not admit of it, and to qualify it, is impossible. Let us hold our privileges according to the Law, that power, that is above this, is not fit for the King and People here as it is disputed further. I had rather, for my part, have the prerogative abated, and I myself to be under it, than to have it disputed.

Sir Thomas Wentworth.] If we do admit of this addition, we shall leave our Subject worse than we found him, and we shall have little thanks for our labour, when we come home: Let us leave all power to his Majesty to punish malefactors; but our Laws are not acquainted with sovereign power. We desire no new thing, nor do we offer to touch on his Majesty's prerogative; we must not recede from this position, either in part or whole.

Mr. Nye.] To add a Saving, is not idle, doubtful words, but brings all confusion: and the words are not only unusual words, but words unknown to any, and never used in any act or Petition but in.

Mr. Selous.] Let us not go too hastily to the question. If there be any objections, let any proposed them, and let us then answer them as they think good. I will not touch the matter already said. The fact of this addition is, that our right is not to be fully 2 in Loans or imprisonment without cause, or martial law, but by foreign power. If it hath no reference to our Petition, what death is here? I am not all others will say it hath reference, and so must we. How far it hath exceed all examples of former times, no man can draw me the line. I have made sure that this is a full satisfaction, and I find not another kind: 23 Ed. I. We have given many petitions and bills of parliament in all ages, in all which we are full on such thing is added. That clause of the 28 Ed. I. it was not in the petition, but in the King's answer.

In Magna Charta there were no such clauses; the articles themselves are to be seen in a library at Lambeth, in a book of that time, upon which the law was made. There was none in the statutes in King John's time, for there I have seen, there is no saving. In the articles of agreement, charter, is a saving, to ensure only, that is, for fear of law, for fear of the sword, and for reason. And in the articles of King John, in the original charter, which I can show, there those three words were added therein, and they were all known. In the 25 Ed. III. there is a petition against Loans, there it is a saving, and so in others. As for that addition in the 28 Ed. I. do not observe the petition after Magna Charta; as 3 Ed. III. they put up a petition: a heres in Magna Charta it is contained, it is so in Magna Charta, and by the growth of law; those words are not in Magna Charta, and yet there is no saving. And so in the 28 Ed. III. and 30, 31, and 32, and 33 Ed. III. all which parts by petition, and yet there is no let by in them. And there are no more other words that are not in Magna Charta, and yet no saving. For that that Mr. Speaker said to the King, it was our heart, and ever shall be, but we then spoke of the King's prerogative by itself, and we are bound to say so; but speaking of our rights, shall we say we are not to be imprisoned, saving but by the King's Sovereign power? say my Lords, without any title, be added in the King's hand, and I bring a petition of right, and I go to the King, and say, I do by no means lose your Majesty's right and title; and after that, I bring a petition of supplicavit de dictis, setting forth my own right and title, and withal set down a saving, that I leave infinite his Majesty's right, it would be improper. It was objected, that in the 28 of Ed. I. in the end of another Magna Charta, which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, and Charta de Foresta, in the end thereof is a clause, in testis I fear every, the words are extant in that roll that is now extant, but the original roll is not extant.

In the 25 Ed. I. there was a confirmation of the Charter; In the 27 Ed. I. the Parliament was called, and much for there was about the Charter, and renewing the Articles, but then little was done. In 28 Ed. I. the Commons by petition or bill, did obtain the liberties and articles at the end of the Parliament; they were extracted out of the roll, and proclaimed abroad. The addition was added in the proclamation: In the bill there was no saving, but afterwards it was put in, and to prove that, it is true, there is no Parliament-roll of that year, yet we have histories of that time. In the library at Oxford, there is a journal of a parliament of that very year, which contains so much; also in the public library at Groby, there is a manuscript that belonged to an Abbot, it was of the time year 28 Ed. I. and it contains the petitions and the petitioners, and actum per petitionem de imprisonment run at in four folios, sub pre on one regard; and they came by proclamation in London. When the people heard that clause added in the end, they fell into execration for that addition, and the great Earls that went away satisfied from the Parliament, hearing of this, went to the King, and afterwards it was cleared at the next Parliament. Now there is no Parliament-roll of this at that time, only in one roll in the end of Ed. III. there is a roll, that recites the Parliament bill, but the Statute that was the effect of the roll, that was proclaimed.

The Lords afterwards, at a conference, rendered reasons to justify their additions; which were briefly repeated by the Lord Keeper:

THAT the Lords were all agreed to defend and maintain the just liberties of the Subject, and of the Crown; and that the word, save, was debated amongst them; and thereby they meant to give no new, but what was before: For the words, Sovereign Power, as he a King, he is a Sovereign, and must have power; and he said, the words were clear that the Prærogative. As for the word, that which is relative, and referred to that power, that is for the safety of the people; and this, said he, can never give any man. Being that published, it is not so well understood in general, but now in consultation of our reasons, Magna Charta was with a saving; but, said he, you parse not the words in Magna Charta, and therefore it needs an addition.

As for the 28 of Ed. III. he said, there was a saving; and an all exception cannot be made of this, and both Houses have agreed it in substance already; the Command did in a speech delivered by the Speaker, and that we say we have not a thought to touch on the King's sovereignty; and why may you not add it in your petition?

Upon this report, Mr. Mayes spake his opinion in manner following:

IN our Petition of Right to the King's Majesty, we mention the laws and statutes, by which it appears, That no man, man, or the like, ought to be bound by the King, but by common assent of Parliament; that no man ought to be imprisoned but by the law of the land; that no freeman ought to be compelled to suffer soldiers in his house. In the petition we have expounded the breach of their laws, and so we may not suffer like, all which we pray as our rights and liberties.

The Lords have proposed an addition to this Petition, in these words:

We humbly present this Petition to your Majesty, not only with a care of preserving our own Liberties, but with a due regard to those rights that Sovereign Power, whereunto your Majesty is trusted for the Protection, Safety, and Happiness of the People.

wherein his Majesty is interested for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people.

And whether we shall consent unto this addition, is the subject of this day's discourse; and because my Lord-Keeper, at the last conference, declared that Lordships had taken the words of the petition apart, I shall do so too. The word, here, in a petition, is of the same nature as feeling in a grant, or aid of parliament; when a man grants but part of a thing he feels the rest; when he petitions to be relieved but partly, he leaves the rest; then in the end of our petition, the word, here, will imply, that something is to be left of that, or at least with a reference to what we desire.

The word, here, is very considerable; a Conqueror is bound by an Law, but hath power de re leges, his Will is a Law; and although I dissent the Conqueror, at first, to make his way to the Crown of England the more easy, and the petition of it more free, claimed it by title, but afterwards when there were no powerful pretenders to the Crown, the rule of conquest (to introduce that absolute power of a Conqueror) was claimed, and that Statute of Magna Charta, and other Statutes mentioned in our petition, do principally limit that power. I hope it is as lawful for me to cite a Joan, as it is for Dr. Moderatus to falsify him; Joan, in his first book, de Legibus, cap. 17. delivered his opinion in these words, Absolutio et tyrannica potestas Regum non est quæ per se male vel impie non fiat, sed et ex arbitrio hominum et ex antiqua consuetudine vel jure inter Reges et Regnum. And he further expresseth his opinion, That the King of Spain was to be absolute a Monarch, that he might lawfully impose tribute without consent of his people, and about two hundred years since, when it was concluded between him and his people, that without consent of his people by proxy, he should not impose any tribute. And Savero's opinion is, That by that agreement, the Kings of Spain are bound to impose no tribute without consent.

And this agreement that author calls a restraining of that foreign power; the Statutes then mentioned in our Petition, restraining that absolute power of a Conqueror; if we receive those Statutes, and say, we leave the foreign power intact, we do take away that restraint which is the safety and strength of those Statutes, and let at liberty the claim of the foreign power of a Conqueror, which is to be limited and restrained no less: thus may be the danger of the word, here.

The next word followed by the Lords as observable, is the particle, That; because it was said, that all foreign power is not mentioned to be left, but only (that) with which the King is troubled for our protection, safety, and happiness. But I conceive this to be an exception of all foreign power, for all foreign power is in a King, for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people. If all foreign power be excepted, you may easily judge the consequence, all Loans and Taxes being imposed by colour of that foreign power.

The next word is, Trusted, which is very ambiguous, whether it be granted, trusted by God only as a Conqueror, or by the people also, as King, which are to govern also according to laws, ex jure. In this point I will not presume to advance farther; only I like it not, by reason of the doubtful exposition it admits. I have likewise considered the proposition itself, and therein I have fallen upon the dilemma, that this addition shall be confirmed either to refer unto the petition, or not; if it doth refer unto the petition, it is merely useless and unnecessary, and unbefitting the judgement of this House and great assembly to add to a petition of this weight. If it hath reference unto it, then it doth not only the virtus and strength of our petition of Right, but our Rights themselves, for the addition being referred to each part of the petition, will necessarily receive this conclusion; That none ought to be compelled to make any Gift, Loan, or such like charge, without common consent, or Act of Parliament, unless it be by the foreign power, with which the King is troubled for the protection, safety, and happiness of his people.

That none ought to be compelled to borrow or borrow soldiers, unless by the same foreign power; and so of the rest of the Rights contained in the petition; and then the most favourable construction will be, that the King hath an ordinary prerogative, and by that he cannot impose Taxes, or impositions; that is, he cannot impose Taxes at his Will to employ them as he pleaseth; but that he hath an extraordinary and transcendent foreign power for the protection and happiness of his people, and for such purpose he may impose Taxes, or borrow soldiers as he pleaseth; and we may assure ourselves, that besides all Loans, Taxes, and borrowing of soldiers, will be laid to be for the protection, safety, and happiness of the people. Certainly hereafter it will be conceived, that an House of Parliament would not have made an unnecessary addition to this Petition of Right; and therefore it will be relieved, That the addition hath relation to the Petition, which will have such operation as I have formerly declared; and I the rather fear it, because the late Loan and Borrowing have been declared to have been by foreign power for the good of ourselves; and if it be doubtful whether this proposition hath relation to the petition or not, I know not who shall judge whether Loans or Impositions hereafter be by that foreign power or not?

A Parliament, which is made a Body of several Wills, may be dissolved by our Commission, cannot be certain to decide this question. We cannot relieve that the Judges shall determine the words of the King's Letter read in the House, expressing the cause of commitment may be such, that the Judges have not capacity of judgement, no Rules of Law to direct and guide their judgments in cases of that transcendent nature the Judges then, and the judgement, are easily conjectured. It hath been confessed by the King's Council, that the Statute of Magna Charta binds the King, and his foreign power cannot be divided from himself. If then the Statute of Magna Charta binds the King, it binds his foreign power. If to the petition these words be added, the exposition must be, that the Statute of Magna Charta binds the King's foreign power; saving the King's foreign power, I shall endeavour to give some answer to the reasons given by the Lords.

The first is, That it is the intention of both Houses, to maintain the full liberty of the Subject, and not to diminish the just power of the King, and therefore the expression of that intention in this petition, cannot prejudice us. To which I answer,

First, That our intention was, and is, as we then protested, and now man can assign any particular in which we have done to the contrary; neither have we any way transgressed in that kind in this petition; and if we make this addition to the petition, it would give some satisfaction, that we have given cause or colour of offence therein; which we deny; and which if any man conceive so, let him assign the particulars, that we may give answer thereto.

By our petition, we only desire our particular Rights and Liberties to be confirmed to us, and therefore it is not proper for us in it to mention foreign power in general, being altogether impertinent to the matter of the petition.

There is a great difference between the words of the addition, and the words proposed therein, viz. between just Power, which may be conceived to be limited by Laws, and foreign Power, which is supposed to be transcendent and boundless.

The second reason delivered by their Lordships, was, That the King is sovereign; that as he is sovereign, he hath power, and that that foreign power is to be left: for my part, I would have it so, as not to mention it; but if it should be expensed to be left in this petition, as it is proposed, it must admit something to be left on the King of what we pray, or at least admit some foreign power in his Majesty, in these privileges which we claim to be our right, which would frustrate our petition, and destroy our right, as I have formerly showed.

The third reason given for this addition, was, That in the Statute of Acting Privy Charter, there is a saving of the Right and Sovereignty of the Crown.

To which I give three answers: That Magna Charta was confirmed above thirty times, and a general saving was in none of their Acts of confirmation, but in this only; and I for no cause would follow one ill, and not thirty good precedents; and the other, because that saving produced ill effects, that are well known.

That saving was by Act of Parliament; the conclusion of which Act is, That in all those cases the King did will, and all those that were in the making of that ordinance did intend, that the Right and Sovereignty of the Crown should be saved: by which it appears, that the saving was not in the Petition of the Commons, but added by the King; for in the petition, the King's will is not expessed.

In that Act the King did grant, and part with, to his people, divers rights belonging to his prerogative, as in the first chapter he granted, That the people might choose three men, which might have power to hear and determine complaints, made against their that officiated in any point of Magna Charta, though they were the King's Officers, and to live and remain there. And in the 8, 12, and 14 Chapters of that Statute, the King surrendered other prerogatives, and therefore there might be some reason of the adding of that Sovereign Power, by the King's Council: But in this petition, we desire nothing of the King's Prerogative, but pray the enjoying of our proper and undoubted rights and privileges; therefore there is no cause to add any words, which may imply a saving of that which concerns not the matter in the petition.

The fourth reason given by their Lordships, was, That by the mouth of our Speaker, we have this Parliament declared, That it was far from our intention to encroach upon his Majesty's prerogative, and that therefore it could not prejudice us, to mention the same resolution in an addition to this Petition.

To which I answer, That that declaration was a general answer to a message from his Majesty to us, by which his Majesty expressed that he would not have his prerogative diminished by any new explanation of Magna Charta, or the rest of the Statutes; and therefore that expression of our Speaker was then proper, to make it have no relation to this petition, then being nothing therein contained, but particular rights of the Subject, and nothing at all concerning his Majesty's prerogative.

Secondly, That answer was to give his Majesty satisfaction of all our proceedings in general, and no man can assign any particular, in which we have broken it; and this Petition justifies itself, that in it we have not offended against the prerogative: And I know no reason, but that this declaration should be added to all our Laws we shall agree on this Parliament, as well as to this petition.

The last reason given, was, That we have varied in our petition from the words of Magna Charta; and therefore it was necessary that a saving should be added to this petition.

I answer, that in the Statute 3 E. III. 25 E. III. 25 E. III. and other Statutes, with which Magna Charta is confirmed. The words of the Statute of explanation differ from the words of Magna Charta itself; the words of some of the Statutes of explanation, being, That no man ought to be apprehended, unless by indictment, or due process of Law; and the other Statutes differing from the words of Magna Charta, in many other particulars, and yet there is no saving in those Statutes, much less should there be any in a Petition of Right. These are the answers I have conceived to the reasons of their Lordships, and the exposition, I apprehend, must be made of the proposed words, being added to our petition. And therefore, I conclude, that, in my opinion, we may not consent to this addition, which I submit to better judgements.

The Commons afterwards appointed Mr. Glanville and Sir Henry Martineau to manage another conference to be had with the Lords, concerning the said matter, and to clear the friends of the Commons in that point: The one argued the legal, the other the rational part.

Mr. Glanville's Speech in a full Committee of both Houses of Parliament, May 23, in the Painted Chamber at Westminster.

MY Lords, I have in charge, from the Commons House of Parliament (whereof I am a Member) to express this day before your Lordships some part of their desire, touching one point that hath occurred in the great debate, which hath long depended in both Houses. I shall not need many words to induce or raise the question, which I am to handle in this conference. The subject matter of our meeting is well known to your Lordships, I will therefore only look to far back upon it, and so far recollect summarily the proceedings it hath had, as may be requisite to present clearly to your Lordships consideration, the nature and consequence of the particular wherein I must insist.

Your

Your Lordships may be pleased to remember, now that the Commons in this Parliament have framed a petition to be presented to his Majesty, a petition of Right rightly composed, relating nothing but truth, defining nothing but justice; a petition justly occasioned, a petition necessary and fit for these times, a petition founded upon solid and substantial grounds, the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, free rocks to build upon; a petition bounded within due limits, and directed upon right ends, to vindicate some lawful and just Liberties of the free Subjects of this Kingdom from the prejudice of violations past, and to secure them from future innovations.

And because my following discourse must rest chiefly, if not wholly, upon the matter of this petition, I shall here cease leave shortly to open to your Lordships the distinct parts whereof it doth consist, and those are four.

The first concerns lives of men, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesty's supply; declaring, that no man ought, and praying that no man hereafter be compelled to make or yield any gift, loan, benevolence, tax, or such like charge, without common consent by Act of Parliament.

2. The second is concerning that liberty of person, which rightfully belongs to the free Subjects of this Realm, expressing it to be against the course of the Laws and Statutes of the land, that any Freeman should be imprisoned without cause showed, and then reciting how this Liberty, amongst others, hath lately been infringed, it concludeth with a just and necessary desire, for the better clearing and allowance of this privilege for the future.

3. The third declareth the unlawfulness of billeting or placing Soldiers or Marines, to lodge in free Subjects houses against their wills, and prayeth remedy against that grievance.

4. The fourth and last smeth at redress-touching Commissions, to proceed to the trial and condemnation of offenders, and causing them to be executed and put to death by the Law Martial, in towns and places, when and where, if by the Laws and Statutes of the Land they had deserved death, by the former Laws and Statutes also they might, and by no other ought to be, adjudged and executed.

This petition, the careful House of Commons, not willing to omit any thing pertaining to their duties, or which might advance their moderate and just ends, did heretofore offer up unto your Lordships consideration, accompanied with an humble desire. That in your wisdoms and justice, you would be pleased to join with them in presenting it to his Majesty, that by coming from the whole body of the Realm, the Peers and People, to him that is the Head of both, our gracious Sovereign, who must crown the work, as also all use labour is in vain; it might, by your Lordships concurrence and assistance, have the more easy passage, and obtain the better success.

Your Lordships, as your manner is in cases of great importance, were pleased to debate and weigh it well, and thereupon you propounded to us some few amendments (as you termed them) by way of alteration, adjudging, that they were only in matters of form, and not of substance; and that they were intended to no other end, but to sweeten the petition, and make it the more palatable with his Majesty.

In this the House of Commons cannot but observe, that fair and good respect which your Lordships have shewn in your proceedings with them, by your counselling or voting nothing in your House, until you had respected it unto them; whereby our meetings about this business have been justly filled free conferences, (either party repaying another discharged) to hear and weigh the other's reasons, and both Houses coming with a full intention, upon due consideration of all that can be said on the other side, to join at last in resolving and assenting that which shall be found most just and necessary for the Honour and Safety of his Majesty and the whole Kingdom.

And touching these proposed alterations, which were not many, your Lordships cannot but remember, that the House of Commons have yielded to an accommodation, or change of their petition in two particulars; whereby they hope your Lordships have observed, as well as you may, they have not been affected unto words and phrases, nor overmuch abating in their own ends; but rather willing to comply with your Lordships in all different things.

For the rest of your proposed amendments, if we do not mis conceive your Lordships, as we are confident we do not, your Lordships, of yourselves, have been pleased to relinquish them with a new sentence, for one only clause to be added in the end or foot of the petition, whereby the work of this day is reduced to our simple head, whether that clause shall be received or not?

This yielding of the Commons in part unto your Lordships, of other points by you somewhat insisted upon, giveth us great assurance, that our ends are one; and putteth us in hope, that, in conclusion, we shall concur, and proceed unanimously to seek the same ends, by the same means.

The clause proposed by your Lordships to be added to the petition, is this:

We humbly protest this petition is your Majesty's, not only with a care for preservation of Liberties, but with a due regard to Laws, where the Sovereign Power, whereunto your Majesty is intrusted for the protection, safety, and happiness of your People.

A clause phrases in few, and smooth in words, but in effect and consequence most dangerous, as I hope to make most evident; however, coming from your Lordships, the House of Commons took it into their considerations, as because them, and apprehending upon the fact debate, that threatened ruin to the whole petition, they did heretofore deliver some reasons to your Lordships, for which they then desired to be spared from admitting it.

To these reasons, your Lordships offered some answers at the last meeting; which having been faithfully reported to our House, and those debated as was requisite for a business of such weight and importance, I much joy truly as your Lordships, yet with due reverence to your opinions, the Commons are not satisfied with your arguments; and therefore they have commanded me to recollect your Lordships reasons for this clause, and in a fair reply to let you for the causes why they differ from you in opinion.

But before I come to handle the particulars wherein we differ from your Lordships, I will in the first place take notice yet a little further, of that general wherein we all concur; which is, that we desire not (neither do your Lordships) to augment or dilute the Liberties and Privileges of the Subjects beyond the just and due bounds, nor to encroach upon the limits of his Majesty's Prerogative Royal. And as in this, your Lordships at the last meeting expressed clearly your own opinion, so were your Lordships not mistaken in collecting the common sense and meaning of the House of Commons; they often have protested they do, and ever must protest, That there have been, and shall be the bounds of their desires, to demand and seek nothing but that which may be fit for lawful and loyal Subjects to ask, and for a gracious and just King to grant; for as they claim by Laws free Liberties for themselves, so do they acknowledge a Prerogative, a high and just Prerogative belonging to the King, which they intend not to diminish. And now, my Lords, being assured, not by strained inferences, or obscure collections, but by the explicit and clear declarations of both Houses, that our ends are the same; it were a miserable unshapeliness, if we should fall in finding out the means to accomplish our desires.

My Lords, the heads of those particular reasons which you insisted upon the last day, were only these:

First, you told us, that the word [leave] was of such a nature, that it could give no new thing to his Majesty.

2. That no just exception could be taken to the words [Sovereign Power], for that as his Majesty is a King, so he is a Sovereign; and as he is a Sovereign, so he hath power.

3. That the sovereign power mentioned in this clause is not absolute, or indefinite, but limited and regulated by the particle (that); and he word [subsequent] which restrains it to be applied only to protection, safety, and happiness of the people, whereby ye infer that, there could be no danger in the allowance of such power.

4. That this clause contained no more in substance, but the like expressions of our meanings in this petition, which we had formerly signified unto his Majesty by the mouth of Mr. Speaker, that we no way intended to encroach upon his Majesty's sovereign power or prerogative.

5. That in our petition we have used other words, and of larger extent, touching our Liberties, than are contained in the phrase whosoever it is grounded: In respect of which enlargement, it was fit to have fine expressions, or implied (aving, or narrative) declarations for the King's sovereign power, of which narrative you alledge this clause to be.

Lastly, Whereas the Commons, as a main argument against the clause, had much insisted upon this, that it was unprecedented, and unparalleled in a petition from the Subject, to insist a leaving for the Crown; your Lordships brought forth in answer to the contrary, the two Statutes of the 24 E. I. commonly called unparliamentary charters, and 24 E. I. known by the name of Armig's paper charters; in both which Statutes there are fairings for the King.

Having thus reduced to your Lordships memory, the effects of your own reasons, I will now, with your Lordships' favour, come to the points of our reply, wherein I must humbly beseech your Lordships to weigh the reasons which I shall present, not as the feint of myself, the weakest Member of our House, but as the genuine and true sense of the whole House of Commons, conceived in a business then debated with the greatest gravity and solemnity, with the greatest concurrence of opinions, and unanimity that ever was in any business maturely agitated in that House. I shall not, peradventure, follow the method of your Lordships recalled reasons as they answering to them, nor labour to urge many reasons. It is the desire of the Commons, that the weight of their arguments should recompense (if need be) the smallness of their number. And, in conclusion, when you have heard me through, I hope your Lordships shall be enabled to collect clearly, out of the frame of what I shall deliver, that in some part or other of my discourse there is a full and satisfactory answer given to every particular reason or objection of your Lordships.

The reasons that are now appointed to be presented to your Lordships, are of two kinds, legal and external; of which those of the former sort are allotted to my charge; and the first of them is this:

The clause now under question, if it be added to the petition, then either it must rest or relate unto us, or else not; if it have no such reference, it is not clear that it is needless and superfluous? And if it have such reference, it is not clear, that then it must needs have an operation upon the whole petition, and upon all the parts of it?

We cannot think that your Lordships would offer as a vain thing; and therefore taking it for granted, that if it be added, it would refer to the petition; let me beseech your Lordships to observe with me, and with the House of Commons, what alteration and qualification of the same it will introduce.

The petition of itself, simply, and without this clause, declareth absolutely the rights and privileges of the Subject, in divers points; and among the rest touching the liberties of men, by way of Loans or otherwise, for his Majesty's supply. That such loans and other charges of the like nature, by the Laws and Statutes of this Land, ought not to be made or laid without common consent by Act of Parliament: But when this clause is annexed with reference (to the petition), and it make necessarily conclude and have this exposition, That Loans and the like charges (true it is, ordinarily) are against the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, unless they be warranted by sovereign Power, and that they cannot be commanded or raised without assent of Parliament, unless it be by sovereign Power: What were this but to admit a sovereign Power in the King above the Laws and Statutes of the Kingdom?

Another part of this petition is, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not to be imprisoned without cause showed. But by this clause a sovereign Power will be admitted, and left entire to his Majesty, sufficient to control the force of Laws, and to bring in his new and dangerous interpretation, That the free Subjects of this Realm ought not by Law to be imprisoned without cause showed, unless it be by sovereign Power.

In a word, This clause, if it should be admitted, would take away the effect of every part of the petition, and become destructive to the whole; for thence will be the exposition touching the billeting of Soldiers and Marines in Free-men's houses against their wills; and thence will be the expedition touching the times and places for execution of the Law Martial, contrary to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm.

The scope of this petition, as I have before observed, is not to amend our laws, but to relieve us in the same than we were in before; whereas, if this clause be moved, instead of mending the condition of the poor Subjects, whose Liberties of late have been mutually violated by some Ministers, we shall leave them worse than we found them; instead of curing their wounds, we shall make them deeper. We have fed bounds to our defences in the great battles, whereas one is not to diminish the Pre-rogative of the King, by mounting it too high; and if we bound ourselves on the other side with this limit, not to abridge the lawful privileges of the Subject, by defending beneath that which is just, no man, we hope, can blame us.

My Lords, as there is mention made in the additional clause of foreign Power, I wish there likewise of a trait repaid in his Majesty, touching the use of foreign Power.

The word Trust is of great latitude and large extent, and therefore ought to be well and mainly applied and restrained, especially in the case of a King: there is a trait especially repaid in the person of the King of England, that that trust is regulated by Law. For example, when the King is made to prohibit things not well or fit, but only made prohibita, under certain forfeitures and penalties inaccrue to the King, and to the informers that shall sue for the breach of these; the Commons must and ever will acknowledge a legal and sovereign prerogative in the King, touching such Statutes, that it is in his Majesty's absolute and unshaken power, to grant dispensations to particular persons, with the clauses of non obstant, to do as they might have done before those Statutes, wherein his Majesty conferring grace and favour upon some, doth also do wrong to others. But there is a difference between those Statutes, and the Laws and Statutes wherein the petition is grounded: by those Statutes the Subject has no interest in the penalties, which are all the fruit such Statutes can produce, until by suit or information commenced he becomes entitled to the particular forfeitures; whereas the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our petition are of another nature: there shall your Lordships find us rely upon the good old Statute, called Magna Charta, which declareth and confirmeth the ancient Common Laws of the Liberties of England: These shall your Lordships also find as to such upon divers other most material Statutes, made in the time of King Edward III. and Edward IV. and other famous Kings, for explanation and ratification of the lawful rights and privileges belonging to the Subjects of this Realm. Laws not inflicting penalties upon officers, in male prohibita, but Laws declarative or positive, conferring or confirming, ipso facto, an inherent right and interest of Liberty and Freedom in the Subjects of this Realm, as their birthright and inheritance defendable to their heirs and posterity: Statutes incorporate into the body of the Common Law, ever which (with reverence be it spoken) there is no trust repaid in the King's foreign Power, or Prærogative Royal, to enable him to dispense with them, or to take from his Subjects that birthright or inheritance which they have in their Liberties, by virtue of the Common Law and of these Statutes.

But if this clause be added to our petition, we shall then make a dangerous overture to confound this good definition touching what Statutes the King is trusted to counsel by dispensations, and what not; and shall give an intimation to posterity, as if it were the opinion both of the Lords and Commons assembled in this Parliament, that there is a trait repaid in the King, to lay aside by his foreign Power, in some emergent cases, as well the Common Law, and such Statutes as declare or ratify the Subjects' liberty, or confer interest upon their persons, as those other penal Statutes of such nature as I have mentioned before; which, as we can be so much afraid, we believe assuredly, that it is far from the desire of our most gracious Sovereign, to affect to visit a trust, which being transmitted to a successor of a different temper, might enable him to alter the whole frame and fabric of the Commonwealth, and to dissolve that Government whereby this Kingdom hath flourished for so many years and ages, under his Majesty's most Royal Ancestors and Predecessors.

Our next reason is, that we hold it contrary to all course of Parliament, and absolutely repugnant to the very nature of a petition of Right, consisting of particulars, as ours doth, to clog it with a general Savings or Declaration, to the weakening of the Right demanded; and we are bold to renew with some confidence our allegation, that there can be no precedent example of any such clause in any past petition. This being well observed, by showing unto your Lordships the difference between a petition for the Law, and the Law ordained upon such a petition, and upon truly and petitionally the course that was holden in framing of Statutes before a Hon. V. different from that which ever since then hath been used, and is still in use amongst us, and by noting the times wherein these Statutes were made, which was about one hundred years before a Hon. V. besides the differences between these Savings and this clause; I doubt not but I shall give single satisfaction to your Lordships, that the Commons, as well in this as in all their other reasons, have been most careful to rely upon nothing but that which is most true and pertain.

Before the second year of King Henry V. the statute was that: when the Commons were factors for a Law, either the Speaker of their House by word of mouth from them, the Lords House joining with them, or by issue bill in writing, which was usually called their petition, moved the King, to ordain Laws for the redress of such mischiefs or inconveniences, as were found grievous unto the people.

To these petitions the King made answer as he pleased, sometimes to pass, sometimes to the whole, sometimes by denial, sometimes by assent, sometimes absolutely, and sometimes by qualification. Upon these motions and petitions, and the King's answer to them, was the Law drawn up and ingrossed in the Scrow-Roll to bind the Kingdom; but this inconvenience was lost in time, so that sometimes the Statutes thus framed, were against the sense and meaning of the Commons, as whole defers they were ordained; and therefore in the 2 Hon. V. finding that it tended to the violation of their liberty and freedom, whose right it was, and ever had been, that no Law should be made without their assent, they then exhibited a petition to the King, declaring their right in this particular: praying, that from thenceforth no Law might be made or ingrossed as Statutes, by additions or diminutions to their motions or petitions, that should change their sense, or intent, without their assent; which was accordingly established by Act of Parliament. Ever since then, the Right hath been, as the law was before, that the King taketh the whole, or leaveth the whole of all Bills or Petitions, exhibited for the obtaining of Laws.

From that statute, and from the time when first it became constant and settled, we conclude strongly, that it is no good argument, because we find Savings in Acts of Parliament before the first statute of Hon. V. that those Savings were before in the petitions that the first statute thenceforth, for if the petition for the two Loans so much insisted upon (which petition, for any thing we know, are not now extant) were never so absolute, yet might the King, according to the usage of those times, add to the Savings in his answers, which passing from them into the Statute-Roll, do only give some little colour, but are not proof at all that the petitions all were with Savings.

This much for the general; to come now to the particular clause of 25 of Edw. I. which was a confirmation of Magna Charta, with some provision for the better execution of it, as Common Law, which words are worth the noting.

It is true, that Statute hath also a clause to this effect, That the King, or his Heirs, from thenceforth should take an Aid, Tax, or Præfuge of his Subjects, but by common assent of all the Realm, leaving the ancient Aid and Præfuge due and accustomed.

This Saving, if it were granted, (which is not, nor cannot be proved) that it was as well in the Petition as in the Act; yet can it no way imply, that it is either in fact, or that the clause now in question should be added to our petition: for the nature and office of a Saving, or exception, was exempt particulars out of a general, and to ratify the rule in things not exempted, but is no fort to weaken or destroy the general rule itself.

The body of that Law was against all Aids, and Taxes, and Præfuges in general, and was a confirmation of the Common Law, formerly declared by Magna Charta, the Saving was only of Aids and Præfuges in particular, so well delivered and restrained by the words, except and excepted, that there could be no doubt what could be the else meaning and extent of that exception; for the King's Right to those ancient Aids, reserved by that Statute to be taxed to him, was well known in those days, and is not yet forgotten.

These Aids were three; from the King's Tenants by Knights service, due by the Common Law, or general custom of the Realm: Aid to ransom the King's Royal person, if unhappily he should be taken prisoner in the wars; Aid to make the King's wife for a Knight, and Aid to marry the King's eldest daughter once, but no more; and that these were the only Aids allowed to be levied to the Crown by that Statute, appeareth in these clauses by the Charter of King John, dated at Runnymede the 15th of June, in the fifth year of his Reign, wherein they are enumerated with an exclusion of all other Aids whatsoever. Of this Charter I have here one of the Originals, wherein I beseech your Lordships to cast your eyes, and give me leave to read the very words which concern this point. Their words (my Lords) are thus: Nullo foretium vel auxilium petentur in regno, nisi per commune consensum regni apertum, nisi ad vires regium rationabilis, et per consensum filiorum regum: nullum foretium, et ad filium regium per consensum filiorum maritandorum, et ad filium regium rationabile auxilium.

Touching Præfuge, the other thing excepted by this Statute, it is also of a particular right to the Crown to wit know, that it needeth no definition, the King being in possession of it by every day's usage.

It is so necessary out of wine before the malt, and another behind the malt, of every thing bringing in above twenty tuns of wine, and here discharging them by way of Merchandise.

But our petition consisted altogether in particulars, to which if any general Savings, or words amounting to one, should be annexed, it cannot work to confirm things not excepted, which are none, but to confirm things included, which are all the parts of the petition; and it must needs beget this dangerous exposition, that the Rights and Liberties of the subject, declared and demanded by this petition, are not their absolutely, but sub modo, not to continue always, but only to take place, when the King is pleased not to exercise that foreign Power, wherein this clause admitted, he is trusted for the provision, safety, and happiness of his people. And thus their birthright and inheritance, which we have in our Liberties, shall by our own devices be turned into a mere treasury at will and sufficiency.

Touching the Statute of 25 Edw. I. Antiqua forma Chartæ, the scope of that Statute, among other things, being to provide for the better observing and maintaining of Magna Charta, hath in it manifestly two Savings for the King; the one particular, as I take it, to preserve the ancient præfuge, due and accustomed, as of wines and other goods, the other general, freignery of the Crown in all things.

To these two Savings, besides the former statutes, which may be for the most part applied to this Statute as well as to the former, I add yet further answer to the first of these two Savings, as to the same præfuge of wines, which is recited in the 25 Edw. I. but in terms, mercatoribus, for which the word (auxilium) is especially annexed to the word (præfuge); which I take for so much to be in explanation of the former Law: And about their words (and of other goods) be added, yet do I take it to be but a particular Saving, or exception, which being qualified with the words (præfuge, auxilium, and mercatoribus), anyland) is not very dangerous, nor can be understood of Privilege or Liberties upon Goods of all Sorts at the King's Will and Pleasure; but only of the old and certain Customs upon Wool, Woolfells, and Leather, which were due to the Crown, long before the making of this Statute.

For the latter of the two Joins in this Act, which is of the more unusual Nature, and subject to the more Exception, it is indeed general, and if we may believe the concurrent Relations of the Histories of those Times, as well those that are now printed, as those that remain only in Manuscripts, it gave Dislike from the Beginning, and wrought no good Effect, but produced such Discontents and Troubles in the State, as we will may be borne in perpetual Observation, and that the like Joins in these and future Times may never breed the like Dislike: For from hence arose a Jealousy, that Magna Charta, which declared the ancient Right of the Subject, and was an absolute Law in itself, being now confirmed by a later Act, with this Addition of a general Join; for the King's Right in all Things by the Join was weakened, and that made doubtful, which was clear before. But not to depart from our main Ground, which is, that Joins in old Acts of Parliament, before the 2 H. V. are no Proof that there were the like Joins in the Petitions for those Acts, let me observe unto your Lordships, and do leave this Point, that about this Petition, wherein this Act of 23 Ed. I. was grounded, as perished, yet hath it pleased God, that the very Frame and Context of the Act itself, as it is now up, and entered upon the Statute-roll, and printed in our Books, doth manifestly import, that this Join came in by the King's Authority, and was one in the original Petition of the Lords and Commons; for it cometh in at the End of the Act after the Words (Et sic resti) which commonly are the Words of the Royal Assent to an Act of Parliament. And though they be moved and followed with other Words, as though the King's Council, and the rest who were present at the making of this Ordinance, did intend the same Join; yet is not that conclusive, so long as by the Form of those Times, the King's Answer working upon the Materials of the Petition, might be conceived by force to make the Law effectual, though varying from the Frame of the Petition.

The next Reason which the Commons have contended me to use, for which they still desire to be secured from adding this Clause to their Petition, is this: That offensive Law of 23 Ed. I. which confirmed Magna Charta, with a Join, relied not long in Peace, for it gave not that Satisfaction to the Lords or People, as was requisite they should have in a Case so nearly concerning them. And therefore about thirty-three or thirty-four of the same King's Reign, a later Act of Parliament was made, whereby it was enacted, that all Men should have their Laws, and Liberties, and free Customs, as largely and wholly as they had used to have at any time when they had them self; and if any Statute had been made, or any Customs brought in to the contrary, that all such Statutes and Customs should be void.

This was the first Law which I call now to mind, that reflected Magna Charta to the original Party, whereas it was first made, albeit it hath since been controverted about twenty times more by several Acts of Parliament, in the Reges of six and half just and gracious Kings, who were most apprehensive of their Rights, and jealous of their Honours, and always without Joins; so as it between 22 and 34 Edw. I. Magna Charta should be blighted with many Joins of the King's Rights or Sovereignty, which might be conceived to be above the Law; that Spain and Ireland was long since taken away, and cleared by these many absolute Declarations and Confirmations of that excellent Law which followed in after Ages, and to it flunck at this day purged and exempted now from any Join Joins whatsoever.

I beseech your Lordships therefore to observe the Circumstance of Time, wherein we offer this Petition to be presented to your Lordships, and by us unto his Majesty: Do we offer it when Magna Charta stands charged with Joins? No, my Lords, but at this Day, when latter and better Confirmations have vindicated and set free that Law from all Exceptions, and shall we now annex another and worse Join to it, by an unnecessary Clause in that Petition, which we expect should have the Fruits and Effects of a Law? Shall we ourselves relinquish or adulterate that, which our Ancestors took Care and Trouble to purchase and secure? No, my Lords, but as we should hold ourselves unhappy, if we should not amend the wretched Estate of the poor Subject, so let us hold it a Wickedness to impair it.

Whereas it was further urged by your Lordships, That to insert this Clause into our Petition, would be no more than to do that again at your Lordships Motion and Request, which we had formerly done by the Mouth of our Speaker; and that there is no Cause why we should recede from that which so solemnly we have professed: To that I answer and confess, it was then in our Hearts, and it is now, and shall be ever, not to encroach on his Majesty's sovereign Power. But I beseech your Lordships to observe the different Occasion and Reference of that Protestation, and of this Clause.

That was a general Answer to a general Message, which we received from his Majesty, warning us not to encroach upon his Privilege, to which, like dutiful and loving Subjects, we answered at full, according to the Integrity of our own Hearts; nor was there any Danger in making such an Answer in such a Manner, nor could we answer more truly or more properly. But did that Answer extend to acknowledge a Joins Join Join to the King, above the Laws and Statutes mentioned in our Petition, or to weaken the Liberties of the Subjects, thence declared and demanded? No, my Lords, it hath no Reference to any such Particulars; and the same Words which in some Cases may be fit to be used, and were unanimously to be entered, cannot in other Cases be spoken, but with Impudence at the least, if not with Danger. I have formerly opened my Reason, proving the Danger of this Clause, and am compassed to illustrate the Impenitency of adding it to the Petition by a familiar Case, which was put in our House by a learned Gentleman, and of my own Note. The Case is this, Two Masters or Lordships, by joining together, and purchase interposed, so as there is none directly to discern the true Breasts of either, as it may be touching the Confines where the Liberty of the Subject, and the Privilege of the Crown do border each upon the other, to the one of the Masters the King hath clear right, and as in actual Possession of it, but the other is the Subject's. The King being misinformed, that the Subject hath intruded upon his Majesty's Manor, albeit his Subject, whether he doth enter upon his Majesty's Manor, or pretendeth any Title to it, or any Part of it. The Subject being now justly offended, maketh Answer truly to the King, that he hath not intruded, nor will intrude upon his Majesty's Manor, nor doth make any Claim or Title to it, or any Part of it. This Answer is proper and true; say, it was unanimously and all done of the Subject not to answer upon this Occasion. Afterwards the King, upon Colour of some double or single Master of Record, thrust into his Highness's Hands, upon a pretended Title, the Subject's Manor: The Subject then emboldened by Possession of Right to his Majesty, in reason Reluctant of his own Manor, and therein length down Title to his own Manor only: Were it not improper and absurd in this Case for him to tell the King, that he doth not intend to make any Claim or Title to his Majesty's Manor, which is not questioned? Doubtless it were. This Case, rightly applied, will fit our Purpose well, and notably explain the Nature of our Petition.

Why should we speak of leaving unto the King's Sovereign Power, wherein we encroach not, while we only seek to recover our own Liberties and Privileges, which have been seized upon by one of the King's Ministers? If our Petition did trench directly upon any Majesty's Privilege, would our saying, that we intended it not, make the using otherwise than the Truth?

My Lords, there is nothing so Protestation or Declaration in the contrary of that which we have not done, and to put in such a Clause, cannot argue less than a fear in us, as if we had invaded it: which was held in our Intentions. And touching your Lordships Observation upon the Word (Joins), if it be not a proper Word to give any new thing to the King, sure we are, it is a Word dangerous in another Sense; for it may amount, without all question, to acknowledge an old Right of Joins Joins Joins in his Majesty, above those Laws and Statutes wherein only our Liberties are founded; a Doctrine which we most heartily crave your Lordships Leave freely to pursue against. And for your Lordships pressing, that Joins Joins should be requisite for Preservation of his Majesty's Joins Joins Joins, in respect our Petition search in larger Words than our Laws and Statutes wherein we ground it: what is that but a clear Confession by your Lordships, that this Clause was intended by you to be as Joins Joins Joins? For other Joins than this we find not tenders by you. And if it be fact, a Join, how can it stand with your Lordships other Arguments, that it should be of no other Effect than our former Expression to his Majesty by the Mouth of our Speaker? But I will not mix up Collections of this Kind; I will only show you the Reasons of the Commons, why this Petition needeth no such Joins, what the Words of their Statutes be exceeded in the declaratory Part of our Petition: these things that are within the Equity and true Meaning of a Statute, are as good Laws as those which are contained in the express Letter, and therefore the Statutes of the 23 Ed. III. 30 H. III. Edw. IV. and other the Statutes made in the Time of King Edward III. for the Extension of Magna Charta, which hath been so often recurred to in this Parliament, though they differ in Words from Magna Charta, had no Joins annexed to any of them, because there consisted more than was contained in effect in that good Law, under the Words, per legem judicium periam forem, non per legem nostram, which by these latter Laws are expounded to import, that none should be put to answer without Preliminary, or Matter of Record, or by due Process, or West Original: and if otherwise, it should be void, and holden for Error.

It hath not been yet shewn unto us from your Lordships, that we have in any of our Expressions or Applications limited or misapplied any of the Laws or Statutes wherein we do rely; and we are very confident and well assured, that an such misapplication can be assigned in any Point of our Petition now under question: If therefore it do not exceed the true Sense and Confession of Magna Charta in the subsequent Lines of Resolution, wherein it is grounded, what Reason is there to add a Join to this Petition more than to their Laws; since we desire so, transferring the Fruits of these our Labours to Posterity, not only for the Justification of ourselves, in Right of our present and their future Liberties, but also for a brave Expression and perpetual Testimony of that Grace and Justice, which we assure ourselves we shall receive in his Majesty's speedy and clear Answer? This is the Thing we seek for, and this is the Thing we hoped for, and this is the Thing only will settle such an Unity and Confidence between his Majesty and us, and will such a Character in the Hearts of all his loving Subjects, as will make us proceed unanimously, and with all Expedition to supply him for his great Occasions in such Measure, and in such Way, as may make him late at home, and feared abroad.

St Henry Martin. My Lords, the Work of this Day, wherein the House of Commons hath employed the Gentleman there spoke last, and myself, was to reply to the Answer, which it hath pleased the Lord-Keeper to make to those Resolutions, which we had offered to your Lordships Consideration, in Justification of our Refusal, not to admit unto our Petition the Addition commended by your Lordships. Which Reason of ours, since they have not given such Satisfaction as we desired, and well hoped, as by the Lord-Keeper's Answer appeared, it was thought fit, for our better Order and Method in replying, to divide the Lord-Keeper's Answer into two Parts, a legal and a rational: The Reply to the legal your Lordships have heard, myself comes interested to reveal, which also consisted of two Branches, the first deduced from the whole Context of the additional Clause, the second enforced out of some Part.

In the first were these Reasons, That the same desired our Acceptance, First, as satisfactory to the King, secondly, to your Lordships, thirdly, agreeable to what ourselves had often protested, and professed expressly by the Mouth of our Speaker.

I must confess their Motives were weighty and of great Force; and therefore, to avoid misunderstanding and misconception, which otherwise might be taken against the House of Commons upon the Refusal of the proposed Addition, it is necessary to state the Question rightly, and to lay down the true Difference between your Lordships and us. Now, indeed, there is no Difference in Question between your Lordships and us, concerning this additional Clause in the Nature and Quality of a Proposition. For so established, we say it is most true, and so to be received and embraced by us, in est de qualitate per se qualiter dicitur, yea, and were that the Question, we should add to the Addition, and instead of due regard, if we have had, here, and ever will have, a special and singular regard XVII. Proceedings against William Stroud, Esq; Walter Long, Esq; Jobn Selden, Esq; and others, on an Habeas Corpus, in Banco Regis. 1629. 5 Car. I.

ON February 23^d, the House of Commons being upon the debate of the petition of the petitioners, who had seized goods belonging to Mr. Roll, a Member of the House, dissolved themselves into a grand Committee, and at last resolved,
That Mr. Roll, a Member of the House, ought to have privilege of person and estate, but that the command of the King is so great, that they have it in their hands.

After which, the King's message, in justification of the farmers and officers of the customs, was taken into consideration, which was discussed warmly debated, and the Speaker being moved to put the question then proposed, agreed to do so, and said, That he was otherwise commanded by the King.

Then said Mr. Selden, Does not you, Mr. Speaker, put the question upon us as we stand yet? If you will not put it, we will put it, this we shall never be able to do any thing. They that say you say, they say, they say, the King's command is to do it. We do hereby the command of the King's order the House, and we say, by his Majesty's order, in the House, before which I am, appointed for my Speaker, and we say, before my Office.

Whereupon the House (in some heat) adjourned till Wednesday next.

On Thursday the 25th of February, both Houses, by Mr. Mordaunt's command, were adjourned until Monday morning the 28th of March.

Monday the 28th of March, the Commons sat, and upon the Speaker's putting the question, who said, I have a command from the King to adjourn till the 10th of the next, and put to laughter. And adjourning to go out of the Chamber, was notwithstanding held by some Members (the House knowing a dissolution till a proclamation was published in the House, 1. Against Force and Intimidation. 2. Against violence and power not granted by Parliament. 3. If any Merchant yield or pay tannage and poundage, not granted by Parliament, he should be reputed a betrayer of the Liberties of England.

Whereupon the King sent for the Serjeant of the House; but he was detained, the door being locked; Then he sent the Gentleman-Usher of the House, with a message; and he was refused admittance, till the last words were said. And then in such confusion the House was adjourned until the 10th of March. Nevertheless his Majesty, by Proclamation, dissolved the House of March, declares the Parliament to be dissolved.

Though the Proclamation was not published till the 10th and the day following. (The 11th of March) were dissolved from the Council to Daniel Hall, Esq; Sir John Herbert, Sir John Elliot, Sir Peter Heywood, John Rolfe, William Corbett, William Long, William Stroud, James Fiddler, Henry commanding their persons, appearance on the morrow. As which time, Mr. Holles, Mr. John Elliot, Mr. Corbett, Mr. Fiddler appearing, and refusing to answer out of Parliament what was said and done in Parliament, were committed close prisoners to the Tower; and Warrants were given (the Parliament being still in being) for the sealing up of the Studies of Mr. Holles, Mr. Selden, and Sir John Elliot. But Mr. Long and Mr. Stroud, who then, not for some time after appearing, a Proclamation issued forth for the apprehending of them.

The King purposing to proceed against the Members of the House of Commons, who were committed to prison by him in the Star-Chamber, called certain questions to be proposed to the Judges upon the 25th of March.

Whereupon all the Judges met at Serjeants-Inn by command from his Majesty, where Mr. Attorney proposed certain questions concerning the officers of justice of the Parliament-men committed to the Tower, and other persons: At which time, one question was proposed and resolved, viz. That the Statute of H. VIII. intitled, An Act concerning Richard Storde, was a particular Act of Parliament, and extended only to Richard Storde, and to those persons that had joined with him to prefer a Bill to the House of Commons concerning Timony: And although the Act be private, and extendeth to them alone, yet it was as more than all other Parliaments, by privilege of the House, ought to have, viz. Privilege of Speech touching their matters debated in Parliament by a Parliamentary course.

The rest of the questions Mr. Attorney was willing to set down in writing against another day.

Upon Monday following, all the Judges met again, and then Mr. Attorney proposed the following questions.

1. Whether if any Subject hath received probable information of any Traitor or traitorous attempt or intention against the King or State, that Subject ought not to make known to the King, or his Majesty's Commissioners, when threatened he shall be rewarded, and that the King hath rewarded, and the reward thereof, in the end the King hath informed, may prevent the danger? And if the said Subject is, upon a probable information, or is to inform the person which shall be dangerous to himself, or to the safety and defence of the realm, whether it be not a crime in law, punishable in the Star-Chamber, as an offence against the general Justice and Government of the Kingdom?

2. The resolution and answer of all the Justices, That it is an offence punishable as aforesaid, so that this do not concern himself, but another, nor draw him into danger of Treason or Contempt by his answer.

3. Whether it is a good answer or excusation, being thus interrogated, and replying in answer, to say, That he was a Parliament-man when he received the information, and that he spoke thereof at the Parliament-house; and therefore the Parliament being now closed, he refused to answer to any such questions but in the Parliament-house, and not in any other place.

4. To this the Judges, by advice privately to Mr. Attorney, gave this answer, That this excusation being in nature of a Plea, and an excuse in judgment, was not punishable, until he were over-ruled in an ordinary manner to make another answer; and whether the party were brought in De novo, or by information, for this Plea he was not to be punished.

5. Whether a Parliament-man, committing an offence against the King or Country since a Parliament was, might, after the Parliament was closed, be punished or not?

6. All the Judges, was then, answered, by might, if he be not punished for it in Parliament; for the Parliament shall not give privilege to any offence committed in Parliament, to exceed its bounds and limits at his place and duty. And all agreed, That whilst he be not so compelled out of Parliament to answer things done in Parliament in a Parliamentary course; but it is otherwise where things are done voluntarily, for these are not the acts of a Court.

7. Whether if any Parliament-man shall refuse, or two or three shall jointly conspire to single false Jurors, as witnesses against the Lords of the Council and Judges, not with intent to question them in a legal course, or in a Parliamentary way, but to blast them, and to bring them to hazard of the people, and the Government to contempt, be punishable in the Star-Chamber after the Parliament is ended?

8. The Judges replied, That the same was punishable out of Parliament, as an offence committed committed in Parliament, beyond the offer, and besides the duty of a Parliament-man.

There was another question put by Mr. Attorney, viz.

Whether if a man in Parliament, by way of derogation, and set upon any irregular writing or writing the same in Parliament, shall say, The Lords of the Council and the Judges had agreed to trouble in the Liberty of the Subject, and the Privileges of Parliament, be punishable or not?

The Judges desired to be spared to make any answer thereto, because it concerned themselves in particular.

The

* Roll = in the Collections, Vol. II. p. 374, says, There were several questions proposed to the three Chief-Judges about matters in Parliament, to which they gave their answers, which being somewhat different from what is above, are here inserted.

Question I. Whether a Parliament-man, offending the King criminally or contumaciously in the Parliament-house, and not then punished, may not be punished out of Parliament? Answer. We answer, That if a Parliament-man, exceeding the privilege of Parliament, do criminally or contumaciously out of the King in the Parliament-house (and not then punished) may be punished out of Parliament.

Question II. Whether if any Subject hath received probable information of any Traitor or traitorous attempt or intention against the King or State, that Subject ought not to make known to the King, or his Majesty's Commissioners, when threatened he shall be rewarded, and that the King hath rewarded, and the reward thereof, in the end the King hath informed, may prevent the danger? Answer. We answer, That the King hath the power of commanding of advertisements of Parliament, as well as of calling persons in, or out of any Parliament; but for the answer to this, we have no particular answer to this, and the next independent question, we refer ourselves to the president and both Houses.

Question III. Whether if any King do command an advertisement to be made, to have out of a person to receive and deliver a person, and so on, may not be punished out of Parliament? Answer. We answer, That the King hath the power of commanding of advertisements of Parliament, as well as of calling persons in, or out of any Parliament; but for the answer to this, we have no particular answer to this, and the next independent question, we refer ourselves to the president and both Houses.

Question IV. Whether if any King do command an advertisement to be made, to have out of a person to receive and deliver a person, and so on, may not be punished out of Parliament? Answer. We answer, That the King hath the power of commanding of advertisements of Parliament, as well as of calling persons in, or out of any Parliament; but for the answer to this, we have no particular answer to this, and the next independent question, we refer ourselves to the president and both Houses.

Question V. Whether if any King do command an advertisement to be made, to have out of a person to receive and deliver a person, and so on, may not be punished out of Parliament? Answer. We answer, That the King hath the power of commanding of advertisements of Parliament, as well as of calling persons in, or out of any Parliament; but for the answer to this, we have no particular answer to this, and the next independent question, we refer ourselves to the president and both Houses.

Question VI. Whether if any Parliament-man shall refuse, or two or three shall jointly conspire to single false Jurors, as witnesses against the Lords of the Council and Judges, not with intent to question them in a legal course, or in a Parliamentary way, but to blast them, and to bring them to hazard of the people, and the Government to contempt, be punishable in the Star-Chamber after the Parliament is ended? Answer. The Judges replied, That the same was punishable out of Parliament, as an offence committed committed in Parliament, beyond the offer, and besides the duty of a Parliament-man.

Answer. The Judges replied, That the same was punishable out of Parliament, as an offence committed committed in Parliament, beyond the offer, and besides the duty of a Parliament-man.

the very grief intended to be remedied by this Statute; so that he cannot answer according to Law. It appears that whenever the words are a felonious Act, treachery, or slander, or what is at all. The words are, — Subjacet contra Regem — this helps not, for subjacet contra Regem is against the King, against his Crown and Dignity; that which disturbs the Commonwealth is against the King; the old Doctrine in Judgment against the King, as is before said. In 28 H. VI. ubi supra, fol. 19. the Lords and Commons before the King, that William de la Pole may be committed for divers Treasons, and finally other heinous crimes; and the petition held not good, because too general, whereupon they exhibit particular Articles against him. And therefore upon the whole matter prayed, that Mr. Law might be discharged from his imprisonment.

On another day, Barley and Downer, the King's Sergeants, argued for the King, that this Return was sufficient in Law to detain them in prison. Barley began, and said, That the case is new, and of great weight and consequence; and yet, under favour, the Privilege of the King, and the Liberty of the Subject, are not mainly touched therein; for the case is not so general as it hath been made, but particular upon this particular return. The Liberty of the Subject is a round point, the right whereof is in Law, just, and civilised. The Privilege of the King is as high point, in which every Subject ought to subsist. I intend not to make any declaration at the use of the return, I will only remember what the King hath done upon them both, in his speech which he made upon the Petition of Right, to wit, that the People's Liberties strengthen the King's Privileges; and that the King's Privileges are to defend the People's Liberties. Thus may the hearts of the people concerning their Liberties. The way which I intend to take in my Argument, is, to answer the objections and reasons which have been made, and to give some reasons, whereby this Return shall be sufficient.

The objections which have been made are reducible to four heads: 1. By what the Prisoner here shall be said to be committed and detained. 2. That this Commitment is against the Petition of Right. 3. That the cause which is here returned is general and uncertain. 4. That the offences mentioned in the Return are not but feasible; and therefore, notwithstanding them, the party is bailable.

For the first, as hath been said, that the Commitment here was by the Lords of the Privy-Council, and the significations of this cause is by the King's Bench. But I say, that there is a further reason in the Return; for the Lords of the Council do it by the command of the King, and they only give the command. I will not dispute whether the Lords of the Council have power to commit an offender or no, it is common in experience, as in H. VI. 23. Page's case is express in it. And as the Petition of Right is admitted, that they may commit. And this is not alleged that for a grievance, but the grievance there was, because the particular charge of commitment was not fixed. Some Books have been objected to prove, that the King, though in prison, cannot commit any person; in H. VI. 1. Margaret de la Pole 182. But the authority of that Book is sufficient, as the case is put at last, which was in trespass for entering of the Defendant. The Defendant said, That the place where, &c. is parcel of the Manor of D. whereof the King is seised in Fee, and the King commands us to cut. And the opinion of the Court was, that this is no plea, without showing a specialty or the command of the King. And then the whole Court says, That if the King commands me to arrest a man, whereby I arrest him, he shall have trespass or imprisonment against me, altho' it be done in the presence of the King. That the following words are to be understood, that the principal cause was of one command of the King by word, and then such command by deed to arrest a man is void. And in H. VII. 4. was objected; Hagley says, that Arrestion does not arrest. But the Court said, that the King cannot arrest a man for trespass or felony, but he may if he do wrong, the party cannot have his action. To this I say, That the Book there is to be understood of a wrongful arrest, for there is spoken of an arrest of false imprisonment; and a wrongful arrest cannot be made by the King.

2. It stands not with the dignity of the King to arrest any man. Cole, 4. 75. The King makes a lease for years, reserving rent, with condition of no entry for non-payment; he shall take advantage of the condition without any demand; and the reason there given is, that a disseisin and conveyance might be observed. So it is not behoving for the King in person to arrest any man, but the King may command another to do it. Bracton lib. 2. de dispensatione 100. Arrestio, fol. 59. says, That the Crown of the King is to do justice and judgment, and facere fairs, without which the Crown itself cannot subsist. Several significations are to be made upon those several words, — and the last words — facere fairs — signify, that the King hath a coercive power. Bracton lib. 1. amongst the Estates. The King said, Because we are not sufficient in person to do every thing, we divide the charge into many parts. We use the people's Justice, and a Justice implies one that hath power to do Justice in every kind, to wit, by imprisonment, or otherwise. 20 H. VII. 7. Cole 11. 85. it is said, That the King is the Chief Justice. And Lambert, in his Justice of Peace, fol. 3. says, That in ancient times, the Chief Justice of England called Capitaneus Justitiarum or Princeps Justitiarum, after the King in England. So that the King hath the same power of Justice, as the Chief Justice had. That imprisonment, &c. which is before consideration for felony, is not used toward the Subject as imprisonment for any fault, but is rather an arrest or restraint to avoid further inconvenience. 14 H. VII. 8. A Justice of Peace may arrest men mutually assembled, for prevention of further mischief. And the Book also says, That he may have his servants there to arrest men, for safeguard of the Peace. It is a case well known, that if a house be set on fire, every man may pull down the next house, for prevention of a greater mischief; so it seems concerning the necessities of State, they ought to be restrained and suppressed, till when should be stirred up by them to the same confusion. 22. Ar 56. and in E. IV. 45. in false imprisonment the Defendant justified, because the Plaintiff was mad and out of his wits, and that he had done some harm, so that he had bound and kept him to avoid further harm, which might be happened by his mad acts, and the justification was held good. So in matter of Government; to avoid contention, the King ought to have coercive power against those that are enraged. The objection was, that this cause was against the Petition of Right. But I answer, That this cause is out of the words of that petition; the words of the petition were, — Whereas by the Statute called, the great Charters, and by the Statute of 28 E. III. no Freeman may be taken or imprisoned, — yet against the tenor of the said Statute, the divers of your Subjects have of late been imprisoned, without any cause showed; and when for their deliverance, &c. they were brought before the Justices by Writ of Habeas Corpus, there to undergo and receive as the Court should order, and their Keepers commanded to certify the cause of their detainer, and no cause was certified, but that they were detained by your Majesty's special command, signified by the Lords of your Council, and yet were returned back to several prisons, without being charged with any thing to which they might make answer according to Law. These last words are observable, — without their being charged with any thing to which they might make answer — these words do not refer to the return of the Habeas Corpus, for the cause returned therein cannot be transgressed, 9 H. VI. 54. but the Court took it as true. But the setting forth of the cause, and the answer to the same cause, is to be upon other proceedings, to wit, upon the Indictment for the offence, or otherwise. And there is a great difference between the return of a Writ to which a man may answer, and the return of an Habeas Corpus, 20 E. IV. 63. 3 H. VI. 11. 22. that the Sheriff return Rejoins, all testimonies of every circumstance ought to be showed; because it is fitting, that adding certain be brought into judgment. And upon showing of the grounds, as above, the Petitioner, that no Freeman in any fact may be as before is mentioned, be imprisoned or detained, just and a hath relation to such imprisonment, which is mentioned in the petition. And imprisonment mentioned in the Petition is, in which no cause at all was mentioned; then where any cause is showed, is out of the Petition, and that just is the word relative, appears by Cole 11. 62. where many cases are said to be to the same purpose, which see.

The third objection was, That the Return was general and uncertain. The Counsel on the other side had divided the words of the Return, but that is to offer violence thereto; for an explication shall not be made by fractions, but upon the whole matter. For the first words, — Arrestion — it hath been said, that the addition of the word Arrestion is but to make a fourth; But I say, That Arrestion is not the explication of the Return, but it only expelleth the nature of the offence; and yet Arrestion is a word observable by itself in the Law, and implies, that the thing is known and noted. By 27 E. 1. Shenley shall be punished, that let notorious offenders to bail; and by the Statute of 4 H. IV. cap. 3. a notorious or common Thief shall not make his purgation; and 26 E. III. 75. in a trespass for false imprisonment, the Defendant said, That the Plaintiff came into the Town of Hattingley, and because he was seen in the company of R. de Thelby, who was a notorious Thief, he, as Justice of Hattingley, took him upon suspicion. I confess, that — for contempt — in general, yes, it is genera generalization, and within the Petition of Right; but the words are, — Arrestion — it hath been said, that this might be by incorrect words or letters. — Arrestion — Arrestion — it hath been said, that this might be by contrivance to the King's Writ, or by Arrestion, as Barley's case is. To this I answer, that these words which are taken to one purpose, ought not to be worth to answer; and this is against the common meaning of the words. Cole 4. Thus are a murderer, the Defendant shall not afterwards explain it to be a murderer of Hares, for the highest murder is intended. So here, the highest Government is intended.

4. It hath been objected, that — for staying of Justice against us — may perhaps be but an offence feasible; but that words joined with the former words, these this to be an offence of the highest nature; Arrestion is a special contempt. And although Arrestion is itself may be but a general offence, yet here it is, — Arrestion against us, as our Government — which makes it particular. It hath been said by one, that argued on the other side, that there is a general in a particular. Cole 4. p. 75. Holland's case, there is the word general, and there is a general in particular, as the State Ecclesiastical. Thirdly, There is more particular, as the Colleague, Deans, and Chapters. This being in a case of Return upon Habeas Corpus, no precise certainty is required. In an Indictment, a certainty of all circumstances is required; in Pleadings, a certainty is required; in Cause, a more precise certainty is in Bars, a certainty to accompany intent is enough. There is not such precise certainty required here as in Indictment or Cause, because the party ought to answer unto them; nor so much certainty required in this as in a Bar. And the Return is not uncertain, for, as it is said in Plowden 102. and 193. a thing is uncertain, where it may be taken indifferently one way or the other. But where the statement is the one way exceeds the statement the other way, it is not uncertain as it is here. The words are, — for staying of Justice against us — and our Government, and for staying of Justice against us — have is a certainty of indictment one way. There are many Writs which are more uncertain than this Return here is, and yet good. The Writ concerning the taking of an Appellant in general, and facere habeat ordines; and yet there are more sorts of Appellations. In the Writ concerning the moving of a Leprosy, the words are general, and yet it appears by P. N. B. that there are two kinds of Leprosy, one outward, and the other inward; and for the latter, the Writ concerning moving a Leprosy. So the Writ concerning the burning of an Heretic, and concerning the burning of an Idiot are general, and yet there are sundry kinds of Heretics and Idiots. But it hath been objected, that Arrestion is not a law-word, nor known in the Law, of which the Judges can take no notice; but the words to express offences of this nature, are Murder, Treason, Felony, &c. and that notwithstanding of Arrestion generally was ever first. To this I answer, perhaps it is true, that no Indictment was ever so made, because the form of an Indictment is precise; words of a rare required to appear, as appears in Dyce 69. 204. Cole 4. p. 75. Arrestion is a law word, yet in 5 E. VI. Dyce 69. it is said, that Arrestion implies facere capere, altho' the contrary hath been objected, that Arrestion by periphrasis are sufficient. The Warrant of a Justice of Peace to apprehend J. S. because of prophane malefactions, interdict J. D. is good enough, although there needs the word interdict in 5 E. II. P. Trial 54. Arrestion says, That a sufficient shall suffice to bind. Out of which it may be gathered, that a man may be indicted for misdemeanors. And it seems likewise, that an Indictment of Arrestion may be good, for 19 of twelve, for a day, being allowed only to eat the food of the land of their origin, and to wear the dress of the country, and to be accompanied by a single companion and a single interpreter. The cause of this was the fear of the K'ang-hsi Emperor, who was then on the throne, that the Chinese might be deceived by the Tartars, and that they might be corrupted by them, and that they might be converted to their religion. The Emperor, therefore, ordered that the Chinese should be allowed to wear their own dress, and to eat their own food, and to be accompanied by a single companion and a single interpreter. The Emperor also ordered that the Chinese should be allowed to wear their own dress, and to eat their own food, and to be accompanied by a single companion and a single interpreter. The Emperor also ordered that the Chinese should be allowed to wear their own dress, and to eat their own food, and to be accompanied by a single companion and a single interpreter.

never looked after any of the Court, but fought a new and irregular way to be removed without them. The Lord Treasurer made a very honourable answer. That he would not move the King for Mr. Scobell to be removed by this means, until he sent him words, on his credit, that it was a legal way; and told that Judge, that Mr. Scobell was at the Judges' disposal, to remove back when they would, for it was not the King's meaning to do any thing contrary to the order of the Court, or their formal proceedings. So Writs were sent this Michidun Term to remove the four prisoners back again to the Margate.

The Case of Sir Miles Hildart, and William Stroud, Esq.

ON the 13d of January, the Attorney-General exhibited two several Informations, the one against William Stroud, Esq. the other against Sir Miles Hildart, Knight. The charge against both of them therein, was for several escapes out of the prison of the Gatesby: they both pleaded, Not Guilty. And their Cases appeared to be as followeth. The said William Stroud, and Sir Miles Hildart, were by the King's command committed to prison, for misdemeanours alleged against them, in their carriage in the House of Commons at the last Parliament. Afterwards in Trinity Term, Ann 6 Carol, both of them being by order of this Court, and by a Warrant from the Attorney-General to be removed unto the Gatesby; the Warden of the Margate (where they were before imprisoned) sent the said Stroud to the Keeper of the Gatesby, who received him into his House lately built, and adjoining to the prison of the Gatesby, but being not part thereof. After which receipt, the same night, he licensed the said Stroud to go with his Keeper unto his Chamber in Coventry, and there to reside. Sir Miles Hildart was also by the said Warden of the Margate, delivered to the Keeper of the Gatesby, but being sick, and abiding at his Chamber in Westminster, he could not be removed to the prison of the Gatesby, but there continued with his Keeper alio. Afterwards the Sick (as is intimated in London, they (with the licence of the Keeper of the Gatesby, as it was proved) retired with their Under-keepers to their several Houses in the Country for the space of six weeks, until Michidun Term next following, when by direction of the said Keeper they returned to his House; but in all that space it could not be proved, that they were in any part of the old Prison of the Gatesby, but in the new building thereto adjoining; unless when they once withdrew themselves to a Close-stool, which was placed near to the Parlour, and was part of the old Prison of the Gatesby. This Evidence was given to both the Juries, and both of them returned their Verdicts severally, That they were not Guilty, according to the information exhibited against them. And in this case it was debated at the Bar and Bench, whether by this receipt and continuance in the new house only, it may be said, That they ever had been imprisoned? And the Judges held, That this voluntary retirement to the Close-stool made them to be prisoners. They resolved also, that in this and all other cases, although a Prisoner depart from Prison with his Keeper's licence, yet it is an offence as well punishable in the Prisoner as in the Keeper. And Gatesby made this difference between breach of Prison and escape; the first is against the Keeper's will, the other is with his assent. But in both the Prisoner is punishable, whereas in the whole Court agreed. It was also resolved that the Prison of the King's Bench is not any local Prison, confined only to one place, and that every place where any Prisoner is released of his Liberty is a Prison: As, if one take sanctuary and depart thence, he shall be said to break Prison.

In the next Parliament, which met April 13, 1640, it was referred to a Committee, to consider of the breach of privilege by Sir John Finch (the Speaker), 5 Car. I. who refused to put the question by command of the House; and the Committee ordered to have matter of fact, and to report.

Monday, April 26. Mr. Treasurer reported, that Sir John Finch late Speaker did not say, He would not put the question; but this, He doth not put it: That he left the Chair not to display the House, but to stay for Majesty.

The House thereupon resolved, That it was a breach of Privilege of the House, for the Speaker not to obey the commands of the House; and that it appeared the Speaker did adjourn the House by command of the King, without consent of the House, which is also a breach of Privilege; it was therefore ordered, that this should be humbly represented to his Majesty.

But this Parliament being soon dissolved, viz. May 5, 1640, nothing was done for these Gentlemen; but in the next Parliament, which met Nov. 3, 1640, reputation was ordered them; as will be shown in the following Proceeding.

XVIII. Proceedings against Sir JOHN ELLIOT, DENZIL HOLLES, Esq. and BENJAMIN VALENTINE, Esq. for seditious Speeches in Parliament; in B. R. Mich. 5 Car. I. 1629 +.

SIR Robert Heath, the King's Attorney-General, exhibited informations in this Court against Sir John Elliot, Knight, Denzil Holles, and Benjamin Valentine, Esqrs. the effect of which was, 1. That the King that now is, for weighty causes, each a day and year, did summon a Parliament, and to that purpose sent his Writ to the Sheriff of Cornwall to chuse two Knights: by virtue whereof Sir John Elliot was chosen and returned Knight for Cornwall. And that in the same manner, the other Defendants were elected Burgesses of other places, for the same Parliament. And thence further, that Sir John Finch was chosen for one of the Citizens of Canterbury, and was Speaker of the House of Commons. And that the said Elliot publicly and maliciously in the House of Commons, to raise sedition between the King, his Nobles, and People, uttered their words, That the Council and Judges had all conspired in a league under for the Liberty of the Subjects. He further showed, that the King had power to call, adjourn, and dissolve Parliaments: and that the King, for divers reasons, had a purpose to have the House of Commons adjourned, and gave direction to Sir John Finch, then the Speaker, to move an adjournment; and if it should not be obeyed, that he should forthwith come from the House to the King. And that the Defendants, by conspiracy aforesaid, spake a long and continued speech, which was recited verbatim, in which were divers malicious and seditious words, of dangerous consequence. And to the intent that they might not be prevented of uttering their premeditated Speeches, their intention was, that the Speaker should not go out of the Chair till they had spoken them; the Defendants, Holles and Valentine, did violent hands upon the Speaker, to the great disturbance and disturbance of the House. And the Speaker being got out of the Chair, they by violence set him in the Chair again, so that there was a great tumult in the House. And after the said speeches pronounced by Sir John Elliot, Holles did recapitulate them.

And to this information,

The Defendants put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the Court, because seditious offences are supposed to be done in Parliament, and ought not to be punished in this Court, or in any other, but in Parliament.

And the Attorney-General moved the Court, to over-rule the plea to the jurisdiction. And that, he said, the Court might do, although he had not demurred upon the Plea.

But the Court would not over-rule the plea, but gave day to join in demurrer this Term. And on the fifth Day of the next Term, the second shall be read, and within a day after shall be argued at bar.

Held, Chief-Justice, said to the Counsel of the Defendants; So far light we will give you: this is no new question, but all the Judges in England, and Barons of the Exchequer, before now, have oft been assembled on both sides; and have, with great patience, heard the arguments on both sides; and it was resolved by them all with one voice, That an offence committed in Parliament, criminally or consensually, the Parliament being ended, recks punishable in another Court.

Now, it is true, that we all resolved, That an offence committed in Parliament against the Crown, is punishable either by the Parliament in another Court; and what Court shall that be, but the Court of the King's Bench, in which the King, by intendment, sitseth?

Whilome. The question is now reduced to a narrow room, for all the Judges are agreed, That an offence committed in Parliament against the King or his Government, may be punished out of Parliament. So that the sole doubt which now remains, is, whether this Court can punish it.

Greatly agreed, That it should be resolved by all the Judges, because otherwise there would be a failure of Justice. And by him, if such an offence be punishable in another Court, what Court shall punish it but this Court, which is the highest Court in the Realm for criminal offences? And perhaps not only criminal actions committed in Parliament are punishable here, but civil also.

Mr. Major of Lincoln's-Inn argued for Sir John Elliot, one of the Defendants. The charges in the information against him are these:

1. For Speeches.
2. For Contempts to the King, in retelling the Adjournment.

* Mr. Whilome, in his Memorials, p. 16. Gys. In the Year 1491. Some of the imprisoned Parliament-men, upon their Petition, were removed from the Prison whither they were, to other Prisons, to prevent the danger of the sickness then increasing. Sir Miles Hildart put in Petition for his good behaviour, and so was discharged from his Imprisonment.

Ann 1631. Sir John Finch died, a grave and learned Judge; he fell into the King's displeasure, charged by his Majesty for dividing constantly, and so plainly, with him, in the High Court concerning the Parliament-men: as if he had given his opinion to the King privately one way, and thereby brought him on the Stage, and there left him, and then was of another Judgment.

His opinion was contrary to all the rest of the Judges. That a Parliament-man for Misdemeanors in the House, criminally, and by his Office and Oath, might be only impeached, and not further proceeded against; which seemed very strange to the other Judges, because it could not appear, whether the Party had committed an offence, which he might be punished for by law.

The King discharged him of his service by usage, yet he kept his place of Chief-Baron, and would not leave it but by legal Proceeding; because his Patent of it was, Quous die sit poffit, and it must be tried whether he did non sit poffit, or not: He never sat in Court after the King's death, yet held his place till he died.

The King at first intended to proceed against the above Gentlemen in the Star-Chamber, to which matter an Information was exhibited against them in this Court, on the 7th of May; but that being dropped, they were proceeded against in the King's Bench, and the same matter in effect were set forth as in the Information in the Star-Chamber.

See the Information in the King's Bench, the Defendants's Plea, the Attorney-General's Demurrer, &c. at large, post.

3. For the same reason with the other Defendants, to detain Mr. Speaker in the Chair.

In the execution of these matters, he argued much to the same intent he had argued before, therefore his argument is not repeated very briefly.

1. For his Speeches, they are an matter of accusation against some great Persons of the Realm; and as to them, he said, that the King cannot take notice of them. The Parliament is a Council, and the Grand Council is of the King; and Councils are secret and close, none other have access to those Councils of Parliament, and they themselves ought not to impart them without the consent of the whole House. 2. A Jury in a Law, which is taken to require of officers within the full jurisdiction, are faster to keep their own counsel, so the House of Commons inquire of all grievances within the Kingdom, and their Councils are not to be reversed. And to that purpose was a proviso, 2 H. IV. an. 12. That the King shall not give credit to any private reports of these proceedings, to which the King assents; therefore the King ought not to give credit to the information of these officers in this case. 3. The words themselves contain several accusations of great men; and the liberty of accusation hath always been Parliamentary. 30 E. III. Parliament-Roll, an. 22. 23. Lord Latimer was impeached in Parliament for felony offences. 11 E. II. the Archbishop of York, 18 H. VI. an. 18. the Duke of Suffolk, 14 Mar. Dy. 33. the Duke of Norfolk, 18 H. VI. an. 18. as Vice-Chancellor, 2 E. VI. c. 18. the Lord Speaker, 28 of King James, the Lord of St. Albans, Chancellor of England; and 21 of King James, Crawford, Lord Treasurer; and 1 Cor. the Duke of Buckingham. 3. This is a privilege of Parliament which is determinable in Parliament, and not elsewhere. 11 E. II. an. 7. the Parliament-Roll. A Petition exhibited in Parliament, and allowed by the King, that the liberties and privileges of Parliament shall only be decided there, and not in other Courts, nor by the Common, nor Civil Law. (See this case more at large in Selden's notes upon Parliam. p. 42.) 11 E. II. Roll of the process and judgment.

An appeal of Treason was exhibited against the Archbishop of Canterbury and others, and there the advice of the laws of the one Law and the other being required; but because the appeal concerned persons which are Part of the Realm, which are not tried elsewhere than in Parliament, and not in an inferior Court. 28 H. VI. an. 18. These being a question in Parliament concerning process, between the Earl of Arundel, and the Earl of Devon, the opinion of the Judges being demanded, they answered, That this question ought to be determined by the Parliament, and by no other. 31 H. VI. an. 25. 26. During the protraction of the Parliament, Thus that was the Speaker, was out in execution at the fun of the Duke of York; and upon the re-assembly of the Parliament, the Commons made law to the King and Lords to have their Speaker delivered. Upon this, the Lords demand the opinion of the Judges; who answer, That they ought not to determine the privileges of the House of Commons of Parliament. 4. That accusation in Parliament is in legal course of Justice, and therefore the secular shall never be impeached. 17 H. VII. and 18 E. Dy. 285. Forgery of false Deeds brought against a Peer of the Realm, and John de Sandale witnesses, doth not lie, Child's Rep. c. 14. Case and Dyce's case, where divers cases are likewise put to this purpose. 35 H. VI. 19. If upon the view of the body the day or cannot be found, the Coroner ought to enquire, Who first found the dead body? And if the first finder accuse another of the murder, that is afterwards acquit, he shall not have an action upon the case, for it was done in legal manner. So it is the duty of the Commons to enquire of the grievances of the Subjects, and the cause thereof, and doing it in a legal manner, 19 H. VI. an. 8. H. IV. 6. is conspiracy it is a good plea, that he was one of the mischief. 20 H. VI. 5. that he was a great Jew-merchant, and informed his Companions. And 21 E. IV. 6. 7. and 25 H. VI. 14. that he was a Justice of Peace, and informed the Jury, 27 E. IV. 12. to be to the same purpose. And if a Justice of Peace, the first Finder, a Juror, or Indictor, shall not be punished in fees: Case, a Member of the House of Commons shall not, who, as 1 H. VII. is a Judge. 27 E. IV. 44. may be objected, where two were indicted of a conspiracy, because they maintained one another; but the reason of the said case was, because maintenance is a matter forbidden by the Law, but Parliamentary accusation, which is our matter, is not forbidden by any Law. Old's Rep. c. 56. there was a conspiracy, in procuring others to be indicted. And it is true, for there it was not his duty to prefer such accusation. (1) The accusation was extra-judicial, and out of Court; but it was not in our case. (2) Words spoken in Parliament, which is a legitimate Court, cannot be questioned in this Court, which is inferior.

3. H. III. 19. and Blunford 137. will be objected, where the Bishop of Winchester was arraigned in this Court, because he departed the Parliament without licence; then it was the opinion of Scrip, and the case was cited, P. 3 H. 19. And it is to be observed, that the plea of the Bishop, there, was never over-ruled. From this I gather, that Scrip was not content to his opinion, which was sudden, being in the first Term to which the plea was entered; or if he were, yet the other Judges agree not with him; and also at last the Bishop was discharged by the King's Writ. From this I gather, that the opinion of the Court was against the King, as in Pl. 20. in Fagg's case, where the opinion of the Court was against the King, the party was discharged by Peter-Saul, 1 and a Pl. 10. Mar. hath been objected, where an information in this Court was preferred against Mr. Powdrell, and other Members of the House of Commons, for departing from the House without licence. But in that case I observe these matters. (1) That this information depended during all the life of the Queen, and at last was pro deo, by the death of the Queen. (2) In the said case, no plea was made by the justification of the Queen, as here it is. (3) Some of them submitted themselves to the fine, because it was easy, for it was but 53s. 4d. But this cannot be urged as a precedent, because it never came in judgment, and no opinion of the Court was delivered therein. And it is no argument, that because at that time they would not plead to the justification, therefore we now cannot if we would. (4) Those offences were not done in the Parliament-House, but elsewhere by their absence, which the Country may take notice, but not of our matters done in Parliament. And absence from Parliament, is an offence against the King's summons to Parliament. 10 E. II. Parliament-Roll 13. Thomas Huchey was indicted of High-Treason in this Court, for preferring Petition in Parliament; but 2 H. IV.

an. 30. he preferred a Petition to have this judgment voided, and so it was, although the King had pronounced him before. And 2 H. IV. an. 104. all the Commons in one petition to the same purpose, because this tends to the destruction of laws and privileges. And this was likewise granted. 4 H. VIII. c. 8. Strad's case. That all condemnations imposed upon one, for preferring of any Bill, speaking, or raising in Parliament, are void. And this hath always been conceived to be a general Act, because the process, time, words, and persons are general, and the answer to it is general, for a general Act is always answered with, Le Roy et son conseil, and a particular Act with par son conseil. And 33 H. VI. 17. 18. a general Act is always involved, and so this is.

Secondly, For the second matter, the contempt to the command of the adjournment, See 18. it was questioned in Parliament, whether the King can adjourn the Parliament, (although it be without doubt that the King can prorogue it). And the Judges resolve, that the King may adjourn the House by commission; and 27 E. IV. it was resolved accordingly. But it is to be observed, that none was then impeached for moving that question. (1) It is to be observed, that they resolve, that the adjournment may be by commission, but not resolved that it may be by a verbal command, signified by another, and it derogates not from the King's Prerogative, that he cannot do so, no more than in the case of 20 H. VIII. 8. that he cannot grant one sort of land by parole. The King himself may adjourn the House in person, or under the Great Seal, but not by verbal Message, for none is bound to give credit to such Message; but when it is under the Great Seal, it is Toto Modo. And if there was no command, then there can be no contempt in the disobedience of that command. (2) In this, no contempt appears by the information; for the information is, That the King had power to adjourn Parliaments. Then put the case, the command be, that they should adjourn themselves: this is no punishment of the Power which he is supposed to have. The House may be adjourned two ways, to wit, by the King, or by the House itself; the latter in their own voluntary will, which the King cannot compel, for, Parlement is not so.

Thirdly, For the third matter, which is the conspiracy; although this be supposed to be out of the House, yet the Act is legal, for the members of the House may advise of matters out of the House, yet the House itself is not so much for constitution, as for proposition of them. And 20 H. VI. 24. it, amongst which an sworn to the King, may enquire of matters elsewhere. (1) For the conspiracy to lay violent hands upon the Speaker, to keep him in the chair; the House hath privilege to detain him in the chair, and it was but lightly and feebly, and other Speakers have been so served. (2) The King cannot procure an information for trespass, for it is said, the King ought to be informed by a Jury, to wit, by indictment, or presentment. (3) This cannot be any contempt, because it appears not that the House was adjourned by the King, then the Speaker ought to remain in the chair, for without him, the House cannot be adjourned. But it may be objected, that the information is, That all these matters were done maliciously and sedulously. But to this I answer, that this is always to be understood according to the subject matters, 15 E. IV. 4. and 18 H. VIII. 5. A wife that hath title to have Dower, agrees with another to enter, (which hath right) that the against him may recover her dower. This shall not be called Covin, because both the parties have right and titles. (2) It will be objected, That if these matters shall not be punishable here; they shall be unpunished altogether, because the Parliament is determined. To this I say, That they may be punished in the subsequent Parliament, and so there shall be no failure of right. And many times matters in one Parliament have been continued to another, as 4 R. III. an. 18. the Lord Berkley's case, 30 E. III. an. 185. 20 E. III. c. 15. 6 H. VI. an. 45. 6. 8 H. IV. an. 12. offences in the fourth ought to be punished in Eve, and Erres offences were not held but every third year. C. 10. dyble, and 35 E. III. c. 15. A Parliament may be every year. C. 6. in this Court cannot be reversed but in Parliament, and yet it was never objected, that therefore these shall be a failure of right. 25 E. III. c. 2. If a new case of Treason happen, which is doubtful, it shall not be determined till the next Parliament. So in Wylde, c. 28. where a new case happens, in which there is no Writ, they shall be made till the next Parliament. And yet in those cases, there is no failure of right. And so the Judges have always done in all difficult cases; they have referred the determination of them to the next Parliament, as appears by a E. III. 6. 2. B. III. c. 13. H. VI. an. 35. E. II. an. 25. the case of dower of a rent-chance. And 7. the Judges retain to deliver their opinions concerning the union of the two Kingdoms. The preface case is at great rare, and without precedent, therefore, not determinable but in Parliament. And it is of dangerous consequence; for (1) by the false return, all the Members of the House of Commons may be questioned. (2) The parties shall be disabled to make their defence, and the Clerk of Parliament is not bound to disclose those particulars. And by this means, the debates of a great Council shall be referred to a petty Jury. And the parties cannot make justification, for they cannot speak their words here, which were spoken in the Parliament, without slander. And the Defendants have no means to compel any to be witnesses for them; for the Members of the House do not use to discover the Councils of the House; for that they are debated of justification, evidence, and witness. Lastly, By this means, none will adventure to accuse any offender in Parliament, but will rather submit himself to the common danger; for, for his pains he shall be imprisoned, and perhaps greatly fined; and if both these be unjust, yet the party so vexed can have no recompense. Therefore, &c.

The Court. The question is not now, whether these matters be offences, and whether true or false. But, admitting them to be offences, the sole question is, whether this Court may punish them, so that a great part of your argument is tending to the present question.

At another day, being the next, Mr. Gifford (who succeeded Mr. Mafes, as Recorder of London) argued for Mr. Powdrell, one of the Defendants.

1. In general, he said, for the nature of the crimes, that they are of four sorts:

1. In Matter.
2. In Words.
3. By Consent.
4. By Letters.

Abstract

JAMES Lord Usher's details of the making of Lesbians, Columnies and Sandwich Spectres against James Marquis of Hamilton; the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Burgh; tending to the lowering of solitudes between his Majesty and the said Noblemen, are Majesty's loyal Subjects; in form and manner specify'd and set down in his Discourse.

Parlier, Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, Knight and Baronet, Advocate to our Sovereign Lord for his Highness's entries.

My Lord Advocate produced an Añ of Secret Council commanding him to pursue Verne Lord Ullswater, now entered upon panel for the Cause contained in his Dittay, of the which Añ of Council the tenor follows: And Halcyonathic Progrez adz de myle Novembere Ann Dom. M^ollym^o Somersone, Traggone prime. Forasmuch as the King's Majesty, by his Letter directed to the said Lords of his Privy-Council, having signified his extreme dislike and indignation against the said Verne Lord Ullswater, as being his best house to be kept in close ward, that he stryd and exasit as according to the Laws of this Kingdom, for some Informations given by him, reflecting upon some Noblemen and Councillors of the same, before what Judicatory and Judges the said Lords should think fit and competent for that purpose; and his Majesty having, to that end, sent down to the said Lords some depositions under the Lord Ullswater's own hand, and some other Informations, touching the said Verne Lord Ullswater, and his Majesty, because they blowe concern other persons. And the said Lords having read and considered the same depositions, and having taken into their consideration, which is the most proper judgment for trying and confuting of matters of this kind, they have all with one voice found; and by the tenor of this Añ, finds and declares, that the Trial and Confuting of the said Lord upon the particular aforesaid, is most proper and convenient to be done in this Court, and accordingly they have so ordained. Sir Thomas Hope of Grighton, Knt. his Majesty's Advocate, do hereon draw up the said Lord Ullswater's Dittay, and to pursue him minally thereupon, before his Majesty's Justice, upon the last day of January instant, and before his Majesty's said Advocate, to give a full copy of the same, the said Lord Uchtriville, heretofore and now of New-castle, under at night, to the intent he may have time to be advised thereunto, and to certify his Advocates, against his lawful defences competent to him against the same. Among the things whereof, the extra of this Act, shall be unto his Majesty's said Justice a Warrant, arrestum de Libris armorum foresti Camerli S. D. N. Regis, per me Jacobum Prymrosle Clericum capitulum sed me fisco et subscrivimus manibus, et subscrivimus James Prymrosle. After production and reading of the which Act of Council, my Lord Advocate also produced his Majesty's Letter, directed to the Lords of his Majesty's Privy-Council of this Kingdom, dated the 23rd of September 1671, together with two depositions of the Lord Uchtriville, the one dated the 20th of June 1671, the other upon the 24th of July 1671, and also several depositions made by Daniel Lord Rox, wherein two of the said dates are the 18th and 19th of June 1671, and the third upon the 24th of June 1671, all three copies thereof were in the hands of the deposition of the Committee of the Council of England. Of the which depositions and Letter above-written, directed by his Majesty to the Council, the same follows. In the first, the deposition made by Jonus Lord Uchtriville upon the 20th of June 1671.

THE Mid-Examiner faith, That on or about the 6th or 7th of May last, at the firm of the Bear near the Bridge-foot, the Lord Roe told this Examiner, that Soldiers and travellers did often hear hoarse clung's, where of those that frail at home had no notice; and said, he did believe there was a plot against this Lord. This Examiner witt'd him, if he had any good grounds to so think, that he should not fail to discover it. The Lord Roe said, he had no certain ground, but if he had say'd but five words longer in the Low Castle, he would have known the certain'y; and that he would have *hazard*ed his life but he would have had the circum

The 13th of May the Lord Ros came to this Examinant's Chamber, and there putting this Examinant in mind of the former Speech between them, he told this Examinant, that he had learned more certain than ever he had before from the Truth of their last Speech; whereupon he sent Page after Page to the Examinant, and this Examinant answered the Difficulty of it, and the Matter.

In the End his Lordship told this Examinant, that the Purposes of the Marquis of Hamilton's Letters (as divers of his Commissioners and Followers had informed him the last Lord Ros) was, that either they should not go out of England and Scotland, or if they did, they should return to England or Scotland, and surrender the King's Houses in Scotland, viz. the Castles of Edinburgh, Berwick, and Dunbar; and forty themselves in Leith, under the name of waiting, and should not be allowed, and so march forward into England. And this Examinant asking what could be their Intention to do so; the Lord Ros said, that he was informed they meant to take the King's Person, and to surrender him, to send the Queen into a Convent, and to captivate the young Prince with his Father, and to strike off the Heads of all the Principal Men about the King, both English and Scots. And in particular the Lord-Treasurer of England, the Earl of Arundel, Sir William Ashmole, and Sir Thomas Hope. And this Examinant being told before the Lord Ros discovered the Particulars, attended to this Examinant, this Examinant using Persecutions to him to reveal it, asked the Lord Ros what it might be, saying, it was either a French or a Spanish Faction. To which the Lord Ros said, it was neither; but told the Examinant what it was, and so revealed the Particulars in above-mentioned. Whereupon the Lord Ros being fully relieved to proceed to a further Discovery, and thinking it sooner to be done by this Examinant than by himself, left those whom it concerned might sooner be apprised, desired the Examinant to acquaint his Majesty or the Lord-Treasurer therewith.

The next Morning being Sunday the 14th of May at Night, this Examinant came to his Majesty with the Lord-Treasurer; but his Lordship being gone to Bed, by his Appointment, this Examinant came the next Morning, and told him, he had somewhat to reveal that concerned his Majesty, and all his Kingdoms and People. The Lord-Treasurer thereupon went instantly up to the King, and after the same Day, told this Examinant, that his Majesty had given him Commission to hear this Examinant's Relation. This Examinant further said, That the Lord Ros told this Examinant, that he had much of this beyond Sea from Robert Ashmole and David Rosely. But since his coming into England (as he told) he had spoken with Sir James Rosely, Sir James Hamilton, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, and Captain Douglas, and had gotten somewhat out of every one of them: He also said, he had spoken with the Lord Seyfford, and understood somewhat from him.

On Monday the 16th of May, this Examinant attended the Lord-Treasurer in Windsor, and entering into a Relation, in the very Beginning discovered, that the Matter which he was to relate concerned the Lord Marquis of Hamilton and his Adversaries, which to him he had named, the Lord-Treasurer continued him to say no more, until he had acquainted the King upon it, but told this Examinant that he and the Lord Ros should go privately to Greenwich, where the Lord-Treasurer would meet them. But the King being come towards Whitehall, this Examinant and the Lord Ros came back again, and were then appointed by the Lord-Treasurer to attend his Majesty on Tuesday at ten o'clock, which they did. This Examinant further said, That on Monday the 16th of May, this Examinant delivered to the Lord-Treasurer a List of Names, to represent to his Majesty the Strength of the Lord Hamilton's Party and Adversaries in London. At this Examinant's coming to his Majesty, this Examinant told the King, that the Baniens was a Treason intended against his Majesty, and the Party was the Marquis of Hamilton, so this Examinant was informed; and that it was the highest Treason that ever was intended, and was forty that any single Man should have a Hand in it, for it was a Shame to the whole Nation. And then the Lord Ros himself coming in, made relation to his Majesty, who remained him to the Lord-Treasurer, whereupon this Examinant coming to the Lord-Treasurer, and telling him the King had printed the List into him; the Lord-Treasurer said, that the Lord Ros would put his Relation in writing. Whereupon the Lord Ros and this Examinant went together, and sat up all Night; and the Lord Ros fell putting it into writing, this Examinant wrote it out of the Lord Ros's Papers, who on the Morrow brought the same to the Lord-Treasurer: But this Examinant was not then present; but the next Time that he came to the Lord-Treasurer, being asked by him whole the Hand-writing was, this Examinant said, it was his own Hand, and the Lord-Treasurer telling him that the Lord Ros had not subscribed it, this Examinant said, he would without doubt subscribe it. And about two Days after he brought the Lord Ros to the Lord-Treasurer, who read over the whole writing, and subscribed it by Name to it, saying, he would seal it with his Blood.

This Examinant further testified, That he told the Lord-Treasurer, that the Lord Ros told him, that he would put his Relation in writing, the Marquis should have the Face to deny it; which the Lord Ros then printed affidavit, inasmuch as the Lord-Treasurer said, There is the Baniens at an End, there needs no writing.

This Examinant further said, That on the Sunday Morning, when the Marquis of Hamilton came out of Scotland, the Lord Ros told this Examinant, that he had spoken with the Lord Seyfford, who assured him then he was to take the King, the Queen, and the Prince; and this Examinant asking how they should effect it, the Lord Ros replied, the Lord Seyfford had told him, they were great with the Earl of Dorset, who had the Command of the Prince. And this Examinant further said, That the Lord Ros told him, that he was assured by my Lord Rosely, that the Marquis and his Company would follow their Purpose, and my Lord Ros said, that James the Hamilton had taken from the Vent of the Baniens, and that Sir James Rosely had told him, he had 1500 Men in readiness upon Hear's Warning, but they should not come about London till their Business was ready ended, which this Examinant the same Morning acquainted the Lord-Treasurer, to the Intend that his Majesty might know thereof.

And further said, That shortly after the Lord Ros told him he had spoken with the Lord Seyfford, who told him, that the Matter which he had formerly told him concerning the Earl of Dorset, was but a trifling thing.

This Examinant further said, That on that Sunday Morning he with the Lord-Treasurer to advise the King, that he should go to London for more Safety; and understanding the King had sent for the Lord Ros, this Examinant with the Lord Ros went not far, because the Lord Ros was gone to the Lord Seyfford's to learn more. And further said, That the same week being in the End of the King's Dinner, this Examinant told the King in these Words: Sir, we now know the Baniens, but know not the Time; and therefore, Sir, either do or die.

Upon Free, my Lord Ros's first Examination on, 21st of June, 1631.

IN the Examination of Donald Lord Ros, taken the 21st of June, 1631, the said Examinant said, that having heard in Scotland from David Rosely, that things as are contained in the written Relation which hath been delivered to his Majesty, and before having heard in Parliament those Expressions from Robert Ashmole which are in the same Relation, this Examinant having a Resolution to come for England about December fall, was stayed in Denmark by Reason of the Ice, so he came not to Holland till about March fall, where he had Conference with David Rosely, and heard from him such other Particulars as are contained in the same Relation. And after coming into England, because David Rosely had told this Examinant, that he would write to the Marquis of Hamilton, how far forth the said David Rosely had treated with this Examinant, this Examinant expected that the Marquis would have taken thereof unto him; he did therefore labour to say any thing thereof, yet about two or three Days before the Lord Marquis went into Scotland, this Examinant did speak to the Lord Usher in this Purpose: That his Lordship was better acquainted than this Examinant with the Factions and Levers of this Land; and desired to know what Danger it was, if any Man bearing beyond Sea of Things that might be dangerous to the King or State, should speak of it.

To which the Lord Usher answered, No less than our Head and Estate. And thus was all risk passed between them at that Time, being the first Time they spoke thereof; and the Place was (as he thinketh) at the Lord Usher's own Lodgings.

He further said, That about eight or ten Days after, this Examinant coming to the Lord Usher's Lodgings to talk of some other Business, after Speech thereof, spoke to this Effect: My Lord, you remember I asked you a Question a while since, what the Danger might be, not to speak of Matters dangerous to the King or State, which he had heard beyond the Seas, and I would now again have your Advice thereon. And the Lord Usher perceiving his readiness to advise him, so as he might be acquainted with the particulars, this Examinant told him, he would acquaint him with the particulars, if he would leave him not to discover it but as he should direct; adding, That if he did otherwise, this Examinant would pay him. The Lord Usher then said, and proceeded, That he would not discover any thing but as this Examinant should appoint, whereupon this Examinant declared the particular to him, who hearing it, told this Examinant it was needless to be revealed, and doubted not that this Examinant had kept it too long already: But then this Examinant said, Considering it concerned one so near the King as the Marquis of Hamilton, he thought it not fit that this Examinant should himself break it to the King, left the King should at last speak it, but it would be better for some other to do it, and therefore desired his Opinion how to discover it. The Lord Usher advising a while, said, He thought it best it were discovered to some of the Privy-Council; who upon the Examinant said, That he would not discover it to any Person, but thought it best to reveal it to the Lord-Treasurer, because he thought the Lord-Treasurer was no way in the Plot.

According to which Resolution the Lord Usher (as he after told this Examinant) did, according as was agreed between him and this Examinant, repair to the Lord-Treasurer the same Night; but (failing then to speak with him, he went the next Morning, before this Examinant saw him, and returning, told this Examinant he had been with the Lord-Treasurer, and in general imparted to him, that he had a Matter to discover which nearly concerned his Majesty: And said further, that it was an English Baniens, but it was (to his own Shame he spoke it) a Scottish Baniens, and was a Plot to kill the King.

After the Lord Usher and the King were appointed to wait on the King at Greenwich, whither this Examinant coming, found the Lord Usher waiting with his Majesty, and then this Examinant coming in, made a full Relation to his Majesty, who asking this Examinant whether he had used himself told his Majesty sooner of it, this Examinant answered, That considering the secrets of the Marquis of Hamilton to his Majesty, this Examinant was afraid lest his Majesty would have been impatient towards this Examinant, and rebuke his Majesty to forgive this Examinant, if he had thought he had done himself therein. His Majesty thereupon referred this Examinant to the Lord-Treasurer, and bid this Examinant put the Relation in Writing. Whereupon that Night this Examinant wrote the Relation to the Lord-Treasurer, and this Examinant writing it first down, the Lord Usher wrote it in the King's Secret, out of this Examinant's Paper. And the next Morning brought the same written Relation to the Lord-Treasurer, and read it unto him, and left it with him. And a Day or two after, this Examinant and the Lord Usher came again together to the Lord-Treasurer, the Lord Usher having told that this Examinant had forgotten to sign it; and then this Examinant signed it, saying, he would make it good with his Blood.

At that Time this Examinant remembers the Lord Usher told the Lord-Treasurer, that this Examinant had more to say yet, which this Examinant did then also affirm; and the Cause whereof he did affirm it, was, because this Examinant had spoken with the Lord Seyfford, and had found Particulars from him, which he did not particularly tell to the Lord Usher, but offered to him in the general, that he would say no more; but a Day or two after, this Examinant went again to the Lord Seyfford, and spoke with him, and then he told the same, first to the Lord Usher.

He further said, That the Lord Usher, on Sunday Morning, told this Examinant, that he had been with the Lord-Treasurer, and had told him of the Particulars with the Lord Seyfford, and of the Marquis's Return, and that he conceived it might be dangerous at that time for his Majesty. But this Examinant told him, he had done ever so often, for there was no such Danger to be feared: And on the same Swadley in the afternoon, this Examinant coming to his Majesty, and hearing from him, that he had been adviser of some what importing matter of postest danger; this Examinant said, he had been with the Lord Swadley, but had not the certainty of things; his Majesty told him Majesty to give him leave to go again to the Lord Swadley, and then he would learn all. And at the same time his Majesty telling what danger had been suggested to him, now upon the Majesty's return; this Examinant perceived he knew nothing against the person of the Marquis; but that he was, for aught this Examinant knew, as good a subject as any the King had.

Copia Verba. My Lord Roe's second Examination, the 23rd of June 1633.

THE said Examination of Donald Lord Roe, taken the 23rd of June 1633. The said Lord Roe, having deliberately read the Examination of the Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 20th of the instant month, doth acknowledge the same to be true in all points, so far as the same concerneth the knowledge, words or acts of this Examinant, saving the explanation hereafter following: He saith, that as touching the conference between the Lord Uchiltrie and this Examinant the 19th of May last, where it is therein mentioned that this Examinant told him, that since the time of their last speech, he had learned more certainty than ever he had before; this Examinant did not say, that he had learned more certainty since their last speech, for in truth he had not learned any thing within that time. But thinks he might say, that he had learned more certainty since he came to England, than he had before; and therefore takes in, that the Lord Uchiltrie did mistake in that point.

And whereas in the same conference it is set down, that this Examinant should say that he was informed, that they meant to strike off the heads of all the principal men about the King; this Examinant said, that he was informed they would strike off the heads of the Spanish faction; and that he named the Lord Treasure, the two Bishops, the Earl Marshall, the Earl of Carlyle, Sir Francois Cotton, the Lord Montagu, Sir William Alexander, and Sir Thomas Hume, and likewise Sir Kenneth Duglas, and spoke of none other, neither in general nor particular; and saith, that he was informed touching the Spanish faction by Mr. Adelston, and Donald Raney; and touching the Scots by the Earl of Swadley. And saith, that Adelston and Donald Raney did name the aforesaid Englishmen to be of the Spanish faction. And whereas it is said, that this Examinant desired the Lord Uchiltrie to acquaint his Majesty or the Lord Treasure with the matter; this Examinant did desire him to acquaint the Lord Treasure, but did not mention his Majesty, but that it should come by the Lord Treasure to his Majesty.

He confessed, he said, that since his coming into England, he had spoken with Sir James Raney, Sir James Hamilton, and Capt. Duglas, and gotten somewhat out of every one of them; but did not say he had spoken with Alexander Hamilton, or gotten any thing out of him since this Examinant's coming into England.

This Examinant denieth, that he either said himself, or affirmed it being said by the Lord Uchiltrie, that he could say so much as the Marquis should not have the face to deny it; but said, he could being as honest a man as this Examinant, that would tell to the Marquis's face more than this Examinant would do; and thus he meant by the Lord Swadley.

He confessed that he said, Sir James Raney told him he had fifteen hundred men in readiness, but would not bring them together, till the parties in Scotland were full ready; and saith, Sir James told him as much, and that there were good officers, and the Earl of Essex, and the Archbishop of Glasgow were factors for some of them; and other than this, he spake not touching the 1500 men.

He saith, he was not acquainted with the list of the Names delivered by the Lord Uchiltrie to the Lord Treasure, nor had any thing to do therein.

Copia Verba. The second Examination of James Lord Uchiltrie, taken the 24th of June 1633.

THE said Examinant confesseth, that the understanding which he had of the business, concerning the Marquis of Hamilton, whom he hath been so often named, came to him from the Lord Roe.

He confesseth further, that the paper of Names which he did deliver to the Lord Treasure, was made by this Examinant himself, and the Lord Roe was not privy to the making of it, or to the delivery thereof to the Lord Treasure, till after it was done.

He saith, that the cause wherefore he did it was that paper mention the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent, was, for that the Lord Roe had told him, the Lord Marquis's followers had laid, the intent of the Marquis's letters was to invade Scotland. Being told, that the Lord Roe had been so far from charging the Marquis, that he hath affirmed before his Majesty, that for aught he knows, the Marquis is as good a subject as any the King hath; he is astonished, if in consideration and careful of the King's safety, and upon ground of the Lord Roe's relation, for the Lord Marquis's followers, he have gone any thing so far, he willeth his Majesty will impart it to his duty.

Being asked, why, in the aforesaid paper, he makes the Earl of Adelston, the Earl of Roxburgh, and the Earl of Southdown to be plotters, saith, that the Lord Roe told him, the Lord Swadley had affirmed it to him, that the Earls of Adelston and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and secret of the business. And further saith, the Lord Roe had told him, he could not guess who else should be in the plot, unless it were the Lord Swadley; of whom the Lord Roe said, he heard him speak terrible and pernicious words against the King, at his own table in Holland.

He saith, the Lord Roe did affirm to this Examinant, that he had the aforesaid report of the Earl of Adelston and Roxburgh from the Lord Swadley, before he, this Examinant, made or delivered the said Paper to the Lord Treasure: The said Examinant doth answer, that on the 13th of May, the Lord Roe had affirmed to him, that since their former speech, (which was the 5th or 7th of May) he had learned more certainty than ever he had before.

He confesseth, that whereas in his former Examination, he said, the Lord Roe told him, he was informed that they meant to strike off the heads of all the principal men about the King; he was mistaken in mentioning all, and did not well mark himself when he so expressed it; his purpose being to have said, they would strike off the heads of many; for so, he takes it, was the scope of the Lord Roe's speech.

Being told that the Lord Roe denieth, that he spoke with Col. Alexander Hamilton since his coming into England, he saith, it is so true, that this Examinant might mistake in adding that name to the rest, and therefore will not count about that. He doth avow, that in the presence of the Lord Roe, before the Lord Treasure, this Examinant said, the Lord Roe could say as much as the Marquis should not have the face to deny it; and was this Examinant said, the Lord Roe being then present, and hearing it, did not gainsay.

He saith, the Lord Roe told him, Sir James Raney said to him, that he had 1500 men in readiness, and the first next day, upon an hour's warning. But at a second time, the Lord Roe spoke of eight days waiting; and further, that he would not bring them to London till their business was ready.

Being acquainted with what John Maule, son to the Lord Roe, had confessed to have been told him by this Examinant, he doth acknowledge it, and that he said it to John Maule, after the Lord Roe and this Examinant had attended his Majesty about the same business, but did not think his speech thereof to John Maule should have done any hurt to the business.

Copia Verba. The third Examination of Donald Lord Roe, taken the 24th of June 1633.

HE saith, that the first time that the Lord Swadley had any speech with this Examinant, touching the Earls of Adelston and Roxburgh, being privy to the particulars and secrets of the Lord Hamilton's business, was on Monday after the Marquis's coming out of Scotland, and not before.

He further saith, that the Lord Uchiltrie having some speech with this Examinant, who might be like in Scotland to take arms, if the Marquis of Hamilton should take up arms; the said Lord Uchiltrie, and not this Examinant, named the Lord Roxburgh; whereupon this Examinant told him, that at the siege of the Begs, this Examinant heard the Lord Roxburgh use some words, whereby this Examinant took him to come male-content out of England.

The Tenth of his Majesty's Letter directed to the Lords of his Majesty's Council of Scotland

Charles R.
"RIGHT truly and right well-beloved Cousins and Counsellors; right trusty and well-beloved Cousins and Counsellors, and right trusty and well-beloved Counsellors, we greet you well. The Lord Uchiltrie having been examined before our Council here, touching some information given by him, reflecting upon some of the Nobility of that our Kingdom; we have been pleased to remit him thence, to be try'd according to the Laws thereof; having to this purpose sent you herewith inclosed some depositions under his own hand, and the authentic copies of others, whereof the principals we cause to be referred here, because they likewise concern other persons. Our pleasure is, that having given order for receiving and committing him to safe custody, you cause try and condemn him according to our said Laws, before what Judicature; and Judges you shall think fit and competent for that purpose, and for your so doing thereof shall be sufficient Warrant. Given at our Honour of Hampton-Court, the 24th of September 1631."

The Earl of Southdown, Brother-in-Law to the Lord Essex.

The Lord Essex.

The Earl of Winton.

The Lord Southdown.

The Lord Essex.

And Edinburgh Fifeshire near Newcastle 1633.

In presence of the Bishop of Dunblane, my Lord of Caithness, my Lord John Clerk, and Justice Duglas.

The which day James Lord Uchiltrie being present before the Lords Examinators above-named; and the list of Names before mentioned being Shrines, of the reading thereof, and of the Acts of Parliament let down in the proposition of the said Indictment. And because the falsification of the said Indictment is founded upon certain depositions made in England, in presence of five of his Majesty's Councilors, deputed by his Majesty to that effect, he therefore repeats the examinations of the Lord Treasurer produced yesterday, in process, dated the 20th and 24th of June last, with the three Examinations of my Lord Res's, whereof two are dated the 28th of June, and the third upon the 24th of June: And declared, that he used these depositions under the hands and subscriptions of the five Councilors of England, as authentic copies, which should make as good faith, as if the principal were produced.

It is alleged by Mr. Alexander Parry, as Prosecutor for the Panel, that it cannot, nor should not be proceeded against the Impanelled here in Scotland, but conform to the Laws and Statutes of England; the place of the Panel his office, (if any be) and not conform to the municipal Laws of Scotland. * Quia de jure Juxta original vel demerit * his res potest primum habundant delinquentiam extra territorium, nisi fecit * eundem personam impunitam a jure communi, vel secundum statuta loci * in quo delinquit non, sicut secundum legem ipsius loci original, vel * delinquent. * Julius Clarus, Quest. 85. Num. quarto.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, that the Allegation is no ways relevant, except the Panel will confeder to the relevance of the ditty; and of his own consent be content, that the same goes to the knowledge of an Affair. Next, it is answered by his Majesty's Advocates, that he opposes his Majesty's Letter direct to the Council, bearing, that the Impanelled shall be tried according to the Laws of this Kingdom. And in the one place it shall be justified, that his Majesty's Letter shall be grounded upon the Civil and Common Law.

It is answered there by the Lord Uchiltrie and his Prosecutors, that the King's Majesty's Letter is, and shall be understood, without prejudice, of the Panel's lawful defence.

Item, That the alleged Crime, contained in the ditty are, or perchance may be, lawful in England, and yet criminal in Scotland; and it carries no reason that the Panel should be punished here in Scotland, for say (as committed in England, not punishable by the Laws of England, where the Panel is now resident).

Answers, It is alleged by the Panel, that the falsification of the Indictment has no dependence upon the proposition thereof; because the particulars contained in the falsification are no ways the Lesings mentioned in the said Acts of Parliament, whereupon the proposition is founded, especially fixing the Lesings mentioned in the said Acts, as Lesings tending to discord between the King and his people; and the telling thereof is unlawful and prohibited. But the particulars of the ditty or indictment are no ways such. But by the contrary, the manner thereof seems as brazen Treason against the King's Majesty and Estate; in favour of both, proper public animosity, it is incumbent to every subject that shall hear speeches of such matter, though the matter itself be a lie and untruth, which it is to the hearer, neither does it belong to him, so judge or discern therein; it is incumbent, I say, to every subject incessantly to tell the fame, the telling whereof tends not to discord between the King and his people; but to suppose and prevent the same, and the chief cause thereof, which is Treason, and the not telling and revealing whereof is punishable by the Law of all Nations, by our municipal Laws and Acts of Parliament; yea, by the same Acts, whereupon the ditty is founded, viz. James VI. Parliament 14. cap. 205. And therefore, the telling thereof is no ways prohibited and punishable by the said Acts, neither are these particulars in the Indictment, the Lesings mentioned in the said Acts, which is evident, contained in the ditty. And which last Act being the last in time, as it satisfies, so it explains the true sense of the former.

And further, it is alleged by Gilbert Naylor, Prosecutor for the Panel, that not only by the former Act, of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. whereupon the ditty is founded, is there a secrecy laid upon the Impanelled, and all his Majesty's Lieges to reveal what they hear, concerning his Majesty's person; but likewise by the 13th Act of James VI's last Parliament, it is specially statute, that whoever hears any speeches to the harm or prejudice of the King's Majesty's Estate, shall with all diligence relate the same to his Majesty, or to some other of the King's Majesty's Officers, that may make the same manifest to his Majesty, with this special addition, that in case the ditty is not done, the prison officers, and not tiller, rewarder, shall incur the like punishment, contained in the said Acts, set down against the principal Lesing-makers. And so the Impanelled is necessitate, upon no less pain than his life and estate, to reveal the same. It is answered by his Majesty's Advocate, That this preceding defence can elude no part of the ditty, because the first part thereof asserts the lawfulness necessity of revealing of Treason is granted in the Ditty or Indictment. And if the Panel had contained himself within the duty of revealing, albeit the Plot and Treason revealed had been false, yet he would have deserved commendation and reward from his Master. But the Indictment is founded upon three particulars, to the which no answer is made, and which three particulars agree and quadrates with the material quality of the Lesings, contained in the Acts of Parliament, whereupon the ditty is founded. Because they are facts, as might have engendered discord between his Majesty and his loyal subjects, in so far as is qualified in the ditty, that the Impanelled having only had his relation from the Lord Res, and which relations had no warrant against the Marquis of Hamilton's person, as author or editor of the Treason, nor against the three Noblemen as Placiers, but depended on his own motives, yet relative relation to others, that is, from David Ransley, and Mr. Robert Alderman, of whose neither of them do relate any thing that could prove against the Marquis, but simply upon the speeches and report of those, whom they call his followers, or upon their imaginations, or possibly faith and perverie wilfuls, that the Noblemen who was employed for the levying of an army for aiding the King of Sweden, should employ his forces to the destruction of the King of Great Britain, these three persons, and Kingdom. Yet the Impanelled, which as he might have sufficiently express his loyalty duty to his Majesty, by bringing the fact and law to his Majesty, to make his own relation, did at the first appearance before his Majesty turn the uncertain report and relation to a positive speech, showing that the business was a Treason, and the party the Marquis of Hamilton. Next, the Panel, by his representation all written with his own hand, and delivered to my Lord-Treasurer of England, to be shown to his Majesty, he has exposed the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent, and the heirs of Haddington, Roxburgh, and Broughty, to be plotters; and he has added to the number of twenty or thirty Noblemen, as adherents to them. And last, when his Majesty had received this positive information, and was refreshed with appearance of the truth thereof, so as to add a spark to the fuel, the Motto was given, Sic, non either de oris, which words could not contain any other intension or event (if his Majesty had not been graciously and justly disposed), but either to have used some violent course against the Marquis's person and life, or to commit him so prison, and to cause him to make answer as to Treason, as Perjury; which is the condition of Traytors, both by the Common Law and by the Act of Parliament, made by King James II. Parliament 12. cap. 49. whereby it is ordained, that persons standard of Treason, shall be taken and remain in firmance, where they shall be Affine. And all the proceedings are directly contrary to the Act of Parliament, whereupon the ditty is founded, especially in relation to the Panel, by his deposition made the 24th of June, wherein he testifies, in relation to the Lord Res's last speech, that the Lord Res granted that he had no certain ground for the Treason alleged by him; and it is an heinous and odious fact, punishable by all laws, to turn relation into delation, and to be an author or adviser to a forty-eight Prince, to begin at execution before Trial. And all the particular points of the ditty are clear, and evident by the deposition of the Impanelled, made upon the 20th and 24th days of June; while are the true copies of the original and authentic depositions, made in the presence of five of his Majesty's Council in England; like as the copies produced and read in presence of the Panel, and his Prosecutors, are falsified by the said five Councilors; and also are declared by his Majesty's Letter, directed to his Council the 14th of September, to be true copies of the said depositions, whereof the principals are returned by his Majesty, for the falsification contained in the said Letter. And therefore ought to have full faith, as if the principals were produced, like as the Panel by his Acts de calumnie will not refuse, but that the representation containing the link of the names was given in by him, without the privity of the Lord Res, and also that he gave these words to his Majesty upon the Sunday after dinner, being the 23d of May, which was the last time day that the Marquis came from Scotland to England, and was to prefer him to his Majesty, viz. the purpose is known, the time not known; Sic, non either de oris in respect whereof the allegation ought to be repelled.

It is replied for the Panel by his Prosecutors, as to the particulars contained in my Lord Advocate's answer, they cease to answer him now in the general, saying they are upon the relevancy of the Ditty and Indictment, and last answer every one, figuraliter, as they lie in the indictment, facti.

To be, It is alleged for the Panel, that the Particulars contained in the Indictment are not Lesings; * quod referentur neque in genus referuntur, quantum quantum in lege est non fallit, sed fallitur, & quocumque * fallitur vel mendacit in soluti iure, id ad sua auctoritate referendum, 2. cap. 15. autem 22. Quest. 2. cap. 5. Item, Beatus Paulus ibidem, ubi dicitur, non mentiri cum quibus non fallitur, non habet quod est effinitive & formale mandatum, impositum filii & intencio fallendi. And the telling and revealing of the whisks matters aforesaid, * nellum habet in se delictum, sed est de natura boni, being commanded, and therefore in the hearer and relater, a professor omnis doli abstinere, quia pascere non debet, &c. And frequently such a byre as this, which foolishly concerns the King's Majesty and Estate. Whereof there was no great appearance, by the relation made by the Lord Res, while the Panel craves may be read to the Judge.

It is answered by my Lord Advocate, that if the defence means of the Treason related by the Lord Res, the Panel cannot be quarrelled for it, nor for telling thereof, albeit it were a lie. But the Lesings and Calumnies affirmed upon in the ditty, arises upon the contradiction, betwixt that which was related by the Lord Res, and that which was spoken and affirmed positive to his Majesty. And where it is alleged, that * mendacium est semper cum animo fallendi, that is, * in contrarietate inter intellectum & vocem ejusdem persone, where he thinks one thing, and speaks another, which is not our case. But mendacium est falsitas, ubi non est veritas, is the difference and the contrariety between the relation made by the Lord Res, and that which is related by the Panel; wherein the Panel was obliged, as a faithful subject, to make a simple or true relation, * sine Paraphrasi, sine Periphrasi, sine Interpretatione, vel Circumlocutione, & ut in Apophrasi vel exemplari committitur falsitas, it transgredidit diffinitio exemplari, its committitur falsitas ubi relatio positive referuntur, which is the Lesings, whereupon the ditty is founded. And where it is defined that the Lord Res's relation may be produced and read to the Judge, if it be meant of that relation which is subscribed by the five Councilors of England; and if the Panel will acknowledge it, to make faith as the principal, together with the remanent depositions of the Panel, and the Lord Res, which are all subscribed by the said five Councilors, and already produced and read to the Judge; the Panel shall receive satisfaction of his defence, otherwise not.

It is replied for the Panel, that the former allegation is to answer that part of the ditty, bearing the heads thereof to be forged and vented by the Panel.

Answers, It is alleged by the Panel, that as to the falsification of the ditty, bearing, that all the articles and passages of proceeding therein mentioned, were maliciously invented and passed by the Panel, which is qualified by the Panel's own deposition and alleged confession against himself, and by the Panel's deposition fixing the Lord Res, and the Lord Res's deposition bearing himself thereof; the qualification asserts not the Panel in the particulars to be a Lesing-maker, and to have forged lies.

First, For the Panel's own deposition, it infers the full contrary, to wit, that the Lord Res was the Panel's informer in all; so that the Lord Res's deposition against the Panel, prepared in the ditty; that infers not forging of lies against the Panel, neither can it the Lord Res's deposition have any force against him; fifth, because the Lord Res's report, and the Panel's a witness against him for the King, and whose deposition cannot be respeared against the testimony, made against himself, for the King's Majesty; and in effect it but a denial, which can neither liberate himself, nor weaken the Panel's deposition. Et testis in re propria dicitur testis non foretatoribus suo falsum esse, leg. 10. Cod. de iur. iur. Item, The Lord Ros's deposition made by him, not being sworn, and so is null of the Law; Quia testis non iuratus non potest esse fides factus, Leg. 10. Jurand. 1. non Cod. de iur. iur. 1. Leg. 10. Jurand. 1. non Cod. de iur. iur.

Item, The Lord Ros's deposition is made in the presence of the Panel, and is so made in publico, sed non de iuribus. Item, Although the Lord Ros were not party, he is not testis legalis: non potest.

Item, The Lord Ros's depositions produced cannot be respected, because they are in the principal published by my Lord Ros, his relations, and doublets from the Council. Et in criminalibus accusatio relationis est non operatur, Leg. 10. Jurand. 1. non Cod. de accusat. 1. de iur. iur.

It is declared by the Lord Archbishop himself, now upon Panel, that the depositions which he made in England, and published with his hand, are not his, themselves, as they were deposed, according to the relation and proofs of information, which he received from the Lord Ros. The reason of this is, which is ingrossed in the several depositions, being allowed and admitted for reconciling of any apparent contradiction, without prejudice of what explanation is the first deposition he may justly make for that he declares, that the alleged copies of the Panel's sworn depositions, under the hand of the five Counsellors, to far as his memory can serve him, are not different in the substance of them, from the original. But that there is no more in his depositions, nor that unlike the published copies certainly, that he cannot say. And thus his Lordship goes according to his journey, and in reverence of his Majesty's Letter, and Noblemen's harsh expressions.

My Lord Ros now takes testimony of the Impugner's declaration in that part, made by him, that the copies of his depositions made by him, under the hand of the five Counsellors, were different in substance, according to the Panel's memory.

Thereafter, my Lord Archbishop and his Prolocutor, cryed that the Lord Ros's relation made upon the 18th of May, which is under the hand of the five Counsellors, might be read to him, because he made to found excepted thereupon.

To the which, it is answered by his Majesty's Advocates, that he cannot be compelled to produce the said relation, in respect no part of the qualification of the Dutty is founded thereupon. And yet according to his former answer, says, if the Panel will acknowledge the same, as it is under the hands of the five Counsellors, to make as great force as the principal, he is content, that the said relation be read; y^e of the which relation the tenor follows.

The tenor of such passage, as I Donald Lord Ros have heard or learned, whereby I am my self drawn Severely, or his Estate, beyond Sea and elsewhere, as I will be ready to take my Oath upon, and seal with my blood against all opposers. Witness this 18th of May 1631.

IN the month of April, 1630, or thereby, as my coming from Sweden, I heard Colonel Alexander Hamilton, Brother to the Earl of Hamilton, Sir James Hamilton, son to the said Earl, Sir James Hamilton of Kinross, Nephew to the said Earl, and one Hamilton the Lord of who were all Officers under the King of Sweden then. But before my coming there, they had all called themselves, not having served our year.

At this time the Lord of Boylis, Lady's, my Lieutenant-Colonel, being Bed-fellow and Comrade to Sir James Hamilton son to the Earl of Hamilton, keeping a chamber in James Hamilton's a Brother's House in London, Lyndsay did inform me, that the reason why the Hamiltons had called themselves, was because their Chief, the Marquis of Hamilton, was to be a Soldier, and they would follow his fortunes. I asked Lyndsay who had told him so much; he told me, Sir James Hamilton of Popham, Hamilton's Son; and Lyndsay told me withal, that all these Hamiltons, and Sir James Hamilton, another Son of Hamilton's, had devoted themselves of their Fortunes and Estates, some of them to their friends, but the Earl of Hamilton's children to their father.

Moreover, Lyndsay told me, that Sir James Hamilton, Hamilton's second Son, had told him, that Sir James Spence, now Lord Spence, had directed Mr. Robert Midlam with Letters into England; and that thereafter they did expect David Ramsey with the head Cavalry to the Lord Spence, as Ambassador from the Marquis of Hamilton: And all the Hamiltons did expect David Ramsey's coming.

After Lyndsay did inform me, that Sir James Hamilton did desire him to join with them, and that they would give him a Regiment, which he did accept, and did give my consent, which I did yield unto.

After one or twelve days after we did hear from Downard, that there was an Ambassador coming from England, who proves to be David Ramsey; who did give himself out, all the way as he came, to be an Ambassador; which to prove, he did stand in competition with his Majesty, our dear Sovereign's extraordinary Ambassador Sir Thomas Roe; both the said Sir Thomas and David Ramsey encountering in the Town of in Downard: yet David Ramsey would never do so much as visit the other Ambassador. Upon which oversight I did question David Ramsey, whose answer was, he did not desire to be seen of any man that would discover him, affirming to his Cousin Sir Robert Arbuthnot (as David Ramsey told me) that no haughty man could live at home. David Ramsey, Colonel Alexander Hamilton, and Sir James Hamilton, attending their dispatch from the King of Sweden as Esquiers, were forced to reside with me in my ship, for at this time we are on a ship-board.

And one night drinking some healths, amongst the rest, the Marquis's health coming by course, I asked Col. Alexander Hamilton, the Marquis's Christian name, he answered me, James, by the Grace of God; Sir James which, King of Scotland: therefore his health called under that name, told I did take exceptions, and did desire them to alter their title; Sir James Hamilton answered mine, saying, it should be so, and did laugh. I did desire them to drink it more covertly, thus, The happy event of all God Intendeth; so David Ramsey said it should be so.

That night, after the two Colonels Hamilton went to bed, David Ramsey and I being alone on the benches above, David Ramsey and I drinking and smoking a Pipe of Tobacco, told me many shames in the Court of England: laying the whole blame upon the Lord-Treasurer. He told me, that the Marquis had sent him with a Challenge to the Treasurer, and that Papery and a violence had ever come the most part from the Bishops; and that there was nothing but a far but debilitation and change of Religion, and that the poor soul the King was blinded to his ruin; and that he had been plain with the King, till he did give him to see; therefore he said, he had read himself from thence, since so honest man could live there, and with many false discourses he laboured to persuade me. My answer was, The Lord amend those evils, and so remedy his goodness. By God, Donald, (said he) I will be your own physician. We must help God to amend it. He told me, he had brought as much Gold with him, as would maintain him at the rate of six pound a day for three years, and did assure me that before that time would expire, that God would raise up some men to defend his Church, and likewise himself from slavery. What he held out, that his Majesty at his parting with him, told him, that he would do with him as King Henry IV. said to Cardinal, I will think on thee in absence as present.

I answered I did desire one favour of him, that he would tell me if the Marquis of Hamilton would come over; he said, he would tell me to-morrow. The next night after I did receive from one of the Marquis's coming over, and he said he would. I asked him what content my Lord Marquis had at Home? He said none; for the King had forced him to marry a Wife, and to acknowledge her, who he said was a very brack.

I asked him of what Religion my Lord Marquis was? He said, a good Protestant, and hence it was long, he would let the world see his aim was the defence of his Religion. I told him, it did avail an little to make the Gospel a fair pillage in Germany, if we lost it at home. He said, there were many honest men on our land, and that the Marquis would set his army to ground them, which was his only aim. I desired him to go no further on with me; for I would not desire more trust of it, but that I would spend my blood in my Lord Marquis's guard. Well, my Lord, I will go on further, for my Master's secret as Man shall see.

The third night, on board as on before, he told me, that Alexander Hamilton and Sir James were to go for England, and he to Holland, yet if I had any thing to do in England, that he would be willing to do me service. I told him I had a mind to kick the execution of Orders from the King my Master, if the Marquis would mediate with my Master, for a were good for my Lord to have a friend in that place for his ends. He said, By God it was to be thought upon; and he did desire me to give him leave to think upon it that night. On the morrow, he and Alexander Hamilton did desire me to write a general Letter to the Marquis, with the two Colonels Hamilton, with great assurances of true friendship from their Master, if I would continue constant in resolution; I did give them my Letter, and it was sent.

In the month of July, a day or two after the taking of Surin, I did encounter Mr. Melin who came from England: after Salomon, I did ask him what news? He answered me, matters are much worse; the King grows greater wile to Papists and Arminians than before; that Cottingham was gone so long, poor with Spain, that Pendur was dead; that the Marquis govern'd all, and was made Keeper of Windsor, and was made Knight of the Garter, and was to be Admiral of England. He did ask me where his Cousin David Ramsey was; I told him he was gone for Holland, he did assure, what he had done: I did answer, that all was ended to his mind, and that Alexander Hamilton was to get Powder, Arms, and Munition with him from Sweden, to the Marquis. At their news, he did throw his Cap to the ground, and set a happy, calling aloud, Good news! good news! I am a happy man! I am happy and made for ever! I thank God my five years pains is not for nothing; good my Lord Ros, is this true? Yes, said I, for I have one double at the Contract, I am engaged in the business to David Ramsey, and Alexander Hamilton and Sir James Hamilton, and by Writ to my Lord Hamilton. O my Lord, (said he) that was the work of God and not man, to inspire your Lordship to go with us!

At that time I called Lyndsay looking to find one of Midlam; who told Lyndsay, that six thousand trained Soldiers would do the turn with their own fidelity in the Country.

The next day at Colonel Loft's Tent, I encountered Midlam, whom I did call out, and he told me that King Charles was good and created for nothing, but for defolations and undoing of Kingdoms, Religion, and People. There was no way but to surround him within a Wall or Dungeon for ever. I asked what way we might do that? He said the way was easy; first, after the men were lifted in Scotland, that they might take one month's time to learn to handle their arms at Leith, whereby any suspicion they then might rise on the Castles of Edinburgh, Berwick, and Dunbar, on one night, and upon Berwick, and having the Castle of Edinburgh, the Town did not rise; then so easily Leith; thereafter into England per force. I answered, the Plot was good if it held.

He told me further, that he was writing a declaration of the Justness of the Marquis's quarrel, with the tyrannical and suffering of the Church under King James in his last days, and now working ground under his Son, with the House not clear to the Crown, followed of all. But I did demand who I thought would take our parts; he said, he did know none of the best Estates in Scotland that would love and the well us. As also that the body of England was with us, and some of the Nobility and well of the Treasurer. The next day there came news of the birth of the Prince. I did ask Midlam if that would cool the Marquis's intentions; he smiled and said, not of the King and Queen of Bohemia will give their Daughter to the Marquis, as they had promised. It is true, said I? He answered, I should be ere it were long. That night I did desire Lyndsay to drink with Midlam, which he did, and Henry Mulgrave an English Gentleman was with them. Lyndsay told me on the morrow, he did thank Midlam to be the worst Secretary in the world, for he did reveal this last night all he did think. I do not remember the night's discourse; but do trust to Midlam's relation.

A week after, I did speak with Midlam again in Loft's tent, so he did desire me to walk forth, and told me he had been with Secretary Sedler, to whom heard or preside, that any Subject being necessitated by the Law to reveal what may concern the King's Majesty or the State, and revealing the same to his Informer therein, and constantly abiding therein, and willing to maintain the same upon any Testimony of Truth or Conscience; that the Revealer, upon the Party's demand, should be called in question of his Life, as the Deceiver and Forger, or the false to work any way against the Revealer; and which if it should now take place, and begin to be a preparative against the Panel; it were to give way and occasion to all treasonable Exploits, and that finally, because none would or durst reveal the same.

Next, as for the List of Names of the principal Agent and Plotters aspergished to the Lord-Treasurer the 16th of May, affirmed to be forged and invented by the Panel himself without any Warrant from my Lord Roe, conform to the Panel's deposition upon the 2. th and 24th days of June last, more of the Panel's depositions inconnu, in the which the Discovery comes, bear any such Confession or Forgery by the Panel; but bears especially the Lord Roe's relation to him in both the Panel's depositions, which is sufficient for an Informer.

It is added by the Panel, That whereas it is alleged by my Lord Advocate, that the Panel could never achieve any true Cause or Knowledge in the Lord's participation with the Lord Marquis's named private Agent, and the said Earls of Heddergh, Roxburgh, and Roxburgh, Plotters; because the Lord Advocate affirms, that the relation was given upon the 18th day, and the List presented to the Treasurer the 16th day, and so the Panel could have no just reason why these contained in the List, were not contained in the relation, which was given before. The Panel affirms, that hereafter the List was given in before, the reason thereof is this: The Lord Advocate making mention of his relation, delinquencies not be treated a relation by Word, and another by Writ; but it is, that my Lord Roe made relation to the Panel upon the 13th of May of the whole things contained in the Relation upon the 18th of May, as appears evidently by the Panel's 1st and 2d Depositions, and upon the 14th and 15th days my Lord JAMES Lord Usher, deposed of the Crimes foretold, contained in his Dittay.

Sir Thomas Hope of Craighall, Knight and Baronet; his Majesty's Advocate for his Highness's Entails.

Prolocutors in Defence.

Mr. Robert Nares.
Mr. Alexander Purkin, Gilbert Milles, } Advocates.

The said James Lord Usher by himself repeats the former first allegations, word by word, as it stands, and this is to me, that he can so say by in mele fide: That the Grounds of his representation preceded not his written representation he argues, as it is alleged, because the Lord Roe had omitted in his relation to make mention thereof; whereas my Lord Roe's facts cannot make the Panel guilty simply; neither can his conditions take away the strength of the Panel's Arguments of his innocence: For it was the Panel's part to follow him, and not to lead him; to reveal allegations, and not to induce allegations to him. Neither was the Panel under any just cause of fear that his omission could endanger him in the point; because he was conscious to himself, that my Lord Roe had told him the grounds of his representation before, viz. upon the 14th and 15th days of May, by verbal relation thereof upon the said days.

The Panel likewise knew that there was a forced relation wrote of sundry other particulars to be made by my Lord Roe subsequent; among the which he knew the Grounds of his preceding verbal relation of his representation was to be justified and cleared. So by their relations the Lord Roe's omission of the grounds of the Panel's representation out of his frigid relation, as tempore, can give no just ground to mislead or infringe the truth of the Panel's assertion. That my Lord Roe by verbal relation preceding both the representation and that written relation, had told him, that the Earls of Heddergh and Roxburgh were upon the Council and secret of the business informed against the Lord Marquis. The same last Argument holds good likewise for my Lord Roxburgh; and as to the representation in general, the Panel declares, That it was written and given in upon a Discourse of my Lord Treasurer's inquiry for the Friendship of the Marquis in Sardinia by Blood or Interest, whereby conjecture might be made of his power supplanting of his Friends had joined to him. And this is clear by my Lord Roe's relation, in naming it a representation, and not an information, accusation, nor relation. The general strain of the Writ likewise evidences, that there was no intent by that Writ to mislead in any thing concerning the Lord Marquis or those three Noblemen.

Because the representation containing one fifth and a half of paper, that which concerns these Noblemen originally will scarce take up two long lines. Whereby it is manifest, that the intent of the Panel was more to illustrate other things, viz. The alliance and interest in blood of his Noblemen to these first four, than any intent of either delating or inferring any crime or fact against these first four; but to distinguish by way of separation between the one and the other. And also 'tis to be said, the Panel asserts, that the mentioning of these Noblemen preceding the first four, be taken in no evil sense, but as a writ with no meaning to that effect, while the Panel, thinks Christian Charity will not presume, his Wife's Son, his Children's Brother, the pnp of his providence under God, and of his Wife and Children, the Earl of Cass being one, and the Marquis of Ilchester his Sister by his Mother, his good Dame, Brother's Son, who saved the Panel's Life, and for whom the Panel has ventur'd his life, or any of his; can it be presumed that the Impetunel would have intended malice to that Male, wherein these two helped to make up the confusion? Neither doth it appear by any Incent, that any thing was meant by the representation, but an explanation of Noblemen's power to Sardinia.

Voc. VII.

Roe renewed the discourse concerning my Lord Roxburgh, and explains himself in these particulars concerning the Earls of Heddergh and Roxburgh, named therein being upon the secret and Council of the Marquis's affairs. Then it was represented upon the 14th and 15th days, the Lord Roe and the Panel being both at Graham's, returned upon Monday morning, being the 16th day, to Leasgow, at which time the Panel went into the Lord-Treasurer, and there fell in discourse with the Treasurer on the business concerning the Marquis's Power as Sardinia, and his address with the Panel, and so drew his Lordship he would let him know a very great; and so came forward to the Panel's own House, and wrote the Representation, and delivered the same to the Lord-Treasurer, which was done upon the 16th day, being Monday. And where my Lord Advocate alleges, that there could be no ground for this representation before the giving in thereof from my Lord Roe's written relation, because the representation preceded it in so many, and the Plotters and the Panel, and the relation, which therefore followed upon the 16th of May, answers the verbal relation concerning the Plotters made by the Lord Roe; and so the Panel preceded the frigid relation given in to the Treasurer; and so the representation both, because done upon the 14th and 15th days of May, the representation being upon the 16th, and the written relation upon the 16th. Neither was it needful to the Lord Roe to make that relation in this paper, which he had made to the Panel before by word, like as there are sundry other things in the Panel's depositions, which are not to be done in that written relation. First, because in all the written relation, no mention is made of my Lord Roxburgh, or any thing proceeding from him, it is of nothing from him, why then of the Grounds of the Panel's representation, which was had from my Lord of Roxburgh.

The Justice commences all further discourses, and referring to this manner (by reason of the Interest of the Night) the Motion made at the 13th of December, and orders the Panel to be returned to Ward, to remain therein in the mean time; the Period also was not apud Adm to the more, all Persons under the pain of a theutical Mark.

Neither let this be thought any new invention, or new explanation; because it is mentioned before that alleged by my Lord Advocate in the same, and acknowledged thereby; neither can it be presumed, that these words, prime Agent and Plotters, can import any information of any thing, because all direct allegations must be in accusation, and must have some evidence to join the Subject and the Attributes together. Which is a confusion and contradiction of it want nomination; if no nomination, no affirmation, nor lie. But so it is, the Words prime Agent have no Primaries, nor the word Plotters imply has no Primaries between them as Attributes, and the person named as the Subject, and therefore no nomination, and affirmation, nor lie. And where my Lord Advocate in his Dittay affirms, that it is manifest by the Panel's own deposition, the truth of the Dittay; and in the dispute yesterday, produces a particular, that the Panel should have deposed, that the Lord Roe said, that he had no certainty of the business, this can so ways fortify the affirmation of the Dittay. Because the Panel's deposition lays out that the Lord Roe had certainty, but whether he had certainty or no, the words which the Panel's alleged was told to him by the Lord Roe; for the Panel's deposition demands not upon a scientia certa, but relativa veris, that he spoke it to the Panel, as he has deposed. As to the third Article of the Dittay, against the Panel's proceeding and speeches to his Majesty the 23d of May, to-wit, Sir, you know the business, but know not the time, Sir, either day or day; this Article enforces not upon the Panel lying to his Majesty. For the Lord Roe, and the Panel upon his information, both had acquainted his Majesty with the business, so that the Panel might truly say, Sir, you know the business; and it is as true, that the Panel knew not the time. As to the verbal et sic, that is a usual phrase of speech, and imports, Sir, for your favour, till these informations had been clear'd, and is of itself a faithful advice to his Majesty, and not a malicious Counsel, and advice for to prevent the King's Majesty's harm, and not to draw harm upon any other: like as the words themselves enforce not against the Panel, as the Dittay bears; but does very well admit a harmless veris, and should be interpret to the best meaning the words may admit. Quia de jure est in dubio et obsequi potest maxime et loquax sequitur. Legis non est de Regali jure et de obsequiis antichorum maxime forenti spontanea est que sui sui possunt. *Legis hoc videtur; et quoniam idem foris dicit forentis expresse, et persequitur sciendum est, quod est idem foris est, dedit autem eperum eperum rursus dicit de obsequiis to-wit, the revealing of particulars, he heard against the King and State. Deponit in parabolis equis forenti forenti interpretationem est. And therefore the Panel's speaking and whispering with the King's Majesty to see to his own safety, should be referred to his own cause, to-wit, the Panel's most burdensome duty and tender love to the King's Majesty, his welfare, and to the State of the Kingdom, fearing their faith, upon that relation that had been made to him. And also leaving his own faith, if that he should have been found any ways treacher or dark in not telling with his Majesty to prevent their evils and treasonable plots, in often related and repeated to him; and while the Panel then feared to have been Treason, and to have come beyond Sea. And should not be attributed, as the Dittay bears, to any malicious Counsel, or Purpose of the Panel, for inflicting, or turning up of his Majesty, to any sudden and violent assault against the Marquis's life and honour, or the Panel's suffered before God, to have been his true meaning. Like as he in his Examination in June, upon the 23th thereof, deposed, that upon Sunday Morning, which was that day he delivered to the King's Majesty with these former words, was, that he should go to London for more safety, and that the Panel had no other end of speaking of the words foretold.*

Now, The words et sic, can be no Lending, because they are not words of affirmation, but of counsel or advice.

As to the Paper of Names, which the Dittay affirms, the Panel has confessed to be made by himself, and that the Lord Roe was not privy to the

the making thereof on delivery of the same to the Lord-Treasurer; it is answered, these words made by yourself, is written with your own hand, so purposed to be by the Deputy itself, so that article anent the fill of names delivered to the Treasurer. To the writing of the whole paper with Pen and Ink, and to the instant delivery thereof, by the Panel to the said Lord-Treasurer, the Lord Roe was not privy, he not being present with the Panel at that time, but does no ways enforce, that the names and manner of that written paper was forged and devised by the Panel. But by the contrary, the Panel by his deposition, made the 20th of June, which bears, that after the Lord Roe had revealed to him the particulars, he desired the Panel to acquaint his Majesty, or the Lord-Treasurer therewith; leaving to the Panel his own free-will, whether he should acquaint him therewith by word or writ. Et sic avante spectatis qd. scilicet prefatus, who is no ways contrary to himself as his depositions; but whilst both faults in their own true facts.

As to the Article bearing the Panel in his Examination, being inquired for what cause he did name the Lord Marquis to be prime Agent; and that the Panel affirmed, that he could assign no true reason nor warrant from the Lord Roe; it is answered, that the Panel is not obliged to give any true cause. But that the Lord Roe's relation to him quasi pater is a sufficient Warrant.

Secondly, The Panel's deposition upon the 24th of June bears the contrary of the said Article, and assigns the cause to be, that the Lord Roe had told him, that the Lord Marquis's followers had laid, the intent of the Marquis's Levies was to invade Swedon or England. As also the Panel's Examination upon the 20th of June purports, that upon the 13th of May, the Lord Roe came to the Panel's chamber, and there putting the Panel in mind of their former speeches, told the Panel that the people of the Marquis of Holland's Levies, as divers of his Commanders and Followers had informed him, was, that either they should not go out of England or Scotland, or if they did, they should return to England or Scotland, and furnish the King's Ships in Swedon, viz. the Gallies of Switzerland, Strawing and Damier, and fortify themselves in Leith, under the pretence of training, and should take Swedon, and so march forward into England; and that the intention so to do, was, as the Lord Roe said, that he was so informed, and as the deposition in itself bears.

Thirdly, The Lord Roe's written relations of divers persons discourses to the same purpose, of the which he was informed by themselves; whilst written relations, although they be written on the 18th of May last, yet are of matters and purposes that passed long before, and related of before to the Panel by word, by the said Lord Roe.

Fourthly, The Lord Roe at his first coming to his Majesty in this business, in the Panel's hearing, being asked of the King's Majesty, why he had not told his Majesty before, that the Lord Roe had informed, because it seemed to him the Marquis of Holland, who was so near to his Majesty; he was afraid to communicate the same to his Majesty immediately, as the said Lord Roe's deposition taken upon the 21st of June purports.

Fifthly, The Lord Roe's deposition made upon the 21st of June, wherein he deposes, that he said he should bring as honest a man as himself, that would tell the Lord Marquis's face more so the Lord Roe would do; so all that the Panel speaks herein, was by Information, and so therein is no Forger, nor maker of Leavings.

Sixthly, The Panel's deposition, taken upon the 20th of June, bearing that the Panel told the Lord-Treasurer, That the Lord Roe told him, he had yet more, and would say so much, as the Lord Marquis would not have a face to deny; which the Lord Roe then professes affirmed, is as much as the Lord-Treasurer said, then is the business at an end, there needs no more writing. And this Article before repeated, the Panel affirms, that the Lord-Treasurer of England heard these words, and did affirm the same before the King's Majesty and Council of England, upon the peril of the Panel's head.

Item, As to the Article bearing the Lord Roe's declaration upon the 21st of June, that he knows nothing against the person of the Lord Marquis, but that the Marquis was as good a Subject as any the King had; it is answered thereto by the Panel, that his deposition and representation depends not upon the Lord Roe's knowledge, but upon his relation made to the Panel. And that declaration of the Lord Roe's takes not away the relation made by him to the Panel, and doth not infer making and forging of Leavings in the Panel without warrant from him; this specially being considered, for weakening and infirming of the Lord Roe's depositions to the Panel's depositions, that my Lord Roe having said these words in presence of the Treasurer of England, and justified by the Lord-Treasurer of England, in presence of his Majesty and Council of England, that the Lord Roe would say so much, as the Marquis should not have the face to deny it; and now he says, that he knows nothing against the Marquis's person: which are contradictory to himself, and renders himself not sufficient to improve the Panel's depositions.

Item, Here the Panel, in this place, repeats the objections of the nullities, made against the Lord Roe's depositions, so far as the same may be prejudicial to the Panel.

Item, As to the Article, bearing that the Panel being asked, by what warrant, he called the three Earls Pletores; and that he answered, that the Lord Roe had told him, that the Lord Seymour had affirmed so him, that the Earls of Arden and Roxburgh were acquainted with the particulars and secrets of that business; declaring therewith, that the Lord Roe had affirmed the same to him, before he gave in the paper of representation to my Lord-Treasurer. Albeit the Lord Roe, by his deposition the 24th of June, declared, that the first time the Lord Seymour had speech with him, anent the said two Earls, and their being given to the Marquis's business, was upon the Monday after the Marquis's coming out of Swedon, and not before; and so after the representation given in to the Treasurer upon the 16th of May, containing the names of the Pletores and Adhors; at which time the Panel could not truly affirm any information from my Lord Roe; to the which it is answered by the Panel, that he, by his deposition made the 24th of June, he declares, that all the understanding the Panel had in the business, came to him from the Lord Roe, also by his deposition the 20th of June.

Item, The Lord Roe's granting of the speech himself, anent the two Earls, makes presumption against the said Lord Roe, likewise for the time, Quia dicitur factis prepositis et rebus si non suis decesserint; neither is it probable nor ordinary, that there should be that signification of spirit in the Panel, as to prove what the Lord Roe should make to him so long before, Quia non prepositis, sed prepositis, per se est, quod monere est, fundam notari ante; ita dicitur prepositis. And to this article enforces not against the Panel, that he is maker and forger, because the Lord Roe deposes not simply, but the name of the Panel's depositions therewith, which is no Leaving.

Item, The Panel in his Examination upon the 20th of June, in the course and order of the depositions thereof, which, at the order of time, before the article anent the representation of the list of names to the Lord-Treasurer; he deposes, that the Lord Roe had told him, that he had spoken with the Lord Seymour, and had understood that from him; which general has no other meaning but that whilst he particularly, by the said Lord Roe's Examination upon the 24th of June, as that article thereof, bearing that the Lord Roe did affirm to the Panel, that he heard the aforesaid report of the two Earls, before the Panel made or deliver'd the paper of representation.

Item, The Lord Roe's deposition upon the 24th of June, bears not the Lord Roe to deny, that he did affirm to the Panel, that he heard the report of the said two Earls from the Lord Seymour, before the Panel made or deliver'd the paper of representation to the Treasurer. But purports, that the first time that the Lord Seymour had any speech with the Lord Roe, touching the two Earls, their being privy to the particulars and secrets of the Lord Holland's business, was upon Monday after the Marquis's coming from Swedon. And so that the Lord Seymour had not spoken with the Lord Roe therewith at that time; which is nothing to the Panel, whether the Lord Seymour had spoken with the Lord Roe or not. But denies not the aforesaid report of the two Earls made by the Lord Roe to the Panel, which the Lord Roe did then affirm, that he had the same by information of the Lord Seymour; neither is the Panel obliged to make good the Lord Roe's warrant herein, that the Lord Roe had the same by information of the Lord Seymour; but the question is, if the Panel heard the same from the Lord Roe, before the giving in of the representation to the Treasurer. Whilst the Panel affirms and shides at, conform to his depositions, made upon the 20th and 24th of June, so said is.

Item, The Panel here also repeats all the objections against the Lord Roe's depositions, et supra.

Item, Anent the Article, bearing, the Lord Roe to have told the Panel, that he could not guess who else should have been in the plot, unless it were the Lord Bowling; and that the Lord Roe, who by his deposition upon the 24th of June deposes, that the Panel, and not he, did name the Earl of Bowling, as one would take arms, as related to the Marquis: It is answered thereto, et supra, that the Panel by his deposition has declared, that all the understanding he had in the business, came to him from the Lord Roe; as the Panel's Examination bears, and which he shides at as most true.

Item, The Panel's deposition upon the 24th of June, bearing the Lord Roe told him, anent the Earl of Bowling, is not simply, but an easo, bearing the Lord Roe's reason, wherefore he named him; and while reason in substance is granted by the Lord Roe, although with force diversity of words, at the last not denied in his Examination upon the 24th of June. And therefore, the said Lord Roe's deposition affirming the reason, but denying the naming the said Lord Bowling, ought not to be credited in his depositions; but the Lord Roe's affirming of the reason, induces upon him the naming of the said Earl. Quia ratio easo dicitur prepositis et rebus si non suis decesserint.

Item, The Lord Roe's speeches to the Panel, anent the Lord Bowling, though considered, necessitate the Panel to the representation, and revealing of the same to his Majesty; especially being the Lord Roe strengtheneth the same with reason wherefore he is to prove, to wit, that he heard the Lord Bowling speak terrible and presumptuous words against the King's Majesty, at his own table in Holland; as the Panel's deposition upon the 24th of June purports, and which is granted by the Lord Roe himself in substance, at the least not denied.

Item, The Panel repeats here again all his objections against the Lord Roe's depositions; and alleges that it was never heard nor proved, that a Subject being necessitate by the Law, to reveal what may concern the King or State, and revealing the same with his informer therein, and constantly abiding thereto, and willing to maintain the same by any trial or torture, that the revealer, upon the party's denial, should be called in question of his life, or the same any ways work against the revealer. And whilst it is should now take place, and begin a preparative against the Panel, the same was to give way and occasion to all treasonable exploits; and that securely, because none would or durst deny the same.

And further, where it is affirmed by the Dixey, that in the last presented by the Panel to the Lord-Treasurer, there is delivered the Earls of Haddington, Roxburgh and Arden to be Pletores, the Panel had ground to make the relation, so ways affirming any thing positive, because in the Panel's deposition made the 24th of June, being examined and asked why in the aforesaid paper, he makes the said Earls Pletores.

It is answered in the deposition, that the Lord Roe had told the Panel, he could not guess who else should be in the Plot, unless it were the Earl of Bowling; which word Pletores, having had relation to the Earl's business, must also have relation to the other two Earls, seeing they were spoken of all at one time.

It is answered by his Majesty's Advocate, first, to the first Article of the fifth exception, anent the purging of the Panel's speech to his Majesty, upon the 17th of May: By this word that is subjoined, as the Panel is informed, whilst the premises for the Panel will have to be repeated in all the subsequent passages concerning the business; first, that this word, et sic is referred, cannot purge him, because he received no positive information from the Lord Roe against the Marquis, nor any warrant to call him Party, Prime Agent, and to affirm to his Majesty the business was known; to which last he subjects his Council, very dangerous for the life and estate of the Marquis; whereas there are reasons to infer against the Panel, an exceeding of the relation made to him by the Lord Roe, and the exceeding of it, with the Peril of the Nobleman, man, his life and estate; these being neither word nor passage in the Lord Res's written relation, which may either warrant those speeches, or infer them by consequence. And in matters of this high strain, as of Treason, no illation by consequence is permissible, but upon the peril of him that infers. For in all the written relation there is not a direct word spoken against the Marquis, neither by David Rainsford, nor by Mr. Robert Melbourn; but altogether false made and frantically uttered by Melbourn upon his own imagination, or with leave to him, for the difference of the illation, by expanding the manner how such an enterprise, according to his foolish opinion, might be performed; but not one word or syllable, that Melbourn heard in from the Lord Marquis, or from any who declared they heard the Marquis speak it. And as to David Rainsford, the worst word that is in his relation, is against the Marquis's misgovernment, and all the Marquis's aim was to save his Levy for the protection of Religion; which aim and intention the Lord Res, after his coming to England, clearly understood by the Lord Marquis himself, who employed him to be a Colonel in his company, and gave him this assurance, that he that would hazard with him in that glorious business for assistance of the King of Sweden, should make use of him, with the hazard of his fortune and estate; and none of these passages were contained in the speech given by the Panel to his Majesty; That it was a Treason, an odious Treason, and the Lord Marquis Party, as the Panel was informed, and that it was the likeliest Treason that ever was intended, and that the Panel was sorry that any Scoundrel should have fallen into it, it being a frame to the whole Nation: which is a positive affirmation, not as the Panel was informed, but as he himself did infer, upon the relation made to him by my Lord Res, who would give the Panel no assurance he had any certain ground, which is manifest by the Panel's deposition upon the 20th of June last. And as to the relation, albeit it is worded with these words (as he is informed) could give the Panel no warrant to express these positive speeches to his Majesty, upon the 17th of May, for he is to be considered as prime Agent, and known business, with the subsequent counsel. First, Because they are positively spoken without addition, (as he is informed), and where the proposer for the Panel says that these words as he is informed, must be repeated in all subsequent passages, that has some probability, in non continetur ad id, non una per se. But here the Acts are diverse, the dates diverse, the expression of willing identity, the ill being upon the 17th of May, the speech with the King, as he is informed, upon the 17th of May; and the speech of the known business with the Council being upon the 22d of May; and these three distinct arguments evidently charge the Panel with the excess of his duty. For he did all his duty that was required of him, as a faithful subject, when upon the 17th of May he presented his representations, he came to the Lord-Treasurer and told him, that he had a business to reveal concerning his Majesty, and whilst (as he said) concerned the Marquis of Hamilton's affairs, and that he had the name of the Lord Res after the whilst, he had no necessity as a loyal subject, to go further. And yet he goes on to the expression of all these speeches, and adds thereto his dangerous Counsel to his Majesty; which can have no respect to the Lord Res's relation, nor to the Panel's duty in revealing of it. And where the Panel would perch his giving in of the lifts first, because it is not an associative speech, per se non associatur, this is contrary to the representation, bearing the occasion is the Marquis of Hamilton as prime Agent; and then would be repeated in the subsequent word Plotters; the first being the Earl's ad Mirum, Rainsford, and P. Lewis Plotters. Whilst is a sentence that has a clear signification, affirming the attribute Plotters upon these three, in an evident and clear signification, as the clause subsequent, which states the whole Noblemen adherent by blood.

And where it is alleged, that albeit the Panel named the Lord Marquis prime Agent, he did alluringly upon intention to distinguish the Marquis, and the other three Earls from their of their Adherents in blood; and urges that this intention should be charitably expounded:

It is answered, that cum ex dictis non potest purgari bene intentionem. And if the points contained in the Dittay, whereupon the Panel is accused, be in their own nature criminal, they cannot be purged by a good intention, nor yet by a pretension affecting the time of the doing it. But the intention, with the fact and deed, are both alike judged odious, and punishable. Et nequeque profectus bene intentionis nisi probatur, ad abolendum crimen; as it is intimated, by Jus. Clarus de injuriis, in mentione factis injuriis. This intance being adduced, whilst by the opinions of all the Doctors cannot excuse the committers of the injury, and much less in this Dittay; which contains injuria capitalis, striking upon the life and fame of the Noblemen. Nemque defensor, jactans aliquem maleficio quoniam in manu ipsius non sit scilicet indicat, ut nota et constat perferre testem, quod est favorendum evincere; and charity can have no place here, without the offence of Justice, which craves the due punishment from the offender. And where it is alleged, that the Panel, not to warrant, both to name the Marquis prime Agent, and the Earls Plotters, by a verbal relation from the Lord Res, there can be no refusal but a verbal relation, except it were given to the Judge, especially in a matter non obsecranda. Neither can the Panel alledge to a verbal relation, to colour his behaviour therewith; because the Panel affirms, that their verbal relations were made upon the 14th and 15th of May; whilst precedes the relation exhibited in Writ, upon the 17th of May. In the whilst relation there is not a syllable of the three Earls as Plotters, albeit in the relation there is mention made of the speeches spoken by the Earl of Rainsford to the Lord Res. And the Panel having given in his list upon the 16th of May, and knowing the peril of adding or purging to that, whilst was related to him in a manner of this importance; which should have been as seriously handled, as the life, honour and safety of our precious Sovereign or in the care of the law; and the case to shew the branding of Noblemen with the odious appellation of his Treason, did require of him, on the other part; And cannot pretend a colour of excuse by the omission of the names of the said three Earls in the relation given in upon the 16th of May; especially for the relation in effect was his own deed, h. e. for he brought the Lord Res to his Majesty, to make the relation. And the Lord Res, in his relation to his Majesty spoke never a word of the three Earls; nor yet the Panel in his relation to the King's Majesty, and the Lord-Treasurer, spoke not a syllable thereof; whilst is clear by the Panel's deposition upon the 20th of June, which bears his relation, made in presence of the Councilors his Examiners; wherein is no word of the three Earls. And likewise by the Examination of the Lord Res upon the 21st of June, which is such like; and when his Majesty had remitted the Panel and the Lord Res to the Treasurer, who directed them to draw up the Lord Res's relation in Writ; the Panel confessed, that he and the Lord Res went home, and sat up all night, and that the Panel, after the Lord Res had put the relation in writ, did write the same over with his own hand, out of the Lord Res's papers. And yet not a word of the relation of the three Earls; which would not have been omitted, if it had been truly done. And where the Panel protests, that the omission thereof was in effect that the relation contains all that which was related by the Lord Res upon the 13th of May; but not that which was upon 14th and 15th of May, which was learned of the Lord Treasurer, that allegiance hath no warrant of the relation, nor yet any appearance at all; because in the Panel's Examination upon the 20th of June, the Panel doth confess that which was done upon the 14th and 15th of May; but not one word of the Earls, either in their first Examination he makes mention, that the Lord Res had in relation with the Lord Treasurer, and likewise in the Examination of David Lord Res upon the 21st of June, he says also the Panel's own deposition, scilicet, that the P. and two days after the relation, which behaved to be upon the 20th of May (relation being upon the 18th), the Panel brought the Lord Res to the Treasurer, and caused him to subscribe his relation; at which time the Panel told the Lord Treasurer, that the Lord Res had more to say; whereupon the Lord Res being asked what it was, and wherefore retained, the Lord Res answered, that he had spoken with the Lord Treasurer, and had ready particulars from him, which he did not tell to the Lord Treasurer in particular, but generally allowed to him he would say more. But one or two days after, the Lord Res went to the Earl of Seferby, and then told the same, first to the Panel. And that the Panel, upon the Sunday of the Morning (which was the day of the Marquis's returning from Scotland) he had told the Lord Treasurer these particulars, spoken by the Lord Treasurer, and therewith also of the Marquis's return; whereby it is clear, that as nothing is contained in the relation touching the three Earls, neither in the verbal relation to his Majesty and Lord Treasurer, nor in the subscribed relation; for the speeches therewith spoken by the Lord Res to the Panel, was not till eight days after giving in of the list.

And where it is alleged by the Panel, that as the Lord Res's list cannot burden him, for less his omission, it is answered, first, it must hard him, because he caused him to be his Author; and wherein he is not his Author himself, he must be presumed to be his Author. And next, because the relation in effect is the Panel's own deed, and said to be to the purgation of the speeches, that the business is known, scilicet, either de re, that the same must be interpreted judicium communis ad seipsum, and so mean as much as, for to your own safety; it is answered, that they must be taken properly, and not improperly, and must be related by the preceding speeches of the party and prime Agent; so if the Panel had said to any person, this may flow your father, de re, in the which case, the words would not be expounded fairly, but nequeque; and where it is alleged quod in dictis beneficiis fortis dicit interpretari, this rule of law has only place in contradictio, sed non in criminatione, premissa circumstantia, as that is. But it is urged, quod in factis hactenus; but it is answered, in matters of this kind, it is not to be regarded of the Panel, but to reveal (which was done before); and hactenus is done after the revealing, that might tend to the hurt of the reputation of the Noblemen, or touch them in their life and estate, was altogether unlawful and capital; and the unlawfulness is manifest, by the labelling of these pernicious Councils, de re, de; which is not of the nature of a relation, but of the nature of the indignation, of a foreign Prince to a dangerous act, tending to the destruction of the life and honour of them, against whom the Council is given; and by their answers, the whole odiousness made against the particulars of the list are solved. To the which is added, the Lord Res's declaration by Oath, treating the Marquis, his Majesty's Letter of the 10th of June, sent down to the Council, declaring the Lord Marquis, and the said three Earls of Hodgkinson, Rainsford and Shugborough (so be in his Majesty known to be) as good and faithful Subjects as any within his Majesty's Kingdoms; and declaring his Majesty's resolution, to have those who have given false information against them, to be punished. After the which, did follow his Majesty's Letter of the date of the 24th of September, for trying and punishing the Panel, upon the particulars given forth by him against the Noblemen; wherein the Panel, notwithstanding of all his purgations, can have no just warrant against the Marquis, specially in the two last points of prime Agent, and known business; nor pretend against the Earls of Hodgkinson and Rainsford; but (by the Panel's confession) least of all against the Earl of Shugborough, against whom he had nothing but a guess by his own confession, against what he makes him Plotter.

It is replied by Mr. Robert Nairne for the Panel, that this Dittay consists upon their deeds done and committed by the Panel, together with his intensions in the doing of them. As to the Panel's intensions, that it was not of purpose of making any Leading, against the Act of Parliament, but to the revealing of an alleged Treason against his Majesty; the revealing whereof was necessary by that addition adjoint to the last Act of Parliament libelled; for obedience of the whilst Act, the Panel did whatever was done in this business by him, and that the first part of the Dittay is not relevant against the Panel, to infer the punishments libelled against him, is clear, by retorting of the argument after this manner: A deed commanded by the Act of Parliament, wherein infer a punishment by the same Act of Parliament, it is that, the first deed tends not to the assumption of this Dittay was commanded by the Act of Parliament, imposing a necessity to all bearers of treasonful speeches against the King or State to reveal the same: Ergo, he did the same lawfully. Whence it is alleged in the Dittay, that by and after the information which the Panel had by relation, he has exceeded in the particulars expressed in the Dittay. And first, in the first particular, at the doing and speaking whereof by and after the anterior information, which the Panel had received, the Lord Res his Author was present: who being inquired of by

And where my Lord Advocate charges against the Panel's defining of the 10th Article, as intended by the Panel, that the full Author and be the Defamer, and not the reveller; the whole matter of the pretended Defamation, being original and first the Lord Ræ's great deposition, upon which, and not the Acts of the Panel; as it is evident, by the Panel's own admission, the Lord Ræ's first deposition the 21st of May, where the full Lord Ræ doth acknowledge the commission of the Panel, taken the 10th of June, to be true in all points, so far as the same concern the knowledge, words and acts of the said Lord Ræ; upon the exposure on that following. By which explanation, and notwithstanding this, there is substance enough in th. Panel's deposition, to prove that the Lord Ræ, and not the Panel, was Author to the whole matter of the pretended defamation. And whereas my Lord Advocate would in his reply seem to question the verbal relations, flowing from the Lord Ræ to the Panel; to this the Panel opposes his own deposition, and the full article of my Lord Ræ's examination formerly cited, wherein the Lord Ræ ratifies the Panel's verbal assertions: if he ratifies these, they will be in revera natura, if they be, my Lord Advocate's assertions are not relevant. And where my Lord Advocate alleges the flowing relation of the Lord Ræ's verbal relation, out of his examination as well, as to the Lord-Treasurer; the Panel repeats his exception to the statement of before. And to all my Lord Advocate's difficulties in last effect, concerning one side of paper, the Panel opposes his full assertion, and his depositions, and the Lord Ræ's relations, and his examination agreeing thereto. And whereas my Lord Advocate would bind the Panel in answer for the Lord Ræ's omission, because the Lord Ræ is his Author; the Panel brings forth behind at the time of his exception, can hardly find means to be persuaded that it came from his Majesty's Advocate, and opposes and repeats the Panel's exception herein. And where my Lord Advocate, upon these words, ye know the history, and not the time (de re), says, that these words should have a proper interpretation, which is, to be a Counsel given by the Panel, for subversion of the Marquis's honour and estate; the Panel answers thereto, that he adheres to his exception already alleged; and further adds, that the Lord Ræ said to the Panel that Sunday morning, that the Lord Sneykers had said to the Lord Ræ, their purpose was to take the King, the Queen, and the Prince; and so the information being given to the Panel, furnished to the Panel great cause of fear, and his fear the reason of the expression of these words, of advising the King to prevent his danger; as the Panel had formerly advised my Lord-Treasurer of England, to advise his Majesty to retire to Whitchell near Greenwich, as to a place of more safety. And this is clear, by the Panel's deposition the 21st of June, relating by the Lord Ræ in the first Article to his Examination the 21st of June.

And where my Lord Advocate alleges, that the Lord Ræ and his Majesty's Letter sent the Marquis of Hamilton, and the other Noblemen, by the Lord Ræ's Oath.

It is answered thereto by the Panel, that the Panel does not charge them; he only charges the Lord Ræ as his Informer and Author, humbly alleging, that in what relation points the Lord Ræ is contrary to the Panel, he does the Panel wrong; and therefore the Panel declares, that whenever it shall please his Majesty to permit the Panel and the Lord Ræ to be confronted, or if then upon difference, the matter be not cleared of the Panel's incoherence, the Panel is ready to hazard his life in it, to the glory of God, and to the clearing of the truth of his business, his Majesty considering the same, with a resolution, that he cannot so make to the said Lord Ræ. If the business be not decided by this, or that if his Majesty is pleased to admit torture before a trial-trial, the Panel is ready with him to bear out the torture, and so to be try'd thereby, with the said Lord Ræ, and let the truth then appear; which if he be not then, whenever it shall please God to call the Panel to bear testimony thereof with his blood, if God be not graciously pleased to bear him up in it, his men to conceive; and if God bear him out in it, then will he be found more after his death, to have been an honest man, and his blood shall be required of the takers thereof.

My Lord Advocate, before any answer to be made by him to the Panel's former reply, produced his Majesty's Letter sent down to the Lords of his Majesty's Privy-Council, of the date of the 24th of June, 1631, and desired the same to be judicially read, of the whole the same follows.

"To our right truly and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, and to our right truly and well-beloved Cousin and Counsellors; to our right truly and well-beloved Counsellors, the Viscount of Devon, our Chancellor; the Earl of Arundell, President of our Privy-Council; and to the remanent Earls, Lords, and other of our Privy-Council, of our Kingdom of Scotland."

Sic significatione,

Charles R.
"Right truly and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellor, and right truly and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellors, and right truly and well-beloved Counsellors, we greet you well. Whereas we are informed of a practice in appearance to pernicious, and nearly concerning us, as we would not but take first, trial thereof, both by ourselves, and some of our Council, appointed by us for that purpose. But in the mean time, because of some sinister rumours maliciously dispersed thereto, to the prejudice of our right truly and right well-beloved Cousin and Counsellors, the Marquis of Hamilton, and the Earls of Highland, Rearkirk, and Buchan, and some others; let the like reports be brought unto your ears, we have thought good hereby to declare, that no only we have found by the trial we ourselves have taken, that they are altogether innocent and true thereof; but likewise that the prime informer thereof hath confessed them upon Oath, testifying thus (as we know them to be) as good and faithful Subjects, as we have in any of our Kingdoms. And for the business itself, whenever it shall be fully tried, we will thereafter express our further pleasure concerning others intended therein, according as we shall find just cause, either in punishing any person that shall be found guilty, or in punishing any person that shall be Voz. VII.

"found to have given false information. And whereas we have formerly by our Letters recommended unto you, our right truly and right well-beloved Cousin the Marquis of Hamilton, for furthering the speedy laying and transportation of his men with all full care; there are signs to require you to contribute the best help in your authority or commandments can afford for the same. Which, both out of due regard we have to him, and to his well-being, being very desirous of your help therein, we bid you forward. From our Court, at Greenwich, the 24th of June, 1631."

After reading of which Letter of his Majesty, it is answered by my Lord Advocate, that the saying of the Panel to have the words (or is it inferred) to be repeated in all the rest of the Day, we is all plain; the points of the Day bearing relation of formal deeds done in several times. And where it is alleged by the Panel, that these words, as it was informed, were true, upon a deposition of 12 good witnesses, there was no necessity: If it were true, the Day was de facto, for the Panel is not accused of a deposition in respect of the verity of the matter related, but in respect of his difference from his Author, and that he affirms more than his Author, and with greater certainty than his Author: and that, not content with both these certainties, he follows, it not to the very point of execution, which is evident at the point of certainty, by the words spoken to his Majesty, de facto de facto, which is more certain by the opposition of the uncertainty of time only, which redoubles the contents of the business. And in the point of execution, by that perilsous and cruel Council, de re de re the effect of which promises as Council, if God in mercy had not dashed the royal wrath of our so wise and gracious Sovereign, would have produced most horrible effects, nor could be quenched with the pity of men tried by the Panel. And the continuing of the Lord Ræ (whom the Panel calls the prime Author) with himself, in the progress of his behaviour, will manifest the Panel's guiltiness of the points of the Day, whereas he is accused: for the Lord Ræ, who behaved to have greater certainty than the Panel, as we proceeded to the points of positive Privy, prime Agent, Plotters; and so far as the important business Privy, that the business was known, in all which points the Panel has involved himself; but the Lord Ræ was content to reveal the reports made to him by David Barclay, and Mr. Robert Alderson, to the Panel, without adding or proving. And where the Panel, upon the 21st of May, which was the day of the Marquis's returning from London to England, came to the Lord Ræ, and told him, that he had been with the Lord-Lieutenant, and acquainted him with the passages, which he had from the Lord-Treasurer, and of the Lord Marquis's return, and that he had conceived, that it might be dangerous at that time for his Majesty to return to the Panel as he intended, the Panel was so moved, that he desired the King to remove from Greenwich, to Whitchell or London; which my Lord Ræ answered, that the Panel had done evil therein, for there was no such badness to be feared; yet notwithstanding thereof, and that his Author had repented him rather, the Panel went to the matter and attended his Majesty at dinner, and at the end of dinner spoke these words of the certainty of the plot, uncertainty of the court, and aided the Council. Like as the Panel being asked, because granted that he met with the Lord Ræ upon that Sunday the Marquis came to Court, and also that he met with the Lord-Treasurer and council'd him, his Majesty's removing from Greenwich to London. He denies that the Lord Ræ said, that he thought it was evil done. Notwithstanding thereof, the Panel was divided and attended his Majesty at dinner, spoke the words and gave the Council, like as his Majesty being something weakened by that formal Council, sent for the Lord Ræ, and did acquaint him, that some great danger was suggested to his Majesty, upon the Marquis's returning. To which the Lord Ræ answered by Oath, that he knew nothing against the Marquis, for any thing he knew, but that he was as good a subject as any his Majesty had.

And where the Panel would labour to free himself, by denying the Council given to him by the Lord Ræ, it cannot be a warrantable excuse, except he would prove that his Author advised him to do it: which is impossible, seeing the Lord Ræ, his Author, neither did it, nor allowed of it, being done by the Panel. And where it is alleged by the Panel, that he had sufficient warrant from his Informer, he cannot affirm it, as being contrary to the relation made by his Author: which is not a syllable of the Marquis as prime Agent, one of the three Noblemen as Plotters. And whenever the Panel did after the discovery of the business to the Lord-Treasurer, which was upon the 19th of May, it was the Panel's own word, work and deed, as the giving in of the list, expending the certainty of the plot, and urging the putting in execution. And where the Panel alleges, that all was done upon a good intention, and that God is only Judge of the mind; it is true, where the mind is not revealed by speech or act punishable of the Law: but if either speech or deed be done against the Law, the pretence of the mind will never excuse it.

And albeit it be true, as the Panel alleges, Quid delicta non probantur before a trial, yet it is as true, Quid delicta non probantur before a trial. And as the case of this Day, we have a Law prohibiting Leasings and Calumnies under the pain of death, and being by the Day, there are three particulars labelled, which his Majesty in his Letter of the date of the 24th of June, has called false informations, and which directly fall within the compass of the Law, as affecting upon the life, honour and estate of the Noblemen; the Panel's excuse by intention is too slender, to free him from the punishment of the Law. And where it is alleged by the Panel, that he has named his Authors, and that he was perfect the time of his relation, and did not contradict him therein, which the Panel alleges for a sufficient ground of his exoneration; the contrary is true: for the Lord Ræ, in his examination upon the 21st of June, doth acknowledge the Panel's examination to be true in all points. Saving the explanations thereof fabricated. But this approbation cannot excuse the subject, and also the subject must be restricted according to the conditions of the explanation, but so it is, that in the Panel's examination, which is approved by the Lord Ræ, there is not one syllable of the Lord Marquis as Privy or prime Agent, or of the three Noblemen as Plotters.

My Lords, I hold it fit, that they should be both for their contempt committed cloſe Priſoners till Tuesday next; and if they do not conſent themſelves before this and then to take the Oath, and yield to be examined before Mr. Good, then that they ſhall be brought hither again, and conſured, and made an example. Unto which they all agreed; and ſo we were committed cloſe Priſoners, and my Friends ſaid to me to come unto me.

In Camera Stellata erant Conſilio ſubdno 9. die Febr. Anno 13 Car. Regia.

Upon Information this day to this Honourable Court, by Sir John Beake Knight, his Majesty's Attorney-General, That John Lilburn and John Wharton, who are now at the Bar of this Court, were on the 24th of January laſt ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories touching their unlawful printing, publishing, and diſſembling of libellous and ſeditious Books, contrary to the Decree of this Court, which was verified by Affidavit; and being brought up to the Office to appear and be examined accordingly, the ſaid Lilburn refused to appear, and both of them denied to take an Oath to make ſwift answer to Interrogatories, as appears by Certificate of Mr. Good: I was highly grieved that their appearance may be recorded, they being now preſent in Court, and that they may now have their Oaths tendered unto them, which if they ſhall conſent to take, that then this Court will proceed to a cenſure againſt them for their high contempt therein, as hath been uſed in like caſes, which the Court held fit: And hath therefore ordered, that their appearance ſhall be recorded, as is deſired. And for that the ſaid Delinquents do now again moſt contemptuouſly refuse to take their Oaths now tendered unto them in open Court, their Lordſhips have further ordered. That the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton ſhall be remanded to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain cloſe Priſoners until they conſent themſelves in obedience to take their Oaths, and be examined; and that until they do take their Oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday night next, their Lordſhips will, on the laſt fitting of this Term, proceed to conſure againſt them for their contempt therein, as is directed.

And upon Monday after we were had to Gray's-Inn, and I being the firſt there, Mr. Good ſaid to me, according to the Lord's order upon Friday laſt, I have ſent for you to enter the Oath unto you. Sir, I beſeech you, let me hear the Lord's order. So he caſt it to be read unto me, and then tendered me the Book. Well, Sir, ſaid I, I am of the ſame mind I was as I withal I underſtand, that this Oath is one and the ſame with the High Commiſſion Oath, which Oath I know to be both againſt the Law of God, and the Law of the Land, and therefore in brief I do not take the Oath, though I deſire diſpatch for the refusal of it. Well, ſaid he, I did not find for you to diſpatch with you about the lawfulness of it, but only according to my place to tender it unto you. Sir, I had not take it, though I loſe my life for the refusal of it. So he ſaid, he had no more to ſay to me; and I took my leave of him, and came away. And after that, came the old man, Mr. Wharton, and it was tendered unto him, which he refused to take; and (as he hath told me) he declared unto him how the Bishops had him eight times in priſon for the refusal of it, and he had ſuffered the Bishops mercileſs cruelty for many years together, and he would now never take it as long as he lived; and withal told him, that if there were a Court ready at the door to carry him to Tyburn, he would be hanged, before ever he would take it. And thus was our day's buſineſs.

Upon the next morning, Feb. 23. about ſeven o'clock, we were had to the Star-Chamber Bar again, to receive our cenſure; and ſtood at the Bar about two hours before Sir John Beake came: but at laſt he began his accuſation againſt us, that we did ill continue to us former Delinquents. And alſo there was another Affidavit of the ſaid Edward Child againſt us, the ſum of which, that I had conſulted to him, that I had printed Dr. Bayly's Apology to Sir John Beake's Information, and his Letter; and another Book, the Apology unto certain Advocates; and another Book he called The Faſty and Foppie of his old Father; and that I had divers other Books of Dr. Bayly's a printing. And that Mr. John Wharton had been at the charge of Printing a Book called, A Breve of the Biſhops late Proceedings; and another Book, called Sixteen new Statutes, and divers other bad Books; and that one James Oxſlow, a Turner in Wychſlayer-hall, had diſperſed divers of theſe Books. Then I ſaid after this manner: Moſt noble Lords, I beſeech your Honours, that you would be pleaſed to give me leave to ſpeak for myſelf, and to make my juſt defence; and I ſhall labour to do what my ſpeeches, that I ſhall not give your Honours any ill diſturbance, and withal ſhall do it with as much brevity as I can. So having obtained my deſire, I began and ſaid, My Lords, it ſeems there were divers Books ſent out of Holſted, which were the heads of theſe Books: and ſome of theſe Books were ſent unto us, and as I underſtand, he delivered divers of theſe Books unto one John Child, ſervant to the old man Mr. Wharton; and he ſuffered being in priſon, he diſperſed divers of them for the ſaid Child's ſake; whereupon the Books were taken in his cuſtody: he being found diſperſing of them, goes to one Smith, a Taylor, in Brodenſon, (as I am informed) and deſires him to get his peace made with the Bishops. Whereupon he covenants with ſome of the Bishops creatures to betray us into their hands, being newly come out of Holſted, which (as he ſaid) did find over theſe Books. So, my Lords, he having purchased his own liberty, lays the plot for betraying me, and I was taken by a Purſuivant and four others of his affidants, walking in the Street with the ſaid John Child, who had his hand and contrived the plot before (as I ſaid) able to make good; and the next morning I was committed by Sir John Beake to the Gate-houſe. Now, my Lords, I do proſeſs before your Honours on the word of a Chriſtian, that I did not find over theſe Books, neither did I know the Ship that brought them, nor any that belongs to the Ship, nor to my knowledge did never with my eyes, either the Ship, or any that belongs unto it.

And being at the Gate-houſe, I was removed (by fix of your Honours) to the Fleet, at which time the ſaid John Child was removed from Brodenſon to Newgate, and being kept cloſe there, by, by their threats and perſuade, and the procuring of his own liberty, goes and accuſes me for printing ten or twelve thouſand Books in Holſted. And at my examination before Sir John Beake, I cleared myſelf of that, and upon Friday laſt he made an Affidavit againſt me, in which he hath moſt falſly ſorsworn himſelf, and to-day he hath made another, which is alſo a moſt falſe oath; and withal, my Lords, he is known to be a notorious lying fellow, and hath accuſed me for the purchasing of his own liberty, which he hath got. And therefore, I beſeech your Honours, to take it into your ſerious conſideration, whether I am to be cenſured upon ſuch a fellow's Affidavit or no. Then ſaid the Lord-Keeper, There are a mad fellow, ſaying things are thus, that thou wilt not take this Oath, and another truly.

My honourable Lord, I have declared unto you the real truth; but for the Oath, it is an Oath of Inquiry, and of the ſame nature as the High Commiſſion Oath; which Oath I know to be unlawful; and withal I find no warrant in the word of God for an Oath of Inquiry, and I thought to be the director of me in all things that I do: and therefore, my Lords, as now ſaid, I dare not take the Oath. (When I named the word of God, the Court began to laugh, as though they had had nothing to do with it.) My Lords (ſaid Mr. Good) he told me yeſterday, he dare not take the Oath, though he ſuffered death for the refusal of it. And with that my Lord Priſy-Seal ſpoke. Will you (ſaid he) take your Oath, that that which you have ſaid is true? My Lord (ſaid I) I am but a young man, and do not well know what belongs to the nature of an Oath, [but that which I have ſaid, is a real truth] but that much; by God's appointment, I know an Oath ought to be the end of all controversy and ſtrife, Heb. vi. 16. and if it might be ſo in this my preſent caſe, I would ſafely take my Oath, that what I have ſaid is true. So they ſpoke to the old man, my fellow-prisoner, and asked him whether he would take the Oath? So he deſired them to give him leave to ſpeak; and he began to thunder it againſt the Bishops, and told them they required their Oaths of the Kings Subjects; namely, the Oath of Churchworfhip, and the Oath of Canonical Obedience, and the Oath ex Officio, which (ſaid he) are all againſt the Law of the Land, and by which they deceive and perjure thouſands of the King's Subjects in a year. And withal, my Lords, (ſaid he) there is a maxim in Divinity, that we ſhould prefer the glory of God, and the Good of our King and Country, before our own lives. But the Lords wondering to hear the old man begin to talk after this manner, commanded him to hold his peace, and to answer them, whether he would take the Oath or no? To which he replied, and deſired them to let him talk a little, and he would ſay then by and bye. At which all the Court beſt out a-laughing, but they would let him go on, but he commanded ſilence (which if they would have let him to proceed, he would have ſaid, appear'd the Bishops, as they were never in their lives in an open Court of Judicature). So they ſaid us again, whether we would take the Oath? Which we both again refused; and withal I told them, that for the reaſons before I durſt not take it. Then they ſaid, they would proceed to cenſure. I bid them do as they pleaſed, for I knew myſelf innocent of the thing for which I was imputed and accuſed; but yet, notwithstanding, did ſubmit my body to their Honourable pleaſure. So they cenſured us 5000 ſignets, and then ſtood up Judge Jones, and ſaid, It was fit, that I being a young man, for example ſake, ſhould have ſome corporal puniſhment uſed upon me. So my cenſure was to be whips, but neither time nor place allotted. And for the old man, in regard of his age, being eighty-five years old, they would ſpare his corporal puniſhment, though (ſaid they) he deſerves it as well as the other (meaning me), yet he ſhould ſtand upon the Pillory: but I could not underſtand or perceive by my cenſure, that I was to ſtand upon the Pillory. And when I came from the Bar, I ſpoke in an audible voice, and ſaid, My Lords, I beſeech God to bleſs your Honours, and to diſcover and make known unto you the wickedneſs and cruelty of the Prelates.

In Camera Stellata erant Conſilio ſubdno 13. die Febr. Anno domini tercio Car. Regia.

Whereas, upon Information to this Court the ninth of this inſtant February, by Sir John Beake Knight, his Majesty's Attorney-General, that John Lilburn and John Wharton (then preſent at the Bar) were the authors of January laſt ordered to be examined upon Interrogatories touching their unlawful printing, reporting, publishing, and diſſembling of libellous and ſeditious Books, contrary to the Decree of this Court, which was verified by Affidavit; and being brought up to the Office to appear and be examined, the ſaid Lilburn refused to appear, and both of them denied to take an Oath to make ſwift answer to Interrogatories, as appears by the certificate of Mr. Good, Deputy Clerk of this Court, the Court did on that day order, that their appearances ſhould be recorded, they being preſent in Court as ſoreſaid; and that in reſpect the ſaid Delinquents did then again contemptuouſly refuse to take their Oaths tendered to them in open Court, they ſhould be remanded to the priſon of the Fleet, there to remain cloſe Priſoners, until they conſent themſelves in obedience to take their Oaths and be examined; and that ſaveſ they did take their Oaths, and yield to be examined by Monday-night next then next following, and now laſt ſaid, their Lordſhips ordered on this ſitting-day proceed to a cenſure againſt them for their contempt therein. Now this day the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton being again brought to the Bar, his Majesty's ſaid Attorney informed this Honourable Court, that they ſtill continued in their former obſtinacy, and contemptuouſly refused to take their Oaths, to make true answer to the Interrogatories, although they had been ſoreſaid, and that their Oaths offered to be given unto them by Mr. Good, Deputy Clerk of this Court, who now certified the ſame in Court; and therefore his Majesty's ſaid Attorney humbly pleaded on his Majesty's behalf, that their Lordſhips would now proceed to cenſure againſt the ſaid Delinquents, for their great contempt and diſobedience therein. Whereupon their Lordſhips endeavoured, by ſoft perſuaſions, to draw them to conformity and obedience, and withal offered, that if they yet would ſubmit and take their Oaths, their Lordſhips would accept thereof, and not proceed to cenſure againſt them. But ſuch was the miſerable diſobedience and contempt of the ſaid Delinquents, that they ſtill perſiſted in their former obſtinacy, and wilfully refuſed to take their Oaths. In reſpect whereof the whole Court did with an unanimous conſent, declare and adjudge the ſaid Lilburn and Wharton guilty of a very high contempt and offence, of dangerous contumacious and evil examples, and worthy to undergo very ſevere pains, and exemplary cenſure; which might deter others from the like preſumptuous boldneſs in reſuſing

* to take a legal Oath, without which, many great and excellent offences, to the prejudice and danger of his Majesty, his Kingdom, and his loving Subjects, might go away undiscussed, and unpunished. And therefore their Lordships have now ordered, adjudged and decreed, That the said Lilburn and Wharton shall be remanded to the Fleet, there to remain until they conform themselves in obedience to the orders of this Court, and that they shall pay five hundred pounds a-piece for their several fines to his Majesty's use, and before their enlargements out of the Fleet, become bound with good sureties for their good behaviour. And to the end that others may be the more deterred from daring to offend in the like kind hereafter, the Court hath further ordered and decreed, That the said John Lilburn shall be whipt through the Streets, from the prison of the Fleet unto the Pillory, to be erected in such time, and place, as this Court shall think fit and lawful; and that both he and the said Wharton shall be both of them put in the said Pillory, and from thence to be removed to the Fleet, there to remain according to this Decree.*

After our confinement, we had the liberty of the prison for a few days; but third man, my fellow-prisoner, went to the Warden of the Fleet, and told him the sum of that which he intended in the Star-Chamber, to have spoken against the Bishops, if the Lords would have let him. He told the Warden, how the Bishops were the greatest Tyrants that ever were since Adam's creation; and that they were more cruel than the Canibals, those Monsters; for (said he) they presently devour men, and put an end to their pain, but the Bishops do it by degrees, and use many ways in tormenting their cruelty and cruelty upon those that stand out against them, and therefore are more cruel than the Canibals, &c.

This came to the Lords of the Council's ears, whereupon we were the next Monday after brought both together, and locked up close prisoners in one Chamber, without any order or warrant at all, but only Warden Jasper's bare command and pleasure. But the old man, about three weeks after, made a Petition to the Lords of the Council, that he might have some liberty; and being very weak, more likely to die than to live, he had his liberty granted him the Term: but I do still remain close prisoner.

Upon Monday the 18th of April, 1638, I was cruelly whipp'd through the Streets to the Fleet, and at the last carried to the Pillory, where I was undressed from the Curt, and having put on some of my clothes, went to the Towers, where I stood a pretty while waiting for my Surgeon, who was not yet come to dress me, where were many of my friends, who exceedingly rejoiced to see my courage, that the Lord had enabled me to undergo my punishment so willingly.

I having a desire to retire into a private room from the multitude of people that were about me, which made me like to faint; I had not been there long, but Mr. Ligonier, the Tipstaff of the Star-Chamber, came unto me, saying, the Lords sent him to me, to know if I would acknowledge myself to be at fault, and then he knew what to say unto me. To whom I replied, Have their Honours caused me to be whipp'd from the Fleet to the Pillory, and do they now send to know if I will acknowledge a fault? They should have done this before I had been whipp'd; for now, seeing I have undergone the greatest part of my punishment, I hope the Lord will assist me to go through it all: and beside, if I would have done this at the first, I need not to have come to this: But as I told the Lords when I was before them at the Bar, so I desire you to tell them again, that I am not conscious to myself of doing any thing that deserves a punishment, but yet I do willingly submit to their Lordships' pleasures in my case. He told me, if I would confess my fault, it would save me a standing in the Pillory: otherwise, I must undergo the burden of it.

Well (said I) I regard not a little outward disgrace for the cause of my God; I have found already that few others as in him, in whom I have lived, that though his strength, I am able to undergo any thing that he will be afflicted on me; but he thinks that I had very hard measure, that I should be condemned and thus punished upon two Oaths, in which the party has most fully forsworn himself, and because I would not take an Oath to betray mine own innocency. Why, Paul found more mercy from the Heathen Roman Governor, for they would not put him to an Oath to accuse himself, but suffered him to make the best defence he could for himself: another would they condemn him, before his accusers and he were brought face to face, to justify, and fully to prove their accusation; but the Lords have put death to me, for my accusers and I were never brought face to face, to justify their accusation against me. It is true, two false Oaths were sworn against me, and I was thereupon condemned; and because I would not accuse myself, And to be went away, and I prepared myself for the Pillory, to which I went with a joyful courage, and when I was upon it, I made oblation to the Lords, to use them (as I suppose) looking out at the Star-Chamber window towards me. And so I put my neck into the hole, which being a great deal too low for me, it was very painful to me, in regard of continuance of the time that I stood on the Pillory, which was about two hours; my back being also very sore, and the Sun shining to exceeding hot, and the Tipstaff-men not suffering me to keep on my hat to defend my head from the heat of the Sun, so that I stood there in great pain: yet through the strength of my God I underwent it with courage, to the very last measure; and lifting up my heart and spirit unto my God, I began to speak after this manner:

My Christian Brethren,

Tell you that I love the Lord Jesus Christ, and desire that he should reign and rule in your hearts and lives, to you especially, and to as many as hear me this day, I do wish this speech

I told here in the place of ignominy and shame; yet to me it is not so, I do love and embrace it, as the Wise Men Cry of Christ, and as a badge of my Christian Profession: I have been already whipp'd from the Fleet to this place, by virtue of a sentence from the honourable Lords of the Star-Chamber, the cause of my confinement I shall declare unto you as briefly as I can.

The Lord, by his special hand of Providence, so ordered it, that not long ago I was in Holland, where I was like to have perished myself in the course of Trading, that he, he have brought me in a pretty large portion of earthly things, (after which my heart did too much run;) but the Lord having a better portion at store for me, and more durable riches to bestow upon my Soul, by the same hand of Providence, brought me back again, and cast me into easy affliction, that thereby I might be weaned from the World, and for the variety and easiness of all things therein. And he hath now pitched my soul upon such an object of beauty, amenableness, and excellency, as is so permanent and endurable, as eternity itself; namely, the personal sweetest of the Lord Jesus Christ, the sweetness of whose presence no affliction can ever be able to weild out of my Soul.

Now, while I was in Holland, it came there were seven Books of that noble and renowned Doctor Johannes Bynholt sent unto England, which came into the hands of one Edmund Chillingworth; for the sending over of which I was taken and apprehended, the first being before laid by one John Chillingworth (whom I well knew, and took to be my Friend), servant to my old fellow-labourer, Mr. John Wharton, living in Amsterdam, after this manner:

I walking in the street with the said John Chillingworth, was taken by the Pursuivants and his men, the said John, as I verily believe, having given direction to them where to stand, and he himself was the third man that laid hands on me so hold me.

Now, at my capture before the Lords, I there declared upon the word of a Christian, that I first not over these Books, neither did I know the Ship that brought them, nor any of the men that belonged to the Ship, nor to my knowledge did I ever see either Ship, or any appearing to it in all my days.

Besides that, I was accused at my examination before the King's Attorney, at his Chamber, by the said Edmund Chillingworth, Butcher-fellow, living in Comen-Street, near St. Andrew's, and late prisoner in Bridewell and Newgate, for printing ten or twelve thousand Books in Holland, and that I would have printed the Unwearing the Mystery of Iniquity, if I could have gotten a true copy of it; and that I had a Chamber as Mr. John Fox's book at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept.

Now, here I declare before you all, upon the word of a suffering Christian, that he might as well have accused me of printing a hundred thousand books, and the one been as true as the other. And for the printing the Unwearing the Mystery of Iniquity, upon this word of an honest man, I never saw, nor to my knowledge heard of the book, till I came back again into England. And for my having a Chamber at Mr. John Fox's house at Delft, where he thinks the books were kept, I was far from having a Chamber there, as I never lay in his house but twice or thrice at the most; and upon the last Friday of the last Term, I was brought to the Star-Chamber-Bar, where before me was sent the said Edmund Chillingworth's Affidavit, upon which against Mr. John Wharton and myself, the sum of which oath was, That he and I had printed (as Ratton, in Holland) Dr. Bynholts Mystery, and his Letter, with divers other scandalous books.

Now, here again I speak it in the presence of God, and all you that hear me, that Mr. Wharton and I never joined together in printing either, or any other books whatsoever; neither did I receive any money from him toward the printing any.

Withal, in his first Oath, is peremptorily sworn, that we had printed them at Rotterdam: unto which I likewise say, That he hath in this particular forsworn himself: for nineteen parts, I never in all my days either printed, or caused to be printed, either for myself, or for Mr. Wharton, any books at Rotterdam; neither did I come into any Printing-house there, all the time that I was in the City.

And then upon the Twelfth after, he swore against both of us again. The sum of which oath was, that I had confessed to him (which is most false) that I had printed Dr. Bynholts Answer to Sir John Bardsley's Informations, and his Letter, and another Book, called, Certain discourses to the Old Liberty; and another Book, called, The Power and Impunity of the Old Liberty; and that I had done other Books of the said Dr. Bynholts on printing, and that Mr. Wharton had been as the charger of printing a Book, called, A Brevis of the Bishops late Proceedings; and another Book called, Seven New Questions; and as this oath hath sworn they were printed at Rotterdam, or somewhere else in Holland; and that one James Oldham, a Turner, keeping Shop at Wynneburgh-hall Gate, dispersed divers of these Books. Now, in this oath he hath again forsworn himself in a high degree; for whereas he took his oath that I had printed the Book, called, The Power and Impunity of the Old Liberty; I here speak it before you all, that I never in all my days did let one of them in print: but I must confess, I have felt and read it in written hand, because the Doctor was confused. And as for the other Books, for which he hath laid these in printing; so that I answer, that for my own particular, I never read nor saw any of the Doctor's Books, but the forenamed four in English, and one little thing more of about two fols of paper, which is intitled to the Unity of the Old Liberty. And as for his Latin Books, I never saw any but two, namely, his Flagellum, for which he was first confined in the High-Commission-Court, and his Abolition, which were both in print long before I knew the Doctor. But it is true, there is a second edition of his Flagellum, but that was at the press above two years ago; namely, Ann 1634, and some of this impression was in England before I came out of Holland.

And these are the main things for which I was confined and condemned, being two Books in which the said Chillingworth hath palpably forsworn himself, and if he had not forsworn himself, yet by the Law (as I am given to understand) I might have escaped myself him, being a pious person himself, and a prisoner, and had that which he did against me for purchasing his own Liberty, which he hath by such Justly means got and obtained; who is also known to be a lying fellow, as I told the Lords I was able to prove and make good.

But besides all this, there was an inquisition-oath tendered unto me (which I refused to take) on four several days, the sum of which oath is thus much: 'You shall swear that you shall make sure answer to all things that shall be asked of you: so help you God.' Now you see one I refused as a foolish and unlawful oath: it being the High-Commission oath, whereunto the Prisoners were bound, and still do, to basely to torment, afflict and undo the dear Saints and Servants of God. It is an oath against the Law of the Lord (as Mr. Nicholas Fair in his Argument doth prove): And also it is expressly against not discouraged and knock'd off from the study of it, because of the obscurity and darkness of it; for the Lord hath provided his enlightening Spirit unto all his people that are laborious and desirous to know him aright, and also he hath promised a blessing, and promised a blessing unto all that read and labour to keep the things contained in this Book, Rev. i. 3. My Christian Brethren, in the bowels of Jesus Christ, I beseech you do not contemn the things that are deliver'd to you, in regard of the meanness and weakness of me the instrument, being but one of the meanest and unworthiest of the servants of Jesus Christ, for the Lord may think such great things by weak means, that his power may be more seen, for we are too ready to cast our eye upon the means and instrument, not looking up unto that Almighty power that is in God, who is able to do the greatest things by the weakest means, and therefore out of the mouths of Isaiah and Sauley he hath ordained through, Psalm viii. 2. And he hath chosen the feeble things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things of the world, and things which are despised, hath God chosen; yea, things which are not, to bring to nought the things that are, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. And he gives the reward wherefore he is pleased to do so; Thou art God should glory in his promise.

* The Pillory was placed between Wynneburgh-hall Gate and the Star-Chamber.

† And as the Court view him along, he repeated several Texts of Scripture, and told enthusiastically to the People, which for brevity's sake is here omitted.

So you for God is not tryed by any instrument and means to effect his own glory, but he by the weak instrument is able to bring to pass the great things.

It is true, I am a young man, and no Scholar, according to that which the World counts Scholarship, yet I have obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful, and he, by a Divine Providence, hath brought me hither this day; and I speak to you in the name of the Lord, being assisted with the Spirit and Power of the God of Heaven and Earth: and I speak not the words of malice or uncharitableness, but the words of innocency, and mature deliberation; for I do confute with my God, before I come hither, and desired him that he would direct and enable me to speak that, which might be for his glory and the good of his people. And as I am a soldier, fighting under the banner of the great and mighty Captain, the Lord Jesus Christ, and as I look for that Crown of immortality, which one day I know shall be set upon my temple, being in the conviction that I am so, I dare not hold my peace, but I speak unto you with boldness as the might and strength of my God, the things which the Lord as mercy hath made known unto my soul, come life, come death.

[When I was hereabout, there came a fat Lawyer, I do not know his name, and commanded me to hold my peace, and leave my preaching. To whom I replied and said, Sir, I will not hold my peace, but I speak my mind freely, though I be hanged at Tyburn for my pains. It seems he himself was pained as touched, as the Lawyers were in Christ's time, when he spake against the Scribes and Pharisees, which made them say, Adversary, in saying thus thou resistest us also. So he wroth his way, and [I think] complained to the Lords, but I went on with my speech, and said:]

My Brethren, be not discouraged at the ways of God for the affliction and cross that doth accompany them, for it is love and comfortable dealing in the yoke of Christ for all that, and I have found it to be by experience; for my soul is filled to full of spiritual and heavenly joy, that with my tongue I am not able to express it, neither are any capable (I think) to partake of so great a degree of consolation, but only those upon whom the Lord's gracious afflicting hand is.

And for mine own part, I find this day in the place of an evil doer, but my conscience witnesseth that I am not so. [And hereabout I put my hand into my pocket, and pulled out three of worthy Dr. Baynes's Books, and threw them among the people, and said,] There is part of the Book, for which I suffer, take them among you, and read them, and see if you find any thing in them against the Law of God, the Law of the Land, the Glory of God, the Honour of the King or State.

I am the son of a Gentleman, and my friends are of rank and quality in the Country where they live, which is two hundred miles from this place, and I am in my present condition deserted of them all; for I know, not one of them dare meddle with me in my present affliction, being I am thus by the Scorpions, [the Proctors], and for anything that I know, it may be I shall never have a favourable countenance from any of them again; and withal, am a young man, and likely to have lived well, and in plenty, according to the fashion of the world; yet notwithstanding, for the cause of Christ, and so to do him service, I have and do have adieu to father, friends, and riches, pleasures, ease, contented life and blood, and lay all down at the foot stool of Jesus Christ, being willing to part with all, rather than I will dishonour him, or in the least measure part with the peace of a good conscience, and that sweetness and joy which I have found in him. For in sated Christ is the quinquance of my desires, and so far from thinking my affliction and punishment, which I have this day endured, and still do endure and groan under, a disgrace, that I receive it as the welcome Cross of Christ, do think myself this day more honoured by my sufferings, than if a crown of gold had been set upon my head; for I have in some part been made comfortable to my Lord and Master, and have in some measure drank of the same Cup, which he himself drank of, while he was in this fatal world. For he shed his most precious blood for the salvation of my poor soul, that so I might be reconciled to his Father; therefore am I willing to undergo any thing for his sake, and that inward joy and consolation within me, that carries me high above all my pains and torments. And you, [my Brethren] if you be willing to have Christ, you must own him, and take him upon his own terms, and know that Christ and the Cross is inseparable, for he that will live godly in Christ Jesus, must suffer persecution and all ill; it is the lot and portion of all his chosen ones, through many afflictions and trials we must enter into glory; and the Apostle Paul, Thou art to be without affliction, unless all are partakers, then are ye blessed, and so on. And therefore, if you will have Christ, sit down and reckon before ever you make profession of him, what he will cost you; lest when you come to the trial, you dishonour him; and if you be not willing and contented withal, and let all go for his sake, you are not worthy of him.

If parents, husbands, wife or children, lands or livings, riches or honours, pleasure or ease, life or blood, stand in the way, you must be willing to part with all these, and to entertain Christ naked and alone, though you have nothing but the Cross, or else you are not worthy of him; 1 Peter x. 37, 38.

Oh, my Brethren, there is such sweetness and contentment in enjoying the Lord Jesus alone, that it is able, where it is felt, to make a man go through all difficulties, and endure all hardships which may possibly come upon him. Therefore, if he call you to it, do not deny him, nor his truth in the least manner; for he hath said, He that denies me before men, I will deny before my Father, which is sufficient. And now it is the time that we must show ourselves good soldiers of Jesus Christ, for his truth, his cause and glory lies at stake in a high degree; therefore put on courageous resolutions, and withdraw your necks and loins from all false power and worship, and fight with courage and boldness in this spiritual battle, in which battle, the Lord before your eyes hath raised up some valiant Champions that fought up to the ears in blood: therefore be courageous soldiers, and fight it out bravely, that your God may be glorified by you, and let him only have the service, both of your inward and outward man, and stand to his cause, and love your own souls, and fear not the face of any mortal man, for God hath promised to be with you, and uphold you, that shall valiantly fight for him, Psalm xli. 10, 11. But now, how few are there that dare show any courage for God and his cause, though his glory lies at the stake, but think themselves happy and well, and content themselves with men, if they can sleep in a whole skin; where Christ hath said, He that will save his life shall lose it, and he that will lose his life for his sake, shall find it. What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?

Therefore it is better for a man to be willing and contented to let all go for the enjoying of Christ, and doing him service, than to be down and sleep in a whole skin, though in so doing he gain all the world, and see him dishonoured, his glory and truth trodden under foot, and the blood of his servants shed and spilt.

Yes, without doubt, it is; but many are in their times, so far from suffering valiantly for Christ, that they rather dishonour men from it, and count it a point of singularity and pride, and self-end, for a man to put himself forward to do God service; asking, what calling and warrant any private man hath thereto, seeing it belongs to the Ministers to speak of these things? Yes, Sir, do so; but alas, they are so cowardly and fearful, that they dare not speak.

And therefore it belongs also to thee, or me, or any other man, if thou be a soldier of Jesus Christ, whatsoever by place or calling thy rank or degree be, be it higher or lower, yet if he call for thy service, thou art bound, though others stand still, to maintain his power and glory to the utmost of thy power and strength, yet, to the shedding the last drop of thy blood; for he hath not led his people unto the death for thy sake, but shed his precious blood for the redemption of thy soul. Hath he done this for thee, and darrest thou be him dishonoured, and his glory lie at the stake, and not speak in his behalf, or do him the best service thou canst?

If out of a base and cowardly spirit that thou dost, let me tell thee here, and that truly to thy face, thou hast a Devil in thy heart, which thou lovest more than God, and that thou shalt one day certainly find by usual experience. Alas, if men should hold their peace in such times as these, the Lord would cause the very stones to speak, to convince man of his cowardly balances.

Having proceeded in a manner thus far by the strength of my God, with boldness and courage in my speech, the Warden of the Fleet came with the fat Lawyer, and commanded me to hold my peace. To whom I replied, I would speak and declare my cause and mind, though I were to be hanged at the gall for my pains. And he could procurement to be made upon the Pillory, for bringing to him the Books: so then he commanded me to be gagged, and if I spoke any more, that then I should be whipt again upon the Pillory.

So I remained about an hour and a half gagged, being intercepted of much matter, which by God's assistance I intended to have spoken; but yet with their cruelty I was nothing at all daunted, for I was full of comfort and courage, being mightily strengthened with the power of the Almighty, which made me with cheerful triumph over all my sufferings, not feeling one sad countenance or discontented heart.

And when I was to come down, having taken out my head out of the Pillory, I looked about me upon the people, and said, I am more than a conqueror through Christ who hath helped me. Let the King live for ever, and so I came down, and was had back again to the Tower, which I, together with Mr. Wharton, find a while, all our went to the Warden to know what should be done with me, who gave order we should be carried back again to the Fleet.

After I came back to the prison, none were suffered to come to me, but the Surgeon to dress me.

The next that I intended by the strength of my God to have spoken [if I had not been prevented by the Gag], I now forbear to set down, in regard I hear I am to come into the Field again to fight a second Battle, and which time I reserve it. If the Lord so order it that I may have liberty to speak, I doubt not but by the might and power of my God, in whom I rest and trust, valiantly to display the weapons of a good Soldier of Jesus Christ, come life, come death: and in the mean time, so what I have here said and written, I set to my name, by me, John Lilburn, being written with part of mine own blood.

John Lilburn.

At the Inner Star-Chamber, the 18th of April, Anno Dom. 1638.

Lord Archbishop of Canterbury,
Lord-Keeper,

Lord-Treasurer,
Lord-Privy-Scal,

Earl of Salisbury,
Earl of Suffolk,

Lord Carrington,
Lord Newcastle,

Mr. Secretary Cook,
Mr. Secretary Widdelsham,

WHEREAS John Lilburn, Prisoner in the Fleet, by Sentence in the Star-Chamber, did this day suffer condign punishment for his several Offences, by whipping at a cart, and standing in the pillory; and as their Lordships were this day informed, during the time that his body was under the said execution, audaciously and wickedly did not only utter sundry scandalous speeches, but likewise

At the Inner Bar-Chamber, the 18th of April, Ann Dom. 1638.

Præfent Lord Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord-Keeper, Lord-Treasurer, &c.

Whereas Jakob Lilburne prisoner in the Fleet, by sentence in the Star-Chamber, did that day suffer cruel punishment for his several offences, by whipping at a Cart, and branding in the Pillory; and as their Lordships were thus day informed, during the time that his body was under the said execution, audaciously and wickedly did not only utter sundry blasphemous speeches, but likewise scattered divers copies of seditious Books amongst the people that beheld the said execution; for which very things, amongst other offences of like nature, he hath been censured in the said Court, by the aforesaid sentence it is therefore by their Lordships ordered, that the said Jakob Lilburne should be laid along with iron on his hands and legs, in the Ward of the Fleet, where the usual custom of prisoners are said to be put; and that the Warden of the Fleet take special care to hinder the resort of any persons whatsoever unto him; and particularly, that he be not supplied with money from any friend; and that he take special notice of all Letters, Writings, and Books brought unto him, and seize and deliver the same unto their Lordships; and take notice from time to time who they be that resort unto the said prison, to advise the said Lilburne, not to speak with him, and inform the Board thereof. And it was lastly ordered, that all persons that shall be hereafter produced to receive corporal punishment, according to sentence of that Court, or by order of the Board, shall have their garments searched before they be brought forth, and neither writing nor other thing suffered to be about them, and their hands likewise to be bound, during the time they are under punishment. Wherein, together with the other punishment, the said Warden of the Fleet is hereby required to take notice, and to have especial care, that their Lordships order be accordingly observed.

Examined per Dudley Carleton.

And execution of this latter sentence in a most barbarous and inhuman manner, was punctually proved by sufficient witnesses, as follows, viz. Mr. Higge his Surgeon again testified, that that night Mr. Lilburne suffered, he was had back to the Fleet, and he repairing to Dr. Graue, to crave his advice, he advised him to let his patient bleed, to prevent a fever; and he accordingly came the next morning to the Fleet to let his patient bleed, and dress his feet, but he found him locked up close in a room, and was by the Officers of the Fleet denied access unto him. Wherupon he immediately went to the Warden, being then at Westminster, who denied him access to the said Mr. Lilburne, till the afternoon that he came home; which was a great act of cruelty, and much to the danger of Mr. Lilburne's health, and welfare; and the next day they removed him down to the Common Gaol, where they laid him in irons, and several times wounded him, to the extreme hazard of his life, and several times denied him access to him in his extremity.

Dr. Hakdard, Justice of the Peace, made Oath to this effect, that when Mr. Lilburne was prisoner in the Fleet, he was desired as a Physician to visit him; and going so to do, he was again and again denied access to him; but upon much importunity to the Warden, he was admitted to him; when he found in an extreme violent fever, lying in sweat upon both hands and legs, to the extreme hazard of his life.

Mr. Henry Doe further declared, that after Mr. Lilburne had suffered, he went often to visit him, who was laid in irons, and his friends denied access to him; and that the Officers of the Fleet strongly endeavoured to flave him; so that many times his friends were forced to bring his meat to the poor man's bag, and give them money to convey it to him through a hole in a wall betwixt them and him. Mr. Thomas Heuer further declared, that after Mr. Lilburne suffered, he often went to visit him, and was beat by the Gaolers, and was in danger to have lost his life for doing; and that they to flave him laboured to flave Mr. Lilburne, that they were forced to convey his diet to him by the poor men that begged at the grate; but the Gaolers finding out that Mr. Lilburne per his diet that way, they dealt to convey it by the poor men, that Mr. Lilburne was denied of that way of relief, and then his friends put the iron of one Archer that was prisoner in the next room to him, for assisting the Deputy of Ireland for marking one Edward, to convey his victuals to him; which was done by stealth, through a hole where a board was pulled up in his door, when the rest of the prisoners were at the Chapel at service; and, my Lords, divers times the conveying of his meat to him, cost him and his friends, upon the prisoners, &c. more than the meat itself.

Robert Ellis, late a fellow-prisoner with Mr. Lilburne in the Fleet, upon Oath declared before their Lordships, that the Officers of the Fleet after they brought Mr. Lilburne into the common Ward, kept him very barbarously and cruelly, laying him for a long time in cross, binding his hands from him, and his viaticum; and several times had like to have slain him, and murther him, and he continually believed, that if he had not helped him, for which they took his bed from him, and put him off the charity, and kept him five weeks in a dungeon, and had like to have murthered him, and afterwards removed him to the King's Bench, that so they might the more easily have their wills of Mr. Lilburne, &c.

Their Lordships being fatigued of the injustice and illegality of the proceedings, Mr. Bradlow said, that he conceived no man's sufferings in the Kingdom had been so great as his Client's were: for a Gentleman to be so cruelly tortured and whipped, pillory'd, gagged, close imprisoned, ironed, beat and wounded, and that contrary to Law, is a cruelty unheard of, and therefore hoped that for such unparalleled sufferings, and oppressions, the said Board upon their Lordships honorable Justice would give and make him forth unparalleled damages, and recompence many of his Judges that did him injustice be dead, yet he hoped the head of Justice of our Honours, joined with the honourable House of Commons, will be so long, as to reach their living and surviving estates, and out of them, &c. make him speedily, large and unparalleled reparations.

Mr. Gaud then spoke in the behalf of Mr. Lilburne (and afterwards printed his arguments), and said the punishment inflicted upon him may be reduced to four heads:

(1.) Imprisonment, whereby a man is bereaved alive, both the comfort and benefit of his five senses, and is made Carus femoralis leges, the unmovable penalty of the law, or as a dead carcass. "To trust, that in itself it is the effect of all corporal punishments: but the continuance of it, makes it look a lingering death, which, it is better to be upon the sick an hour, than to be imprisoned a year: as it is better to be once out of the Fleet, than to be laid up to a perpetual drooping; especially for an active spirit, there is no such torment as to deprive him of liberty; for active Talibus was contained only to sit still: there is no end of such a misery, as the Hebrew poet saying Tyram said, Nemine tibi redit in praxia, to put a man out of his pain, was always counted a favour. But Mr. Lilburne's imprisonment was aggravated by three things or gradations.

1. A vile imprisonment, not the clearest lined to come to him, we do not find that any of the primitive Christians were used by the Tyrants, nor then that they charge might be answered in the Scripture, Istam in praxia, and yet in praxia; and many matters of state and high concerns were always excepted; but the Surgeon was not permitted to be near to Mr. Lilburne to dress him, nor the Physician when he was in a fever, a cruelty unknown of amongst the Turks: for they are careful of their slaves in their sickness, and fasten them, that they may endure their blows, but it is too probable that those which were Mr. Lilburne's malicious enemies, did too much thrust aside his blood.

2. The Keepers were ordered to take care that no money be conveyed to him, which argues that they had a desire to flave him: the Prophet saith, It is better to die by the face of the sun, than famine, which is the greatest of all torments; for all punishments may be undergone by patience, but only hunger: which the more any man thinks by patience to overcome, the more violent it is. Undoubtedly, had it not been for the gift of some poor resolute fellow-prisoners, Mr. Lilburne had been starved to death, for twice that any of the four Houses of Parliament, which were Lordsburg, commons, knights, burgesses, bearing, bearing, bearing, and bearing, and bearing, and bearing, yet most justly, did the same Judges for three times punish the instant to be taken or delivery another man. This going about to murder, say the giving of the lie, because it is preparatory to murder, by striking quarrels, was condurable in that Court, A modo facilius, much more from the stronger, than in this case used, where there was so much care by itself, that death might probably have ensued, had not God by his extraordinary mercy supported him in their false affliction, their unjust Judges for transgressing not only the bounds of humanity, but all the rules of their own ordinary Justice, ought to make Mr. Lilburne answerable satisfaction.

This imprisonment was for about three years, until he petitioned the Parliament. Many times the best motions of anger are not as a man's own power, because he would not accuse himself as they do, they might have in a passion committed him, and the Sun might have gone down upon their wrath; nay, the Moon might have murthered his passion, or the summer fierce might have melted their frozen cruelty, or the winter cold have allayed the heat of their malice, or the Sea might have made him revolution, but their malice continued three years; and had not been delivered by the Justice of the Parliament, in probability might have continued for ever.

(3.) Whipping, a most painful and shameful punishment; Flagellations and Scourgings being for slaves and unmerciful rogues, and hedge-robbers. In ancient Edict, one Carmentis brought a slave from Rome, and would scourge him cruelly, for which he was questioned, and it was rebuffed, that Edict was too pure an act for slaves to breathe in, and it was often refused in the St. Chamber, that no Gentleman was to be whipped for any offence whatsoever: it being well known that Jakob Lilburne's ancestors have been ancient Gentlemen, and that which their Judges could not be ignorant of, especially the Earl-Marshall, who is petitioned to know all the ancient Gentry in the Kingdom. But the late whippings were never used amongst the Africans, Persians, Greeks, or Romans, &c.

1. It was from the Fleet to Westminster (above a mile distance) a great concourse and confidence of people looking upon him, as if he had been some miserable slave.

2. He received every two or three days a blow, 500 strokes at the least for one Mr. Richard, that was laid along with him, testified that so far as he was able to judge, he received not less, but of the first he was most cruel; and this was with a triple-coiled whip, which at least twenty knots upon it.

Although the Roman no malefactor had ever above forty stripes, and every stroke stood for three stripes, for the whip was of three thongs, and but one knot at the end of every thong. St. Paul received thirty-nine stripes, which was but thirteen blows. Not long since in Orlans, a French was sentenced to be whipped for some time, having shod a poor man's red, telling him that their people St. Francis would come and sit with him: such a night, at which time he perswaded and flogged himself to be St. Francis, and was taken in bed with her, and it was exactly praised by the King's Advocates, that he might receive fourteen blows with a three-coiled whip, which is infinitely and far such cruelty, because it is as a horse shod with twelve, but the Judges would not suffer him to have above three blows, because emphatically four fives, to ours are to be enlarged. And in doubtful matters it must always be presumed for charity and gentleness, according to which account, Mr. Lilburne received 2000 stripes: for in every blow there was twenty stripes, by reason of the twenty knots, which being multiplied in 2000, and in every blow there was shame and pain, compulsion of the flesh, bruising and effusion of blood.

(5.) The Pillory, a punishment formerly painful, but exceeding shameful, and most terrible to a gentleman's nature, to stand two hours in open view of all men, as if he had been unworthy to tread upon the earth, the Sun shining very hot upon him, and not suffered to keep on his hat, and this is cruelly after his cruel whipping, that so they might put him to all the torture and pain that they could, argue abundance of wrath and malice.

This punishment of standing upon the Pillory, was first invented for Mountebanks and Cheats, that having gotten upon banks and fairs, to wrong and abuse the people, were called in the same kind, to find confessions to the view and open shame of the people; but for a Gentleman to be so forced, was never heard of, unless by that cruel Court.

(4.) Gaggings, an unusually and barbarous cruelty, to be exercised upon breath, not men, for man differs from brutes, both nature and reason, and speech, a punishment never heard of in any age, cutting out of tongue, and perforation in cuts of speech have been heard of, but never in a matter of such a nature; and this to continue for above an hour, till the blood gush'd out of his mouth, as if they would have pluck'd his jaws in pieces, and all this for nothing, O infernal cruelty constrain!

So that by his imprisonment he was made a block, a dead trunk, or picture of a man, that had eyes and feet, not hands and handles, nor, by whipping, they endeavour'd to make him a rogue, or a slave; by the shod punishment of the pulley, to make him a choler, guilty of forgery and perjury; and by gagging, to make him a beast, and to upon the whole matter to deprive him of his reasonable soul, such cruelties that were never invented but by Tyrants and Whores in human shape, ferocious Lawless, in human shape. But then the persons that were to crush and tyrannical oppressors the offence.

1. This cruelty was commanded to be executed by an eminent Court of Justice, professing Christianity, persons of high rank and high character. 'Tis the greatest infamy to oppress and do injury, under a pretence of Justice. How often was it refused in this Court, that for a Justice of Peace or Constable to commit a crime, was ten times more severely punishable than in a common person, because it is to life, or rather abuse that sword of authority, to commit or countenance an unlawful action, which was obtained and put into their hands to suppress it.

2. The Emptiness of the persons suggests the offence, quodam per se non arguit, for a Gentleman to act against the rule of the Law and Gentility, is more reprehensible than in vulgar persons. It was called the Great of late-Chamber, from the eminence of the person, which were Judges: Stars of the greater magnitude, as being the highest Court of ordinary Justice; but Mr. Lilburn's Judges, instead of putting on the garment of Justice, were clothed from head to foot, and their consciences filled and moistened, with earliness and injustice mixed with the most polluted malice that ever entered into the hearts of any Judges.

And though some of them be dead, yet Justice lies though the party be dead; whenever becomes of them, their estates ought to make satisfaction according to their own rules, non est in corpore, sed in iure, he that suffers not in his body, must suffer in his parole.

A principal actor in this bloody tragedy was the Lord-Keeper Coventry, not less eminent in cruelty than in place, Judge of the highest list of mercy, the Chancery, which abused the edge of the Law, when it is too keen; for the Chief Judge of mercy to degenerate into a savage cruelty, cut head off amongst the Barbarians, how heinous is it? Not to speak of the abuse of the deprecatory Archbishop, that monster of cruelty, and sabbatary, whose estate we here sided with him, and therefore little can be expected from it.

The Bishop of London, then Lord-Treasurer, was a principal instigator of Mr. Lilburn by their own Canon, no Bishop ought to have a head in blood, because they pretend to be mild shepherds, but cruelty was their genius.

The Earl of Arundel was of an imbecill spirit against Mr. Lilburn, nothing but corporal punishment would allay the heat of his malice; who being Earl-Marshal, could not be ignorant that John Lilburn was a Gentleman: for him that by his place was to protect all Gentlemen from injuries, and should from to be active in the punishing such corporal indignities, cruel punishments upon a Gentleman, is a transcendent transgression against the laws of State and honour. It hath been confusable in this Court, to speak contemptuous words of a Gentleman; and how often had he offered insultation, for saying such a one is no Gentleman? And yet the same court and persons not only to say a Gentleman is a rogue, but to add him, as Mr. Lilburn was, in the greatest scandal to the public Justice of the Kingdom, that hath been heard of.

The Judges addressees, that are called the Fathers of the Law, and are said to carry Law in their breasts, for them to begin and promote such an unjust and illegal practice, for them that are set as Comptrolers to watch over and preserve the people's liberty, to be brought into such a manner, upon the hands of merciless men, was an offence of an exceeding high nature, for had they desired the illegality of their proceedings, and protested against it, as by virtue of their place (in duty) they ought to have done, it might have prevented the sentence. If the proceedings had been regular by informations, and examinations, or ex parte, as it was not, unless there had been some direct proof or speaking circumstance or very probable presumption, that Mr. Lilburn had been guilty of some high crime; it had been a grievous thing in them to have adduced in so cruel punishments. But when the pretences was no other, but concerning some of Dr. Regin's, Mr. Burns's, or Mr. Pym's Books, which they knew could be no breach of the peace, and that in the Star-Chamber, where there was no information, as in Mr. Lilburn's case, to administer an Oath, was all along with the High-Commission, and directly contrary to the provision of right, in 3 Car. and Justice Town had no reason for inflicting the corporal punishment.

But because Mr. Lilburn was a young man, therefore it was fit he should be punished: Is not this to turn Justice into Wormwood? Such Judges have ever been the most dangerous pests to a State and Kingdom, and in former times, for less offence, most severely punished in their persons and estates. The Lord Comptroler thrust exceedingly after the blood of this poor Gentleman, and the High-Commissioners had their hands as deep as any of the rest, in regard that by their warrant he was first committed: the most unjust and tyrannical that ever was heard of, so command a poor Gentleman to be taken to prison, without concerning him before them, or asking him whether he was guilty of any misdemeanour, a mere usurpation of authority, taking the sword of Justice into their own hands, not caring to defuse a poor Gentleman, to as they might carry favour with the Prelates their great parents; those High-Commissioners making themselves Judges, Gaolers, and Executions, and what not, to defuse the innocent.

It is considerable what punishment the Gaolers and Executions of this cruel sentence have delivered: for however if a writ be directed to a Sheriff, commanding him to take the body of one who is a Peer of the Realm, or a privileged person, the Officer is excused by his warrant; yet when punishment is clearly against the Law of God, Nature, and Nations, which prohibit all such cruelties and inhumanities, to make them bleed for the blood of Mr. Lilburn, would be an honourable piece of justice, and a precedent of much safety to the subjects in after-times, and Officers would not dare to be so unmercifully cruel; as the Sheriffs insisted for the Ship-money, though they had perjury from the Exchequer.

Mr. Lilburn's sufferings are beyond expression, and so honest heart but is feelingly sensible of every blow that was given him; in his imprisonment, Whipping, Pulley, Gagging, Hearings, Flanges, bindings, and the Irons laid upon him, every transgression, Exposition, that stands by the laws and liberties of the subject, was so used, and abused; for it might have been any such man's case, as well as his. His estate quite exhausted by their cruelties, his trade left, whereby he gained his livelihood, being before that time in a hopeful way of a Merchant, and well known to be very industrious in his calling; a man able to serve the Public, and by his merits hath procured the title of Lieutenant-Colonel in the present wars: What damages the Parliament will be pleased to adjudge and order him, he humbly submits to their great Wisdoms and honourable Justice, certainly not any of them would have suffered to much for ten thousand pounds.

It is the Lord's great mercy that he is yet alive, having continued with, and gone through such a sea of punishments and miseries. True it is, that in point of reparation, there is no proportion between money and such corporal punishment, to a generous spirit; yet as there was never more indignity and a greater dishonour to the Justice of the Kingdom, than by this wicked fessure, and the cruel execution thereof, thereby proclaiming it to all the world that an English Gentleman must be made a slave, to satisfy the malicious and violent humours of a tyrannical Court of Justice:

So it will be a very great honour and reparation to the public Justice of this Land, to give and adjudge Mr. Lilburn exemplary and proportionable damages, to be taken out of the estate of his unjust and malicious Judges, through whose injustice he not only suffered such cruelties for three years, that not one of them would have offered the like, nor sustained one of his stripes for many thousands; but left his trade and livelihood.

The judicial law was blood for blood, an eye for an eye, tooth for tooth, Gen. Damsel's accusers were cast into the den of Lions, with their wives and children, though David had no hurt by a miracle of mercy; by the equity and morality whereof, Mr. Lilburn ought to have paid and proportionable reparation out of the estates of his unjust Judges and Transgressors, who fought for his blood: but that God prefer of him by his extraordinary love and favour.

But all dropping spirits may cheer up and be encouraged, that Justice will run down like a mighty stream, when it shall be executed upon the greatest offenders: as now there is good hope that Mr. Lilburn shall by ordinance of Parliament have (truly good damages, answerable to his great sufferings, ordered and adjudge him, to be taken out of the estates of his unjust Judges, that may be paid unto him without further expense, who hath been at such extraordinary charges about the same, that to him reparation may be not only just, but reasonable, by which he shall be obliged to venture his life, and all that is dear to him as formerly he hath done, for his Honourable Judges in Parliament assembled.

Wherupon the Lords made the following Order.

Die Penult, 13 Feb. 1645.

"Whereas the cause of John Lilburn, Gent. came this day to a hearing at the Bar by his Counsel, being transmitted from the House of Commons, concerning a sentence pronounced against him in the Star-Chamber, 13 Feb. Ann. 13. Car. Reg. and after an examination of the whole proceedings, and a due consideration of the said sentence; it is this day adjudged, ordered, and decreed by the Lords in Parliament assembled, That the said sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, shall forthwith be set ever totally vacated, obliterated, and taken off the file; all Courts where they are yet standing, as appeal, and most unjust, against the liberty of the said Lilburn, and law of the said Alagna Chorse, and unfit to continue upon record: And that the said Lilburn shall be for ever absolutely freed, and totally discharged from the said sentence, and all proceedings thereupon, as fully and amply, as though never any such thing had been. And that all other suits and process in the Court of Exchequer, for levying of any fine, (if any such be) shall be wholly cancelled and made void; any thing to the contrary in any writ notwithstanding."

John Browne, Cleric. Parliament.

But not affliging me any reparations in that Decree (the doing of which the House of Commons left unto them, and the Lords according to former custom looked upon to be their right in law to do), I pressed their affliging me particular reparations according to Law and Justice, out of the estates of my unjust Judges, that had done me so much wrong; upon which new address to them, they did upon the 5th of March, 1645, order, and decree, and assigned to be paid unto the said John Lilburn, the sum of 3000*l.* for his reparations, which for many reasons (as their being aiding in the wars to the King, &c.), they taxed upon the Estates real and personal of Francis Lord Goringe, Sir Francis Wileford, and Joan Ingram, late Deputy-Warden of the Fleet; and I afterwards by another decree for the profit being sent them, out of the said Wardens and Officers (as they were before the wars), with the allowance of interest at 4*l.* per centum, per annum, in case of abatement; for all or any part of it, in this purpose caused an ordinance to be drawn up, which fully paid their House the 25, 26, and 27th of April, 1645, and afterwards transmitted it to the House of Commons, where by reason of my bloody adversary old Sir Henry Foe's Interests, and of my imprisonment by Manchester's means in the Tower of London, it lay there till the 1st of August 1645, at which time 7 or 8000 of my true friends in London, signed and caused to be delivered a Petition to the House of Commons for my liberty, and the passing of the said Ordinance. Wherupon the House made this Order.

Die Martii, 1 Augusti 1648.

Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Lord Curzon, Col. Bysshe, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Holme, Mr. Copley.

"It is referred to this Committee, or any five of them, to consider how Colored John Lilburn may have such fine and satisfaction as he is entitled unto, as was formerly intended him by this House."

Henry Elyot, Cler. Parl. Dec. Com. Upud

Upon which Order I got the Committee to meet, and preferred a Petition to them. Upon which Petition, the Parliament having disposed of all that Part of the Lord Grosvenor's Estate that I should have had, unto the Lord Esq. and also compounded with Sir Francis Woodcock's Heir, the said Committee were pleased to sit entirely upon the Lord-Keeper's Estate, as the principal guilty Man; of which, when the young Lord Conway, his Son and Heir, heard thereof in France, he came posting to England as I Amuse, [saying] what such a Precedent might bring upon him, if his Father's Estate [after death] should be compelled to make me Satisfaction; he being in capital Injustice, that it was that Court should be taken, his Estate left him by his Father [if it were true] I would not deny on his Father's palpable Injustice committed in his Lifetime. And Alas for being in the said Boyer with his Father, being so unjust as the other, and having a Brother (viz. George Woodcock) and other considerable Interests in the House of Commons, to gladden their Friends there, that they put a Stop to the second reading of the aforesaid Ordinance. When I felt fully understood by the Speaker's Motion, then my great personal Friends, who one Day began to reason with Member of the House [as I may say] Friends about the unreasonable fix my Reputation upon the Estate of the deceased Lord Grosvenor, say, to give me my Reparations at all times the House of those Persons that did me wrong, for fear the Parliament is to be made such to themselves. "For, say, and the Speaker, [as the Member] of me of my Son and Heir. It is to be said in Law, to make Satisfaction to all those Men (out of which I should have been) that I have in the Eye of the Law wronged." [By signing Wm. de Oudis, and Decrees, by the Command of my Supremacy] he would have been a Beggar, although I should have him 5 or 6000 l. per annum; and therefore desired the said Member's Concurrence with him. And for the clamorous Importunity [as they called it] of me and my Friends, to give me Reparations; but yet to do it in such a Way, that the Precedent might not in future make themselves smart for their Injustice to particular Men." Of which, when the said Member told me, he said, they were refused to make the Commonwealth my Paymaster out of the publick Treasury, and colour over the Journals of it with my Pretences. "That Grosvenor's Estate, formerly assigned me, they had since disposed of to the Commonwealth's use, to the Lord Esq. and therefore now it would be so Injustice to the Commonwealth [although in the Star-Chamber I never wronged me] to pay me my Reparations." And in finding I was like to be baffled, I delivered the under-written to every individual Member of the Honourable House of Commons.

The Honorable Remembrance of Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne, Sept. 4. 1648.

Honorable Sir,
Vouchsafe to take Notice, and seriously to consider, That the full Week this present Parliament last, which is now almost half eight Years ago, I presented an humble Petition to the House of Commons, for Justice and Right against the cruel Judges of the High-Chancery-Court, and the Star-Chamber; and I had the Honour (the same Day it was presented) to be one of the first Prisoners in England then set at Liberty by this Parliament, and also received a speedy, full, fair, and candid Proceeding, in the hearing and examining my tyrannical Sufferings: But by reason of Multiplicity of publick Business, and other great Obligations, I have not as yet been able to return to the full End of my legal and just Expectation and Right, viz. Reparations for my being, full, and tormenting Sufferings, by the aforesaid unjust and tyrannical Judges. I therefore do humbly to take Notice, That upon the first of August last, there was a humble Petition presented to the Honourable House of Commons, subscribed by many Thousands of honest Citizens, &c. humbly to desire you to put me in full Possession of all your by-past full Justice about my forefend Sufferings: Upon reading and debating of what this Petition, as in Answer to that particular of it, your House were pleased to make this ensuing Order:

Do Morda, 1. August, 1648.

Lord Carr, Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wrentham, Col. Byland, Col. Ludlow, Mr. Caply, Mr. Holland.

"It is referred to this Committee, or any five of them, to consider how Colonel John Lilburne may have Satisfaction and Allowance for his Sufferings and Losses, as was formerly intended him by his House." Henry Ellyng, Cler. Des. Cam.

Unto which said Committee at their full Sitting, I presented a Petition, the Copy of which was thus followeth:

To the Honourable the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to consider of Lieut. Col. Lilburne's Business, in reference to the Star-Chamber;

The Humble Petition of Lieut. Col. John Lilburne

Sheweth,
THAT besides your Petitioner's Sufferings by reason of his Banishment unto the Low-Countries, he was first committed by Dr. Lewis, Bishop, 4th, 1637, and afterwards had three Years Imprisonment, in the Common Goal of the Fleet, being whipped from Fleet-Bridge to Whitechapel, and enduring the cruel Torment of above five hundred stripes with knotted Cords. And upwards being set in the Pillory for the Space of two Hours, and by James Ingham, Deputy-Warden of the Fleet, gagged, causing his Jaws almost in Pieces, without Order, which Sentence was given by Lord Keeper Conway, Earl of Manchester, Lord Privy-Seal, Lord Newburgh, Sir Henry Fane, sen. Lord Chief-Justice Mansfield, and Judge John. And after the barbarous Execution of this Sentence, being April 16, 1638, the said Lord Conway, Archbishop of Canterbury, Bishop of London, Earl of Manchester, Earl of Arundel, Earl of Salisbury, Lord Clarendon, Lord Newburgh, Secretary of State, and Whitehall, joined another Sentence, in effect for the flogging of your Petitioner, and for the torturing of him with Irons upon Hands and Legs both Night and Day; and by keeping him close in the common Goal of the Fleet, from the speech of any of his Friends: All which was executed with the greatest

Crash that could be, for the Space of almost three Years together, to the square: It need of his Life, both by flogging him [which was with all Art and Industry several ways attempted]; and also by several Assaults made upon him by the said Warden's Men [in English chains] by the said Deputy-Warden, to the maiming and wounding him, whereby to this Day he is really deprived of the Use of two of his Fingers; All which, with much more, too tedious to be here inserted, was fully proved by Sir Robert Wrentham, before a Committee of your House, whereof Mr. Francis Boyle had the Chair, upon whose Report made, May 4. 1641, your House voted, "That the Sentence in the Star-Chamber given against the said John Lilburne, and all the Proceedings thereupon, was illegal, and against the Liberty of the Subject, and also bloody, wicked, cruel, barbarous, tyrannical, and that he ought to have good Reparations therefor." With his Vote (by reason of Multiplicity of Business in your House) sent your Petitioner (some Years of importance and chargeable Attendance) get them transcribed to the Lords; which was obtained in February, 1645, the 15th Day of which Month, your Petitioner's whole Cause was effectually perished at the Lords Bar, by his learned Council, Mr. John Bradshaw and Mr. John Gaud, and there every particular again proved upon Oath, by Testimony of People of very good Quality. Whereupon they concurred in all things with the House of Commons, leaving in the Matter of Reparations but upon the Delivery of a true Narrative, (which your Petitioner sent by his own Hand in a sealed Mouth) delivered unto every particular Lord; they made a further Decree, that your Petitioner should have 10000 l. Reparation out of the Effects of the said Lord Conway, Sir Francis Woodcock, and James Ingham, for the Reason alleged in an Ordinance which they passed in April, 1646, and transmitted to your House; where it hath lain dormant ever since, and is now referred to the Consideration of this honorable Committee.

Now, fearfulness as by the Jewish Laws of God (which are the pure Laws of civil Reason), he thus wilfully aureth his Neighbour is bound to the Performance of seven five things: First, "If it be a Benefit or a Wound, like for like, or to redeem it with Money, thereby to satisfy him for his Wound. Secondly, For his Pain and Tumors. Thirdly, For any such thing. Fourthly, For his Loss of Time in his Chalice. Fifthly, For the Shame and Infamy." All which is to be considered according to the Quality of the Person damaged; Which Reparations are to be paid out of the best of the Goods of him that damaged him, and that without Delay.

And as the Law of God, to the Laws of this Nation do abhor, and have severely punished (above all Persons) Judges, many times with the Loss of their Lives and Estates, who under Colour of Law have violated their Oaths, and defrauded the Lives, Liberties and Properties of the People, whom by Law they should have preserved, as may be testified by the forty-four Judges and Justices hanged in one Year by King Edward, divers of them for less Crimes than hath been done in the Case of your Petitioner; as may be seen in the Low-Book called, The Mirror of Justice, Page 239, 240, 241, &c. translated and revised this year Parliament; And by Justice Thorpe, in Edm. III's Time, who was condemned to Death for the Violation of his Oath, for taking small sums of Money in Causes depending before him; as appears in the third Part of Coke's Institutes, lib. 2. c. 15, 16.

And by the Lord Chief-Justice Tylloche, &c. who in full Parliament in Rob. II's Time, was attacked as a Traitor in the House, and had his Throat cut at Tyburn in the Afternoon, because he had given it under his Hand, that the King might create one himself, as his Pleighers, avowed rule to seek by, that the Law of the Lord prescribes him; as appears by the Parliament Records in the Tower, by many of your own Declarations, and also by the Chronicles of England.

Now, far as much as your Petitioner's Sufferings have been unparalelled, and his Prisoners followed thereby altogether in wrong, cruel, having lost his Limbs, &c. And fearfulness as by the Law of God, Nations and Nations, Reparations for Hurt and Damages received, ought to be finished as far as may be in all Persons, though done by Accident, and not intentionally, and though through Ignorance: much more when the Persons offending did it knowingly, and on Purpose, in the Face, say, in spite of the fundamental Laws of the Land, which they were sworn to preserve: And for that the Reparations in the said Ordinance alleged do amount almost to what your Petitioner spent on his three Years full Captivity, and his now almost eight Years chargeable Attendance, in being for it, besides the loss of a most profitable Trade for eleven Years together, and his Wife's, Tumors, Smart and Deluge, sustained by his said tyrannical Sentences.

He therefore humbly prays the Favour and Justice of this honorable Committee for some considerable Augmentation of his said Reparation; and the rather, because his Fellow-sufferer, Dr. Beaufort, had 4000 l. Reparations allowed him, whose Sufferings (he submissively conceiveth) was nothing less to great, in Torment, Pain, and Shame, as your Petitioner's. And fearfulness as the now Lord Conway, Son and Heir to the aforesaid Lord Conway, hath walked in his Father's Steps, in Enmity to the Lives, Liberties, and Freedom of the Nation: By being in arms at the beginning of the Wars against the Parliament, and made his Peace with the Earl of Essex for a small Matter, and since defrauded the Kingdom, his living in France privately, receiving the Profits of the said Estate which his Father lost him: And fearfulness as his said Father (the late Lord Conway) was the aforesaid Man in violating the Laws and Liberty of the Nation, although a Lawyer and Judge, sitting on the famous Seat of Justice, and a Person (as is generally conceived) who got a great Estate by Corruption, and particularly a Man that principally passed, as Chief Judge of the Court, both the aforesaid Sentences against your Petitioner: And as regard the Effects of the said Lord Conway, and Sir Francis Woodcock, by subsequent Orders of both Houses upon urgent Occasions, are much intangled and altered from the Condition they were in 1646, when the Lords ordered your Petitioner some Marks out of them; and for that the Effects of James Ingham cannot be found, nor at present come by: Your Petitioner, therefore, most humbly prays, that the greatest Part, if not all your Petitioner's Reparations may be fixed upon the now Lord Conway's Estate, to be immediately paid your Petitioner, or else that his Reason, and the Profits of his Woods and Gravel may

And if the said Sir Henry Gild, Sir Henry Belknap, and Thomas Bates, or any of them shall compound for their estate, so much of the said three thousand pounds as then shall remain unsatisfied shall be paid unto the said John Lilburn, or his assigns, out of their, or the toll of their possessions. And that Ordinance or Copy thereof, attested under the hand or hands of the Clerk, or Clerks, of one or both Houses of Parliament, shall be a sufficient Warrant to the said Committee of Sequestration in the said County of Durham, to pay the said 3000 l. as is before expressed, unless the said John Lilburn or his assigns; and likewise to indemnify and save himself, all and every person or persons, that shall any way sit in the performance of the trust and meaning of this Ordinance.

However, Lieut. Col. Lilburn, after great trouble, and much expense, got but little of the money collected here.

XXI. Proceedings in Parliament against Sir John Finch, Baron of Fordwich, Lord Keeper, for High-Treason, 1640. 16 Car. I.*

THE House of Commons having heard that great Statesman the Earl of Stafford, and zealous Churchman Archbishop Laud, began to prepare an Impeachment against the great Officer of the Law, the Lord-Keeper Finch, of High-Treason.

December 14th, a Committee was appointed to prepare a Charge against him; of which he having notice, fear to the House of Commons a Letter, desiring to be allowed to speak for himself, before any Vote pass against him. Upon this Letter there arose a great debate in the House, and after some time spent therein, it was granted him; and Monday, December the 15th, was appointed for the hearing of him.

On Monday he was admitted in this manner: there was a Chair set for him to make use of if he pleased, and a Stool to lay the Purse upon, a ledge on the side of the Bar on the left hand as you come in; he himself brought in the Purse, and laid it in the Chair, but would not sit down himself, nor put in his Hat, though he was mov'd to it by Mr. Speaker, but spoke all the while bare-headed and standing; the Sergeant at Arms attending on the House, standing by him with the Mace on his shoulder. And spoke as follows.

Mr. Speaker,

I do first present my most humble thanks to this Honourable Assembly for this favour vouchsafed me, in granting me admittance to their presence, and do humbly beseech them to believe it is no desire to preserve myself or my fortune, but to deliver the good opinions of those that have drawn ascribers.

I do profess, in the preface of him that knoweth all hearts, that I had rather go from door to door, and crave De abbas Salmos, &c. with the good opinion of this Assembly, than live and enjoy all the honours and fortunes I am capable of.

I do not come hither with an intention to justify my words, my actions, or my opinions; but to make a plain and clear narration for myself, and then humbly to submit to the wisdom and justice of this House myself, and all that concern me.

I do well understand (Mr. Speaker) with what disadvantage any man can speak in his own cause, and if I could have told how to have translated my thoughts and actions, by a clearer representation of another (I do so much defy my own judgment in speaking, and my ways in expounding, that I should have been a much wiser suitor another might have done it. But this House will not take words, but with clear and ingenuous dealing; and therefore I shall beseech them to think, I come not hither with a set or studied speech, I come to speak my heart, and to speak it clearly and plainly, and then leave it to your clemency and justice: and I hope if any thing shall rise from me, to work contrary to my message, or intention, suddenly or ill-plotted, you will be pleased to make a friendly construction, and have me the liberty of explanation, if there shall be any; but I hope there shall be no cause for it.

I hope, for my affliction in Religion no man doubteth me; what my education, what, and under whom for many years, is well known; I lived near thirty years in the Society of Gray's Inn; and if one that was a renowned Preacher in my time (Dr. Sibbs) were now alive, he were able to give testimony to this House, that when a party ill-afflicted in Religion sought to weary him, and tire him out, he had his chiefest encouragement from me.

I have now (Mr. Speaker) been fifteen years of the King's Council, from the first hour to this minute, no man is able to say that ever I was author, adviser, or confederate in any mischief.

I have told the King (my gracious Master), after I had served him twenty years, to prefer me to two places, in the Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and then Keeper of his Great-Seal: I say it in the presence of God, I was far from the thought of the one, and from the ambition of the other, that if by His Majesty's grace and goodness had not been, I had never enjoyed those honours.

I cannot tell (Mr. Speaker), nor I do not know what particulars there are, that may draw me into your disavour or ill opinion, and therefore I shall come very weakly arm'd, yet to those that either in my own knowledge, or by such a knowledge as is given me, and not from any in this House, I shall speak somewhat, that I hope being truth, and accompanied with cleanness and ingenuity, will at last procure some ally of that ill opinion which may perhaps be conceived of me.

Mr. Speaker, I had once the honour to sit in the place that you do; from the first time I came thither, to this instant time, I do appeal to all that were here then, if I served you not with wisdom. Still after I never did any of the House's good offices I have sometimes enough I did many; I was so happy, that upon an occasion which once happened, I received an exposition and testimony of the good affection of this House towards me.

For the last unhappy day, I had great share in the unapprehended recovery of it. I hope there are not enough do remember, no man within the walls of this House did express more symptoms of sorrow, grief, and dilatoriness than I did.

After an adjournment for two or three days, it pleased his Majesty to find for me, to let me know that he could not so relieve of things as he desired, and therefore was desirous that there might be an adjournment for some few days more. I protest I did not then esteem in his Majesty, and I believe it was not in his thoughts, so thick of the dissolving of this Assembly; but was pleased, in the first place, to give me a command to deliver his pleasure to the House for an adjournment for some few days, till the Monday following, as I remember, and commanded me withal to deliver his pleasure, that there should be no further speeches, but forthwith upon the delivery of the message come and wait upon him: he likewise commanded me, if questions were offered to be put upon my Allegiance I should not dare to do it. How much I did then in all humbleness reason with his Majesty, is not for me here to speak; only that much let me say, I was no Author of any counsel in it. I was only a person in receiving command; I speak not this, as any thing I now produce or utter, or take up for my own credit, but that which it knows to be true, and some honourable persons in this House, to be well true. All this I will say for that, it humbly to beseech you all to consider, that it is had been my own case, as it was mine, between the difficulties of a gracious King, and the ill opinion of an honourable Assembly, I beseech you lay all together, by my self address and behaviour in the last, I shall submit to your honourable and favourable construction.

For the Shipping business, my opinion of that cause hath been ever upon me; I shall clearly and truly present unto you what every thing I was, with the prosecution, that if as reckoning up my own opinion what I was of, or what I delivered, any thing of it be displeasing, or contrary to the opinion of this House, that I am far from justifying of it, but I think that and all other my actions to your wisdom and goodness.

Mr. Speaker, the first Writs that were sent out about the Shipping business, I had no more knowledge of, and was as ignorant as any one Member of this House, or any man in the Kingdom. I was never the Author nor Adviser of it, and will holdly say, from the first to this hour, I did never advise nor counsel the issuing forth of any Ship-Writs in my life.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that I was made Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas some four days before the Ship-Writs went out to the Ports and Maritime Places; as I do remember, the 29th of October 1634, they do bear title, and I was sworn Justice the 10th of October - so as they went out at that time, but without my knowledge or privacy, the God of Heaven knows this to be true.

Mr. Speaker, afterwards his Majesty was pleased to command my Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, that then was, Sir Thomas R. B. (now Sir Thomas R. B.), and Chief-Baron of the Exchequer, that then he, and myself, then Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas, to take into consideration the Preamble then brought unto us, which we did, and after returned to his Majesty, what we had found out of their precedents.

It is true, that afterwards his Majesty did take into consideration, that if the whole Kingdom were concerned, that it was not reason to lay the whole burden upon the Cause Ports and Maritime Towns.

Thereupon, upon what ground his Majesty took that into his consideration, I do confess I do know nothing of it.

His Majesty did command my Lord Chief-Justice that then he, my Lord Chief-Baron, and myself, to return our opinion; Whether, when the whole Kingdom is in danger, and the Kingdom in general is concerned, it be not according to Law and Reason, that the whole Kingdom, and his Majesty, and all interceded therein, should join in deliberating and proceeding therein?

This was, in time, about 1634.

In November, then following, his Majesty commanded me to go to all the Judges, and require their opinion in particular.

He commanded me to do it to every one, and to charge them upon their duty and allegiance to keep it secret.

Mr. Speaker, it is as is mentioned by his Majesty (so professed by him) at that time, and he declared to all the Judges, that it was not required by him, to be such a binding opinion to the Subject, as to hinder him from calling it in question, nor to binding to themselves, but that upon better reason and advice they may alter it; but desired their opinions, for his own private reason.

I know very well, that extrajudicial opinions of Judges ought not to be binding.

But I did think, and speak my heart and conscience freely, myself, and the rest of the Judges being present, and by our Oaths and to counsel the King, when he should require advice of us, that we were bound by our Oaths and Duties to return our opinion.

I did obey his Majesty's command, and do here before the God of Heaven avow it.

* This Proceeding explains the manner of obtaining the Judges opinions in Mr. Brouncker's Case about 20th May, Vol. 8. pag. 483. as also the 1st Keeper's Refusal for want he gave to Speaker in the Parliament 1635, for which see, ante Page 217.

Also this had not been intended, his Majesty not putting in 20th Answer to the Articles entered against him.

I did never use the least promise of preferment or reward to any, nor did I use the least menace; I did leave it freely to their own Conscience and Liberty; for I was left to the liberty of my own by his Majesty, and had reason to leave them the liberty of their own Conscience.

And I believe you are pleased to have some belief, that I would not say this, but that I know the God of Heaven will make it appear, and I beseech you that extravagant speeches may not more against that which is a positive and clear truth.

Mr. Speaker, in the discourse of this (as is between Judges) some small discourses sometimes arise, yet never was any cause wherein any Judge considered, that were so little conference as between me and them.

Mr. Speaker, against a Negative, I can say nothing; but I shall affirm nothing unto you, but by the grace of God, as I affirm it to be true, so I make no doubt of making it appear to be so.

This opinion was subscribed without sollicitation; there was not any man of us, did make any doubt of subscribing our opinions, but two, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Greke.

Mr. Justice Greke made not a scruple of the thing, but of the introduction, for it was thus:

That whereas the Petiti and the Movitions thereupon were presented, there according to the precedents in former times, the Courts lay on them.

So when the Kingdom was in danger, of which his Majesty was the sole Judge, whether it was not agreeable to Law and Reason, the whole Kingdom to hear the charge?

I left this case with Judge Greke.

The next Term I spoke with him, he could give me no resolution, because he had not seen the Writ in former times; but did give his opinion, that when the whole Kingdom was in danger, the charge of the defence ought to be borne by all.

So of that opinion of his, there was no need of a sollicitation.

I speak no more here, than I did openly in my argument in the Eschequer-Chamber.

This is the naked truth: for Mr. Justice Hutton, he did never subscribe at all.

I will only say this, that I was so far from pressing him to give his opinion, because he did ask me to consider of it, that I will boldly say, and make it good, that when his Majesty would have had him sometimes sent for, to give his opinion, I beseeched him Majesty to leave him to himself and his conscience; and that was the ill office I did.

The Judges did subscribe in November or December, 1635.

I had no conference, nor (truly I think) by accident any discourse with any of the Judges touching their opinions: for till February, 1636, there was no speech of it, for when they had delivered their opinions, I did return according to my duty to my Master the King, and delivered them to him, in whose custody they be.

In February, 1636, upon a command that came from his Majesty, by one of the then Secretaries of State, the Judges all assembled in Gray's Inn; we did then fall into a debate of the case then first unto us, and we did then return our opinion unto his Majesty; there was then much discourse and great debate about it.

More opinion and conference at that time was agreeable to that opinion I then delivered.

I did use the best arguments I could, for the maintenance of my opinion; and that was all I did.

It is true, that then at that time, Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Greke, did not differ in the main point, which was this:

When the Kingdom was in danger, the charge ought to be borne by the whole Kingdom.

But in this point, whether the King was the sole Judge of the danger, they differed.

So as there was between the first subscription, and this debate and consultation, four or fifteen months difference.

It is true, that all of them did then subscribe, both Justice Hutton, and Justice Greke, which was returned to his Majesty, and after published by my Lord-Keeper (my predecessor) in the Eschequer-Chamber.

For the manner of publishing it I will say nothing, but leave it to those, whose memories will call to mind what was then done.

The Reason of the subscriptions of Justice Hutton, and Justice Greke, (though they differed in opinion) grew from this, that was told them, from the roll of the Judges.

That where the greater number did agree in their vote, the rest were involved and concluded.

And now I have faithfully delivered what I did in that business, till I came (which was afterwards) to my argument in the Eschequer-Chamber; for the question was, A jura facias issued out of the Exchequer in that case of Mr. Hampden's; of which I can say nothing, for it was there begun, and afterwards returned, to have advice of all the Judges.

Mr. Speaker, amongst the roll (according to my duty) I argued the case. I shall not trouble you, to tell you what my argument was, I presume there are copies enough of it; only I will tell you there are four things, very briefly, that I then declared.

First, concerning the manner of danger, and necessity of the whole Kingdom.

I profess that there was never a Judge in the Kingdom did deliver an opinion, but that it must be in a case of apparent danger.

When we came to an argument of the case, it was not upon a matter of fact, but it was upon a matter of law.

Whether the danger was sufficiently admitted in pleading, and therefore was not the thing that was in dispute, that was the first degree and step that led unto it.

I did deliver myself as free and as clear as any man did, that the King was, to go on by the positive Laws of the Kingdom, that he could neither alter nor change, nor innovate in matters of Law, but by common consent in Parliament.

I did further deliver, that if it were used to make a further revenue to the King, or in any other way but in case of necessity, and for the preservation of the Kingdom, the judgment did warrant so forth thing.

My opinion in this business, I did in my conclusion of my argument submit to the judgment of this House.

I never delivered my opinion, that money ought to be raised, but Ships provided for the defence of this Kingdom, and as that the will was perverted.

And that the charge ought not to be in any case, but where the whole Kingdom was in danger.

And Mr. Justice Hutton, and Mr. Justice Greke, were of the same opinion with me.

I do humbly submit, having related unto you my whole carriage in this business, humbly submitting myself to your grace and favourable censure, beseeching you not to think that I delivered these things with the least intention to subvert or subvert the Common Law of the Kingdom, or to bring in, or to introduce any new way of Government; it hath been far from my thoughts, as any thing under the Heavens.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard too that there hath been some ill opinion conceived of me about February business, which was a thing far out of the way of my study, as any thing I know toward the Law.

But it pleased his Majesty, in the thickness of May, to give some short warning to prepare myself for that employment.

When I came there, I did both the King and Commonwealth acceptable service; for I did and dare be bold to say, with extreme danger to myself and conscience, (for as I understand by my meaning here) run thro' that business, and left the Forefe as much as was there.

A thing in my judgment, considerable for the advantage of the Commonwealth, as could be undertaken.

When I went down about that employment, I fancied myself about the matter of penalisation.

There were great difficulties of opinions, what penalisation was.

I did am myself as well as I could, before I did any thing in it.

I did acquaint those that were then Judges, in the presence of the noble Lords, with such objections I thought it my duty to offer unto them.

If they thought they were not objections of great weight as were fit to stir them, I would not do the King that dishonour.

They thought the objections had such answers as might well induce the like upon a conference with the whole Country, admitting me to come and confer with them, the Country did unanimously subscribe.

It fell out afterwards, that the King commanded me, and all this before I was Chief-Justice, to go unto Essex, and did then tell me he had been informed, that the bounds of the Forefe were narrower than in truth they ought to be, and I did according to his command.

I will here profess that which is known to many, I had no thought or intention of enlarging the bounds of the Forefe, further than Hen. IV. and that part about it, for which there was a penalisation about 26 Edw. IV.

I desired the Country to confer with me about it, if they were pleased to do it; and then according to my duty, I did produce those Records which I thought fit for his Majesty's service, leaving them to discharge themselves by Law and Justice, they might do.

I did never, in the least kind, go about to overthrow the Charter of the Forefe.

And did publish and maintain Charte de Foresta, as a sacred thing, and no man to violate it, and sought to be preferred for the King and Commonwealth.

I do in this humbly submit, and what I have done, to the Goodness and Justice of this House.

(Mr. Raynolds says, many were exceedingly taken with his Eloquence and Carriage, and it was a sad sight to see a Person of his greatness, parts and favour, to appear in such a posture, before such an Assembly, to plead for his Life and Fortunes.)

After his Lordship was retired, it was moved that this addition of the Lord-Keeper, might not be drawn into precedent; and in answer to what his Lordship said, Mr. Rely made this following speech.

Mr. Speaker,

Though my judgment prompts me to be still and be silent, yet the duty I owe to my King, my Country and my Conscience, move me to stand up and speak.

Mr. Speaker, had not this Syce so sweet a tongue, surely he could never have effected so much mischief to this Kingdom: you know, Sir, epitaphum patris patris, the best things purchased become the worst: and so it is in the natural, in the body politic; and what is to be feared then, Mr. Speaker, we all know epitaphum in the second, Justice said hinc, ne per secula trahatur.

Mr. Speaker, it is not the voice, we see fit out, nor the tongue, but the heart and actions that are to be suspected: for doth not our Saviour say it, Stem me by the words of thy mouth, O man? (St. James, not our Saviour's faith it.) Now, Mr. Speaker, hath not this Kingdom been, (scen, say it) say it and framed under the cruelty of this man's Justice? so malicious as to record it in every Court of Highway; as if he had not been contented with inflicting of us all, unless he created it to all posterity.

Why shall I believe words now, iam factum videtur? Shall we be to seek men, at when we have been injured and abused, will be galled again with false and compassions? Or, have little children, whom we have been whipt and beaten, be pleased again with treatment? Oh no, those be worse birds in the fennet of Parliament will say falsely, who in the winter of persecution, will for their prey now do it at all, upon our goods, may freeze upon our persons; and hath it not been with this man so, with some in that Admalty?

Mr. Speaker, it hath been objected unto us, that in judgment you should think of mercy, and be merciful as your heavenly Father is merciful; now God Almighty grant that we may be so, and that our hearts and judgments may be truly rectified to know truly what is mercy: I say to know what is mercy; for there is the point, Mr. Speaker: I have heard of foolish pity, foolish pity; do we not all know the effects of it? And I have met with the epistle to mercy, videtur misericordia, and in some kind I think there may be a cruel mercy: I say so, that the Spirit of God lead, Be not proud as judgment, my faith, not pitiful of the poor in judgment; if one of the poor, then, deus, not of the rich; there's the emphasis. We see by the set and intent appointment of our Courts of Justice, what provision the wisdom of our ancestors hath made for the preservation, honour, and esteem of Justice; witness our frequent Terrible sessions, and Assizes, and in what pomp and state the Judges, in their Circuits, by the Sheriffs, Knights and Justices, and all the Courts are attended off-times for the hanging of a poor Thief for the stealing of a Hog or a Sheep, say in some cases for the heading of a penny, and Justice too as terrible; and now shall not some of them be hanged and have robbed as of all our property, and shared at once all our sheep?

and all we have away, and would have made us indeed poor Belshazzars had we begged for half-pennies, when they would not have left us one penny that we could have called our own?

Let us therefore now, Mr. Speaker, not be so pitiful as that we become remiss; it is not painful in judgement, as to have no judgement; but let the deplorable effect of Great Britain now before our eyes, and consider how our most gracious Sovereign hath been abused, and both his Majesty and all his Subjects injured by these wicked influences; for which my humble motion is, that with this particular we become now as mercurial as to the gentility (the whole Kingdom) to grow mercurial.

Fiat Justitia.

Whereupon he was the same day voted a Traitor, upon the following particulars:

1. For refusing to read the remonstrance against the Lord-Treasurer Wylls, a Cor. when the Parliament desired it.

2. For soliciting, persuading, and threatening the Judges to deliver their opinion for the levying of Ship-money.*

3. For several illegal alights in Parliam. matters.

4. For ill offices done, in making the King dissolve the last Parliament, and causing his declaration thereupon to be put forth.

Whereupon it was resolved upon the quest on.

That Yoh. Lord Finch, Baron of Fordewich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, shall be accused in this House, in the name of all the Commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Misdemeanors.

Refused.

That a message be sent by the Lord Folliard, to accuse Yoh. Lord Finch, Baron of Fordewich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, in the name of this House, and all the Commons of England, of High-Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanors; and to desire that he may be forthwith impeached from Parliament, and be committed; and that in some convenient time this House will refer to their Lordships, with particular Accusations and Articles against him.

The next morning, the 22d, the Lord-Keeper (considering with what impetuosity and violence every thing was managed) got up early, and escaped in disguise into Holland, from whence he wrote a Letter to the Lord-Chamberlain, dated from the Hague, January 3, 1640.

My most beloved Lord,

THE Interest your Lordship both ever had in the best of my fortunes and misfortunes, gives me the privilege of troubling your Lordship with these few lines, from one that hath seeking late to force you whilst but his prayer; I thank your Lordship that never fail of, with an heart as full of true affection to your Lordship as ever was my. My Lord, it was not the loss of my life, and with this of my fortunes, nor being called from my dear Country and Friends, though many of them were cause of sorrow, that affects me, but that which I must suffer under it, the dissolution of the House of Commons conceived against me. I know a true heart I have ever been towards them, and your Lordship can witness in part, what ways I have used in that silence and patience but becomes me, with which I will leave myself and my actions to the favourable constructions of my noble Friends, in which number your Lordship hath a prime place. I am now at the Hague, where I arrived on Thursday the last of the last month, where I purpose to live in a fashion agreeable to the passions of my fortunes; for my humbling in this World, I have utterly cast off the thoughts of it, and my aim shall be to learn to number my days, that I may apply my heart to religion, that affliction that has swept away all joys from my eyes and heart, and lead me by the hand to true happiness, which can never be taken from me. I pray God of Heaven to bless this Parliament, both with a happy progress and conclusion; if my ruin may conduce but the least to it, I shall not regret it. I truly pray for your Lordship and your noble Family, that God would give an increase of all worldly blessings, and in the fulness of days to receive you to his Glory; if I were capable of serving any body, I would all your Lordship, that no man should be readier to make known his devotion and true gratitude to your Lordship, than

and most affectionate,

your Kinsman and Servant,

J. FINCH.

Jan. 14. The Committee having prepared Articles of Impeachment against the Lord-Keeper, they were presented to the House, and are as follow:

The Accusation and Impeachment of John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordewich, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, by the House of Commons.

Imprimis, THAT the said Yoh. Lord Finch, Baron of Fordewich, Lord-Keeper, &c. hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws and established Government of the Realm of England, and instead thereof to introduce an arbitrary, tyrannical Government against Law, which he hath declared by traitorous and wicked words, equivoals, opinions, judgments, practices and actions.

II. That in parliament of these his traitorous and wicked purposes, he did in the third and fourth year of his Majesty's reign, or one of them, being then Speaker of the Commons House of Parliament, contrary to the commands of the House then assembled and sitting, deny and hinder the reading of some things which the said House of Commons required to be read, for the safety of the King and Kingdom, and preservation of the Religion of the Realm; and did forbid all the Members of the House to speak, and said that if any did offer to speak, he would rise and go away, and said nothing should be done in the House; and did offer to rise and go away, and did thereby and otherwise, as much as in him lay, endeavour to subvert the ancient and undoubted rights and course of Parliament.

III. That the being of his Majesty's Council at the Justice Seat, held for the County of Essex, in the month of October, in the sixth year of his now Majesty's reign, at Stratford-Langton in the same County, being then of his Majesty's Council, in that service did practise by unlawful means to enlarge the Forest of that County many Miles beyond the known bounds thereof, as they had been enjoyed near 500 years, contrary to the Law and to the Charter of the liberties of the Forest, and other Charters and divers Acts of Parliament; and for effecting the same did unlawfully cause and procure undue return to be made of Jurors, said great numbers of other persons who were unknown, to be joined to them of the Jury, and threatened and used the said Jurors to give a verdict for the King, and by unlawful means did surprise the County, that they might not make defence, and did use several menacing wicked speeches and actions to the Jury and others, for obtaining his unjust purpose aforesaid. And after verdict obtained for the King in the month of April following (at which time the said Justice-seat was called by adjournment), the said Yoh. Lord Finch, then Lord Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of Common-Pleas, and one of the Judges assizes for them; he continued by further unlawful and unjust practices, to maintain and confirm the said verdict, and did then and there, being assize to the Justice in Essex, admit the refusal of the transference of the County, and all their evidences, but only what they should verbally deliver, which was refused accordingly.

IV. That he about the month of November, 1635, being then Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, and having taken an Oath for due administration of Justice to his Majesty's liege people, according to the Laws and Statutes of the Realm, contrived an opinion in law wrote, (when the good and sober, &c. Edw. State-Treaty, Vol. I.) and did subscribe his name to that opinion, and by perswasions, threats, and false suggestions, solicited and procured Sir Yoh. Bramhall, Knight, then and now Lord Chief-Justice of England; Sir Hamphrey Dunsford, Knight, Lord Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer; Sir Richard Hutton, Knight, late one of the Justices of his Majesty's Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Yoh. Darnley, Knight, late one of the Barons of his Majesty's Court of Exchequer; Sir William Jones, Knight, late one of the Justices of the said Court of King's Bench; Sir George Coke, Knight, then and now one of the Judges of the said Court of King's Bench; Sir Thomas Temar, Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the Exchequer; Sir George Fennes, Knight, late one of the Justices of the said Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Robert May, Knight, then and now one of the Justices of the said Court of King's Bench; Sir Francis Croxall, Knight, then and now one of the Justices of the said Court of Common-Pleas; Sir Richard Wylls, Knight, then and now one of the Barons of the said Court of Exchequer, some or use of them to subscribe, with their names, the said opinion presently, and enjoined them feverally some or one of them secrecy, upon their Allegiance.

V. That he the fifth day of June, then being Lord Chief-Justice of the said Court of Common-Pleas, subscribed an extrajudicial opinion in answer to question in a Letter from his Majesty, in her words, &c. Vol. I. page 487.

And that he contrived the said question; and procured the said Letter to his Majesty: And where the said Justice Hutton and Justice Coke declared to him their opinion to the contrary, yet he required and perilled them to subscribe, upon his promise that he would let his Majesty know the truth of their opinions, notwithstanding such falsifications; which nevertheless he did not make known to his Majesty, but delivered the same to his Majesty as the opinion of all the Judges.

VI. That he being Lord Chief-Justice or the said Court of Common-Pleas, delivered his opinion in the Exchequer-Chamber against Mr. Hampden in the case of Ship-money; that he the said Mr. Hampden upon the matter and substance of the case was chargeable with the money then in question; a Copy of which proceedings the Commons will deliver to your Lordships: and did solicit and threaten the said Judges, some or one of them, to deliver their opinions in like manner against Mr. Hampden. And after the said Baron Dunsford had subscribed to the said Mr. Hampden, the said Lord Chief-Justice purposed to the said Baron Dunsford Chamber in Stratford-in-Avon in West-Midland; and after the said Mr. Baron Dunsford had declared and expounded his opinion, urged him to retract the said opinion; which he refusing, was threatened by the said Lord Chief-Justice, because he refused.

VII. That he being then Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas declared and published in the Exchequer-Chamber and West-Midland circuit what he went Judge; that the King's right to Ship-money, as aforesaid, was so inherent a right to the Crown, as an Act of Parliament could not take it away; and with divers malicious speeches inveighed against, and threatened all such as refused to pay Ship-money: all which opinions contained in the fourth, fifth and sixth Articles, are against the Law of the Realm, the Subjects right of property, and contrary to former resolutions in Parliament, and to the Petition of Right, which said resolution and Petition of Right were well known to him referred and read in Parliament, when he was Speaker of the Commons House of Parliament.

VIII. That he being Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas did take the general practice of that Court to his private chamber; and that he sent warrants into all or many Shires of England to seize men, as so Francis Glyn of the County of Devon, Robert Brydon of the County of York, Attorneys of that Court, and to divers others, to seize £100 persons arrested on any outlawry for about forty Shillings fees; whereas now by Law so arrested can be bailed or released without superfluous under £10, or reversal.

* Lord Carleton in his History, Vol. I. pag. 71. (See Edition) says, Undoubtedly my Lord Finch spoke in the Exchequer-Chamber made Ship-money much more abhorred and formidable than all the Commissions by the Council-Table, and all the Directives taken by the Sheriffs in England, &c. pag. 74. 75. he took up Ship-money while Sir Yoh. Finch was a more extraordinary abettor in the People, upon the behalf of Ship-money; and says of reputation and Authority enough to convince and advance the King's Service. Lord Carleton's History, Vol. I. pag. 171. in 170.

Vol. VII. S C

IX. That he being Lord Chief-Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, upon a pretended suit begun in Milbourne-Term, in the fifth year of his Majesty's reign, although there was no plaint or declaration against him, did notoriously, and contrary to all Law and Justice, by threats, menaces, and importunities, compel Thomas Lawrence, an Executor, to pay nineteen pious twelve shillings; and likewise caused Richard Bernard, being only Over-see of the last Will of that Testator, to be arrested for the payment of the said money, contrary to the advice of the rest of the Judges of that Court, and against the known and ordinary course of Justice, and his said Oath and Knowledge; and denied his Majesty's subjects, the common and ordinary Justice of this Realm, as to Mr. Lewis, and others; and for his private benefit endangered and ruined the estate of very many of his Majesty's subjects, contrary to his Oath and Knowledge.

X. That he being Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, and sworn one of his Majesty's Privy-Council, did by false and malicious flanders libelously to incense his Majesty against Parliament, and did frame and advise the publishing the Declaration after the dissolution of the last Parliament.

All which Treasons and Misdemeanours above-mentioned, were done and committed by the said John Lord Finch, Baron of Perthuis, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and thereby he the said Lord Finch hath notoriously, and contrary to his Allegiance laboured to lay imputations and scandals upon his Majesty's Government, and to alienate the hearts of his Majesty's loyal People from his Majesty, and to set a division between them, and to ruin and deface his Majesty's Realm of England, for which they the said Lord Finch, and England, of High treason against his Majesty's Majesty Lord the King, his Crown and Dignity, of the Misdemeanours above-mentioned. And the said Court by its jurisdiction, having to themselves the liberty of exhibiting, at any time hereafter, any other accusation or impeachment against the said Lord Finch, and also by virtue of the proviso, that the said John Lord Finch shall make answer the said division, or in any other kind of offering proof of the premises, or any of other imputations or accusations that shall be exhibited by them, in the said trial, according to the course of Parliament, require it, that the said John Lord Finch, Baron of Perthuis, Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England, may be put to answer to all and every of the premises, and just Proceedings, Executions, Trials, and Judgments, as may be upon every of them, had and used, as is agreeable to Law and Justice.

After reading these Articles, resolved upon the Question,

That these Articles thus read and ingross'd shall be sent to the Lords, in maintenance of the Commons charge against John Lord Finch of Perthuis, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England.

Mr. Arthur Goudon is appointed to go up with a message to the Lords to a conference with their Lordships, by a Committee of both Houses, concerning Articles to be deliver'd in maintenance of the Commons accusation of John Lord Finch of Perthuis, late Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal of England; and concerning the liberty and property of the subject.

As the request of the Lord Folkeham, Mr. Hyde is appointed to be assistant unto him, for the reading of the Articles to be deliver'd against the late Lord-Keeper.

Mr. Gowen brought answer, that according to the order of this House, he had deliver'd the message to their Lordships, and their Lordships will give meeting to-morrow morning, at nine of the Clock, by a Committee of the whole House, as is desired.

Accordingly the Articles against the Lord-Keeper were presented to the Lords; and after reading the same, the Lord Folkeham spoke as follows:

My Lords,
THESE Articles against my Lord Finch being read, I may be bold to apply that of the Poet, Nihil refert verba sua quis legator; and I doubt not but your Lordships may be of the same opinion, of which the House of Commons appears to have been, by the choice they have made of me, that the charge I have brought is such, as needs no assistance from the binger, leaving yet to me such as the colour of a colour for my defence, including all possible evidence, and all possible aggravation (that addition alone excepted) which he alone could make, and hath made; I mean, his confessions included in his right.

Here are many and mighty Crimes, Crimes of Supererogation, (so that High-Treason is but a part of his charge) pursuing him feverently in every several condition, (being a silent Speaker, an unjust Judge, and an unconfessable Keeper). That his life appears a perpetual warfare (by mines, and by battery, by battle, and by stratagem,) against our fundamental Laws, which (by his own confession) several Consequels hath left untouched, against the excellent constitution of this Kingdom, which hath made it appear arms through rather an Idea, than a real Commonwealth, and polluted the honour and splendour of this to be a wonder of every other Nation; and then with such unbecoming success, that as he always intended to make our ruin a ground of his advancement, so his advancement the means of our further ruin.

After that, contrary to the further end of his place, and the ending of that meeting in which he held his place, he had, as it were, gag'd the Commonwealth, taking away (to his power) all power of speech from that Body, of which he ought to have been the mouth, and which alone can perfectly represent the condition of the People, whom they only represent: which if he had not done, in all probability, what is grave and judicious an Assembly might have offered to the consideration of so gracious and just a Prince, had occasioned the redress of the grievances they then suffered, and permitted the things which they have since endured, according to the ancient maxim, Quid quis loquitur. He pursued this officer towards the Parliament, by invading against the Members, by scandalizing their proceedings, by compelling upon their Acts and Declarations, by usurping and depriving the right, by diminishing and abrogating the power, both of that and other Parliaments, and making them (as much as in him lay) both useless and odious to his Majesty; and pursued his hatred to this fountain of Justice by corrupting the streams of it, the Laws, and perverting the conduct-pipes, the Judges.

He profaned the sanctification of ancient and serious perambulations of particular Forests, the better to prepare himself to annihilate the as-cient and serious perambulation of the whole Kingdom, the more and boundaries between the liberties of the subject and invasive power; he endeavoured to have all terrors domestically, by bringing all Law from his Majesty's Courts into his Majesty's breast; he gave our goods to the King, our lands to the Door, our liberties to his Sheriffs; so that there was no way by which we had not been appalled, and destroyed, if the power of this period had been equal with his will, or that the will of his Majesty had been equal to his power.

He not only by this means made us liable to all the effect of an Invasion from without, but (by destruction of our liberties, which included the destruction of our property, which included the destruction of our industry) made us liable to the torments of all invaders, that of want and poverty. So that if what he plotted had taken root, and he made it, as sure as his Declaration could make it, (what himself was not, Parliament-proof) in this wealthy and happy Kingdom, there could have been left no abundance but of grievances and discontentment, no satisfaction but amongst the guilty. It is generally observed of the Plague, that the infection of others is as carnal, and constant desire of all that are seized by it; and as this design resembles that disease, in the ruin, destruction, and desolation it would have wrought, so it seems no less like it in this effect: he having so laboured to make others share in that guilt, that his satisfaction was not only his action, but his works, making use both of his authority, his interest, and importunity, to persuade, and in his Majesty's name (whose Fief is known to give that excellent prerogative to his Person, that the Law gives no place, nor to be able to do wrong) to threaten the rest of the Judges, to sign opinions contrary to Law, to sign answer contrary to their opinions, to give Judgment which they ought not to have given, and to recant Judgment when they had given it as they ought: so that whoever considers his case, and concernment, both in the growth and in the immortality of this project, cannot but by the same way, by which the wisdom judgment found the true mother of the Child, discover him out only to have been the seltier, but the father of this most pernicious and curious design.

I shall not need to observe, that this was plotted and pursued by an Englishman against England, (which increased the Crime no less degree than Paricide is beyond Murder) that this was done in the greatest manner joined to the greatest bond, being against the general Liberty, and public property, by a sworn Judge (and if that fell ill, because unfavourable, the Gospel hath design'd whether it may be call) that he poisoned every antipathy, and turned our guard into a destruction, making Law the ground of illegality, that he used this Law not only against us, but against itself, making it, as I may say, Fals de Jure, making the presence (for I can scarce say the appearance of it) to be contributory to the utter ruin of itself.

I shall not need to say, that either this is (or can be) of the highest kind, and in the highest degree of Parliamentary Treason, a Treason which needs not a comparison of many former actions, which alone were Treason, to prove a Treason all together, and by that demonstration of the intention, to make that formally Treason which were materially but a misdemeanor: this is a Treason as well against the King, as against the Kingdom; for whatsoever is against the whole, is undoubtedly against the Head, which takes from his Majesty the ground of his rule, the Laws, (for if foundations be destroyed, the pinacles are most endangered) which takes from his Majesty the principal honour of his rule; the ruling over Freeman, a power as much nobler than that over Villains, as that than that over Beasts, which endeavoured to take from his Majesty the principal support of his rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules; (a better and fairer through and wall to the King, than the first is to the Kingdom;) and by beggaring a mutual distrust, and by that a mutual detestation between them, to hazard the danger even of the destruction of both.

My Lords,
I shall the less need to press this, because as it were unreasonable in any case to suspect your Justice, so here especially, where your interest is nearly united to you; your great share in positions, giving you an equal concernment in property, the more said pains used by your noble Ancestors in the founding and settling of our common liberties rendering the just defence of them your most proper and peculiar inheritance, and both exciting to oppose and extirgate all such designs as did introduce, and would have scolded an arbitrary, that is, an intolerable form of Government, and have made even your Lordships and your posterity but Right Honourable Slaves.

My Lords,
I will spend no more words, hactenus cum loquor, in accusing the Ghost of a departed Prince, whom his Crimes accuse more than I can do, and his absence accuseth no less than his Crime. Neither will I excuse the length of what I have said, because I cannot add to an error, without adding to the fault, or my own impotency, either in the matter or manner of it; which I know must appear the greater, by being compared with that blessed Gentleman's great ability, who hath preceded me at this time: I will only define, by the command, and in the behalf of the House of Commons, that their proceedings against the Lord Finch may be put in so speedily a way of dispatch, as in such cases the course of Parliament will allow.

The same day, the Commons order'd thanks to be returned from the House to Mr. St. John, Mr. Widdall, the Lord Folkeham, and Mr. Hyde, for the great service they have perform'd to the honour of the House, and good of the Commonwealth, in the translating the Articles against the late Lord-Keeper.

Jan. 30. It was ordered by the Lords, that such Judges as the House of Commons shall desire, are to be examined in the case of the Lord Finch, by the same departed Lords as were appointed in the case of Stratford before: but the Judges are not to be examin'd upon any thing to accuse themselves.

Feb. 15. The House of Lords thought fit, that a Proclamation should issue out to summon the Lord Finch, late Lord-Keeper, personally to appear before

One other whereof purporteth a fine pretended to be levied at St. Alben's in the Parish of St. Alben's in the County of Essex, between James Morris, Esq. John Morris alias Pope, his Son, Plaintiffs; and Gabriel Pope, Esq. and William Cocks, Esq. Defendants; of four Messuages, in Garlicks, and two Acres of Land with the appurtenances, in the Parish of St. Katherine Great Church, London.

One other of the said Parchment writings purporteth a pleading, setting forth the acts of the said fine, and beginning in these words, (viz.) Eliza. R. In memorandis de Banco, Anno triginta octavo Elizabethæ, viz. inter Ricard. Terminis Sancti Trinitatis Rollo xxi. ex parte Remissionem in Tor. munc. inter alia contineat ut sequitur, viz. Memorandum quod super inuentione in gradibus Rollo retro, de fidei et ipsi Banco in Terminis Sancti Michaelis, anni Regni Domine regine Elizabethæ, triginta octo et septima, quod Gabriel Pope, Esq. &c.

And one other whereof purporteth a Copy of a pretended Act of Parliament, intituled, Act to make and make good a surveyance and assurance, made of the Manor of Chipping-Ongar, Northoltenden, Southtenden, and other Lands in the County of Essex; and Beavers-Marks about Bevers-Marks in London; by James Morris, Esq. and Gabriel Pope, Esq. in John Morris alias Pope, and his Heirs, and to give the said fine where the said John Morris alias Pope, and his Heirs, according to the said conveyance: Are hereby declared to be forged and counterfeited, and are by their Lordships adjudged and decreed to be for ever damned and cancelled, and never to be pleaded, or admitted to be given in evidence in any Court, or Cause whatsoever: there being no Record of any such Fines, Pleading, or Act of Parliament to warrant the same; nor any Term then held at St. Alben's, when the said fines were pretended to be levied there.

And it is further ordered by the Lords in Parliament assembled, that the said John Morris shall by the 29th of November next bring, or cause to be brought into this House, the Copies of the said Parchment writings, (pretended to be found in the Treasury of the Court of Wards) fabricated by the said John Morris, that to the same may be cancelled and vacated.

John Brown, Cler. Parliamentum.

Eliza. R. In memorandis de Banco, Anno triginta octavo Elizabethæ, viz. inter Ricard. Terminis Sancti Trinitatis Rollo xxi. ex parte Remissionem in Tor. munc. inter alia contineat ut sequitur, viz.

"Memorandum quod super inuentione in gradibus Rollo extra. de fidei et ipsi Banco et Terminis Sancti Michaelis anni Regni Domine regine Elizabethæ, triginta octo et septima, quod Gabriel Pope, Esq. fecit cum predicta Domina Regina licet, pro concordia cum Jacobo Morris, Esq. et alio de Plito concidit. de Manor Chipping-Ongar, alias Anger ad Cullum, cum appurtenant. &c."

5 Novemb. 1647.

I have searched the Records of the Common-Pleas, de Terminis Sancti Trinitatis, Anno triginta octavo Reg. Elz. Rollo triginta prima, and do find that there is no inrollment of any such Record there, as is above-mentioned. Per Johannem Cocks, Cleric. Theſaur. de Com. Reven.

I have searched in the Treasurer's Remembrances Office in the Exchequer, amongst the Records of Trinity-Term, Anno xxviii. Regine Elizabethæ. Rollo xxi. but do not find that there is any such Record or Inrollment, as is above-mentioned.

6 Mar. 1647.

Memorandum, that I Francis Blake, Keeper of the Books for the searchers of fines, and of the Records thereof in the Chirographer's Office, have made diligent search in the said Books, and amongst the said Records of Michaelmas-Term, 35 and 36 Elz. and all the Terms after, till Hilary 38 Elz. and I can find no fine at all from Gabriel Pope and William Cocks, or either of them, to any person whatsoever, of any Lands in the Counties of Essex or London. And moreover, I find by the said Records, that Michaelmas-Term, 36 and 37 Elz. was held at the City of Windsor, and not at the Town of St. Alben's. All which I do hereby (at the request of Sir Adam Pope, alias Lindset, Bart.) certify to all whom it may concern.

F. Blake.

Here ends the Proceedings of the Lords against them.

Soon after a short Breve of Mr. John Morris's case was drawn up, and delivered to his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, by divers of the Parliament's Agents.

May is pleasy your Excellency,

BEING deeply oppressed in our spirits, and overburdened in ourselves, at the manifold and doleful outcries and complaints of the people, in all parts of our quarters where we come, uttered against the daily oppressions and Intrusions that are made by prerogative and arbitrary violence upon their common rights; and in particular, the cry and miserable mean of certain oppressed Commons, to wit, of John Pope, alias Morris, Esq. Isabel Smith, John Harris, and Lamard Dury, coming unto our ears, that we could not, but (as in duty we are bound) deeply reprobate their miserable condition, as follow-ers of their oppressions, and persons liable (when we come into their high capacity of Commons) to the said mischief, and therefore conceiving it our duty to contribute our utmost endeavours to the remedy of the same, we could not but undertake in some measure our duty unto your Excellency in their behalfs, who in such a hard and barbarous manner have been abused and supplanted of their common rights, by acts of violence and force, committed by John Brown, Clerk at n. s. House of Lords, and his accomplices, under the colour of several orders (unlawfully by misinterpretation gained from the said House, to the high usurpation and abuse of the name and authority of Parliament, in permitting the image thereof upon his own prerogative, outrage and violence, to the total ruin and supplantation of the just freedoms, and birthright inheritance of the said persons, as the several papers therewithal (submitted, for the full information of your Excellency, do demonstrate). And for more certain confirmation of our premises, signified by the same, he pleased to consider, that whereas the above-said persons are accused, condemned, and sentenced by the Lords (surprized by Brown's misinterpretations and delusions) to pay 3500*l.* fine, and suffer imprisonment, contrary to the regular course of the Law, during the pleasure of the said House, for forging and framing a copy of an Act of Parliament, touching the estate of the said John Pope alias Morris, pretended to be taken out of the Office of the said John Brown, with his hand thereto; so such original Record as Brown pretendeth is to be found in his Office: that since the said accusation, another original Record of the said Act of Parliament, with other writings and evidences for the said estate, is found in the Court of Wards, and they have caused copies thereof, examined and falsified by the Master of the said Court and his Clerks, the which, with their hands thereto, are herewith presented; and concerning the truth thereof, three of us can also give it upon Oath, that the wit. of one Geoffrey Cade, now prisoner in the Fleet, did declare unto us, that the said John Brown went to the Fleet unto her husband, and gave him twenty-five shillings in hand, and promised him five pounds more, and his inheritance, so far as the Lords had, that he forged the copy of the said Act of Parliament, and counterfeited the Clerk's hand unto it, and the said Cade did also confess the same.

Wherefore we humbly implore that your Excellency would be pleased to grant the said distressed persons your letter of request unto the Parliament, according to their Petition, herewith directed to your Excellency, that the said persons, and their adversaries, may be left to the free course and trial at Common Law; and that in the mean time, till the controversy concerning the estate be decided at Law, the said persons may enjoy their enlargement upon bail, without any further trouble or damage, and the execution of their severe sentence be suspended, and the said Pope, alias Morris, enjoy peaceable possession of the said estate, like as all his ancestors, from the days of Queen Elizabeth, have done before him. Which request is so reasonable and just, and their condition so miserable, desperate, and dangerous, and of such concernment to the whole Commonwealth, that no man, if such enhancements be not stopp'd and curb'd, can have any security in his estate or liberty, that we cannot but promise to ourselves your Excellency's commendation of their condition, and readily assist unto their just suit. Thus we humbly take our leave, beseeching your favourable consideration upon our petitions, and remain

Your Excellency's most humble

	Servants and Soldiers,

But I don't find any thing farther done in this business.

XXIII. The Trial of Col. JOHN MORRIS Governor of Pontefraet Castle; at the Assizes at the Castle of York, before Mr. John Puleston, and Mr. Baron Thorpe, Justices of Assize, the 16th of August, Anno Dom. 1649, for High-Treason.

COLONEL Morris being demanded to hold up his hand, refused, and the Indictment was read against him for Treason, for leaving War against the late King and the Parliament, upon Stat. 25 El. III. The Court desired him to plead Guilty, or not Not Guilty. Col. Morris. My Lords, under censure, I conceive this Court hath not power to try me in this case, I being a martial man, I ought to be tried by a Council of War.

Court. Sir, What do you say, are you guilty or not Guilty? This is the second time you have been asked: Sir, if you will not answer the third time, we shall know what to do. Are you guilty or not guilty?

Col.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I still conceive I ought not to be tried here; if I have done any thing worthy of death, I appeal to a martial Court; to my Lord Fairfax, Major-General, or a general Council of War: you have not any precedent for it, either for you to try me in this way, or me to suffer by it.

Court. Are you guilty or not guilty? This is the third time.

Col. Morris. My Lords, if your Honours will force me to plead, I conceive I am not guilty.

Court. How will you be tried?

Col. Morris. My Lords, I was never at any Bar before, I am ignorant how.

Court. Tell him what to say. [Upon that, some near him, told him, by God and his Country.]

Col. Morris. By God and my Country. [After that, challenge is made for Col. Morris to except against any of the Jury.] Mr. Beuclerk, a great man for the cause, says first rational, to be sworn as Foreman of the Jury.]

Col. Morris. My Lords, I except against this Bench.

Court. Sir, he is sworn, and you speak too late.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I appeal to himself, whether he be sworn or no. Mr. Beuclerk, Sir, I am not to answer you, but the Court. My Lord, I do not talk the Book.

Court. Sir, that is no matter, it's but a ceremony.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I beseech your Honours that I may except against him, I know him, as well as I know my right hand, to be my enemy.

Chief of Affairs. Sir, he is recorded foreman, there is no disputing against the Record.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I must submit to your Honours. [After that Col. Morris challenged to men, and my Lord Paynter, thinking Col. Morris tedious in excepting against so many, answer'd, Sir, Keep within your compass, or I will give you such a blow as will shake off your head.]

Col. Morris. My Lords, I desire nothing but Justice; for by the Statute of 24 Hen. VII. fol. 10. I may lawfully challenge thirty-five men, without showing any cause to the contrary.

Court. It is granted. After a full Jury, the Lieutenant read, and Evidence for the State very full, that Col. Morris was Governor of Penryn; which, Morris being very modest and civil, did not contradict any thing, until his time of answer.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I humbly desire a Copy of my Indictment, that I may know what to answer; I conceive I may plead special as well as general.

Court. Sir, you cannot by Law.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I conceive there is a point of Law in it, and I humbly desire to have Counsel; for I conceive by the Law, being arraigned for High-Treason, I ought to have Counsel by the Statute 24 Hen. VII. fol. 13.

Court. Sir, I tell you, you cannot have it.

Col. Morris. Then, my Lords, I conceive I am not any way guilty of the Indictment for Treason. My Lords, it is said to be against the King, his Crown, and against his Peace; whereas, my Lords, I can make it appear, I was only used by the Kings, and nothing against him, which may appear by my Commission. The Court looks upon it, and answers, Court. Sir, you are deceived, this is false, it is from the Prince.

Col. Morris. My Lords, it is very well known, my Lord Fairfax hath his Commission derived from the Parliament, and upon that he grants Commission to his Officers, which is all one and the same. The Prince took him from his Father, and I have mine from the Prince, which is full power, he being Captain-General of his Majesty's Forces.

Court. Sir, have you nothing else to say?

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive it is sufficient, for the State power, all Judges, Justices of Peace, your Lordships, your Prothonotaries, and all other Officers, did act by the State power, and all precepts and writs of Law were issued, and executed in his name, and by his authority.

Court. His power was not in him, but the Kingdom, for he was in truth for the Kingdom; the King's Highways, and the King's Coin being full power, is not his own, but his Subjects; and his natural power, and legal power, are different.

Col. Morris. My Lords, under correction, I conceive his legal and personal power are undivisible, all one, and cannot be separated.

Court. Sir, all is one; if the King had me kill a man, is this a sufficient warrant for me to plead? No Sir, it is unlawful. No, have you no more?

Col. Morris. I beseech your Honours give me leave, I am upon my life.

Court. Speak what you will, Sir, you shall be heard.

Col. Morris. Your Honours, my Lords, then, my Lords, I conceive I have said nothing against the Parliament, for that which I added, it was for the King. And hence the abolishing of regal power, I have not modelled with any thing against the Parliament, for that Act was but enacted the day of July last, and before that Time and Act of abolishing Kingship-Government, that princely Palace which I kept by his Commission was abolished. My Lords, I beseech your Honours, that my Commission may be read, to give satisfaction to the Court.

Lord Paynter. Sir, it will do you no good, you may as well throw a Commission from the Pope, all is one.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I desire your Lordships to do me that Justice. Lord Thyrpe. For my part I am willing, if my Brother be not guilty in Lord Paynter. Sir, we will do for Law to be void, it is to no purpose.

Col. Morris. These if your Lordships are not pleased to do me that Justice that it may be read, I desire it may be read to me again. [Upon that, Col. Morris received his Commission read.] My Lords, it seemeth strange, that your Honours should do that which was never done the like before, never any of your Predecessors ever did the like; I wish it may not be to your own and your friends wrong, that you make yourselves precedents of your acting, and myself of suffering. But, my Lords, I do not speak for saving my own life, for (I thank my God) I am prepared, and very willing to part with this lump of clay; I had a large time of repentance, it being twenty-two weeks since my imprisonment, and I am sorry for those which are like to undo the late sufferings, if your Lordships take away my life. And though I do not speak any way in defence, indeed at this present there is a cloud hanging over our heads, I desire there may be a fair Sunshine to dispel it. And though there were, a world of gloom in the Kingdom when I took the Oath, there is not wanting the same now, only the name is not yet come; and as I was to be the first brand to Scouring, to be (meaning Barren) to Township, and that to others; and though you take away my life, there will be others which will take up the Lintstock to give fire, though I be gone.

Court. Sir, you have little hopes to talk of any far to be given here, having received such a total rout an Ireland.

Col. Morris. My Lords, I should have been now living to have contradicted your late news concerning Ireland; but since you have given me a hint of it, you must give me leave to let your Honours know, that I received Letters from the Marquis of Ormonde dated the 31 of August, and yours in but the 2d; whereas he pleads to let me understand of the good state both of Irish men, and that whatsoever shall befall me here, the one shall be to those which he hath professed there, which are the same as good there. Therefore if your Lordships did not at all view my person, yet methinks you should have some care of it in your own friends good.

Court. Sir, have you no more to say?

Col. Morris. My Lords, still I appeal to my Commission, which I conceive is sufficient to defend me without, at what I have done, notwithstanding your power to the contrary.

Court. It is nothing at all, we have power to try you here.

Col. Morris. Then my Lords, (and I correction) Laymen may as well be tried at a Martial Court which is granted, those excellent Acts of Magna Charta, and the Prerogative of Right, would be delivered.

Court. But you are not bound on here as a Soldier, we shall do what is Justice belongs to us.

Col. Morris. My Lords, still (under correction) I have taken the Oath of Allegiance, and I conceive in that I was bound on so as much as I did or have done, though I had not had any Commission at all. And I beseech your Lordships that you will do me Justice, and not incline to the right-hand of affliction, or the left to hazard, but to have an ear for the accused as well as for the accuser; neither have I asked any thing contrary to my Allegiance, which Allegiance I was willing to pay to the Son, as well as to the Father. Now for the Allegiance, I owe to any person or authority but to itself, I know none.

Lord Thyrpe. Sir, if you have any thing else to say, speak for yourself, for this is not much to the purpose.

Col. Morris. My Lord, his true, since you have rejected that authority which I acted by, I might as well have held my tongue at the first, and spoke nothing, were it not for the Satisfaction of the hearers, but if it shall be so, that you will make me a precedent, you must do with me as you did with my dear and honored Lord [mercy my Lord of Stratford] making an Act for the future, that thus my following shall not be a precedent to any Soldiers hereafter. Besides, my Lord, this same Statute which you allege against me is, if that any shall act against the King, his Treason; which I have not done; but contrary, for him, and by his authority. And there is an Act of 24 Hen. VII. cap. 1. That whosoever they are they shall aid or keep the King at home or abroad, shall not be questioned at all.

Lord Thyrpe. I'm true, but, Hen. VII. then stood in a sick condition, and being an Usher, made that Act for his own safety; sometimes the case of Jury ruling, sometimes the Duke of Languey, and others maintaining, therefore was enacted.

Col. Morris. My Lord, but this same Act of H. VII. was later than that of Ed. III. which you have laid against me; and as yet was never repealed, until this last Act of 24 of July, before which time I had delivered up the place.

Lord Thyrpe. Well, Sir, it seems you have not any more to say. After he had answered, the Court commanded him to be led on there. [Counsel Blair being concerned at the same time.]

Col. Morris. My Lords, I humbly desire that we may not be managed; if you make any doubt of us, that we may have a greater guard upon us.

Lord Paynter. Sir, you shall have made both attempts through such guards, as were of purpose left to receive you, ought to be looked to now. Yet, if Mr. Sheriff please, I am content.

Col. Morris. Mr. Sheriff, I desire that this managing may be forbore; if you please to clap a guard of an hundred men upon us, I shall pay for it. This is not only a disgrace to me, but in general to all Soldiers; which doth more trouble me than the loss of my life. Mr. Sheriff, what do you say to Mr. Sheriff?

Col. Morris. My Lords, hitherto (I thank God) I have not done any unholiness or base act, and to begin now, I will not do it to save my life, and though you look upon me Kings-wifely, I vow to God, I would not touch the pillars, though it lay in my power to inquire you; therefore I still beg pardon, that I may not be molested.

Under-Sheriff. Come, Sir, it cannot be helped, you are commanded.

Col. Morris. My Lord, I beseech you grant me this favour; it is not my life I beg, but to forbear this managing, which shame and dishonour doth more trouble me than the loss of my life.

Under-Sheriff. It must be done. And upon that, did it, and carried him away. After dinner the Jury brought in their verdict, guilty of Treason.

* I then from Paris, "That one Morris, and one Middleton, were arraigned before James Thyrpe, and Judge Paynter, John applied the Kingdoms they pleads; "in which, Mr. Beuclerk, at the same material news, that they might be tried by martial Law; which was denied them."

"It was heard, said, of Trincom, and married with Baron; at which he took John, a material Act of Parliament to never after to be taken."

"It was heard, said, of Trincom, and married with Baron; at which he took John, a material Act of Parliament to never after to be taken."

"It was heard, said, of Trincom, and married with Baron; at which he took John, a material Act of Parliament to never after to be taken."

"It was heard, said, of Trincom, and married with Baron; at which he took John, a material Act of Parliament to never after to be taken."

Col. Andrewe. My Lord, I am here found guilty of Treason by that villain Bradley, whom I know to be more enemy, and the full man that I did except against: in which I conceive I have received hard measure, for none could have found me guilty of Treason, had they gone according to the Letter of the Law, which they did not.

Lord Palmerston. Sir, you speak too late, you are not to dispute it now.

Col. Andrewe. Neither would I, my Lord, if this were a Court of Chancery, but being a Court of Law, bound up in express words and law, I conceive I ought to dispute it, and my business better weighed.

Lord Palmerston. Well, Sir, you are found guilty, therefore hold your peace.

Col. Andrewe. If I must suffer, I receive it with all alacrity and cheerfulness, and I thank God I shall die for a good Cause, and the testimony of a good Conscience; for which, had I as many Lives as there are Stars in the Firmament, I would sacrifice them all for the same.

Court. Sheriff, Gaoler take them away.

Col. Andrewe. Well, I beseech God both King Charles, and fight for all those that fight for him, to have victory for him.

After he was committed, Colonel Bradley went to the General and his Council of War, that Andrewe might be relieved; but Colonel Protector replied it, saying, That it would not stand with the Tactics of the Army, nor the Safety of the Commonwealth, to let such a Remnant live, the Parliament having advanced him worthy of Death, and given Instructions to the Judges accordingly.

The Speech of Col. John Morris, Governor of Portsmouth-Castle, at the Place of Execution at York, August 23, 1649.

WHEN he was brought out of prison, looking upon the scaffold that was there set for him, lifting up his eyes to Heaven, kneeling upon his brest, he said, I am as willing to go to my death, as to put off my doubtlet to go to bed; I despise the shame as well as the Cross; I know I am going to a joyful place; with many like expressions.

When the Poet met him about St. James's Church, that was sent to the Parliament to mediate for a reprieve; and told him he could not prevail in it, he said, "Sir, I pray God reward you for your pains, I hope, and am well offered to find a better pardon than any they can give; my hope is not in man, but in the living God."

At the place of Execution he made this profession of his faith, his breeding, and the cause he had fought in.

1. Godliness. First I was bred up in the true Protestant Religion, having my education and breeding from that honourable House, my dear Lord and Master Stafford's, which place, I dare boldly say, was as well governed and ruled as ever any was before it; I much doubt, better than any will be after it, unless it please God to put a period to these dissipated times; this Faith and Religion, I say, I have been bred in, and I thank God I have hitherto lived in, without the least wavering, and now I am resolved by God's assistance to die in.

2. These points are necking, if compared to their docters and pains, which John Chrysostom hath said for us; when in a bloody sweat he endured the wrath of God, the pain of Hell, and the cruel and flamm'd death which was due to our sins; therefore I praise the Lord that I am not plagued with far more grievous punishment; that the like hath befallen others, who undoubtedly are most precious and blessed Saints with Christ in Heaven. It is the Lord's affliction, and who will not take any affliction in good part when it comes from the hand of God? And what shall we receive good from the hands of God, and not receive evil? And though I desire, as I am carnal, that this Cup may depart from me, yet not my will, but thy will be done.

Death brings unto the godly an end of sinning, and of all miseries due unto sin; so that after death there shall be no more sorrow, no cry, no pain, for God shall wipe away all tears from our eyes; by death our souls shall be delivered from troubles; and thus can upright body shall put an interruption, and the soul immortality.

3. Therefore blessed are they that are delivered out of so vile a world, and freed from such a body of bondage and corruption; the soul that enjoys immediate communion with God in everlasting bliss and glory; as it takes us from the miseries of this world, and the society of sinners, to the city of the living God, the celestial Jerusalem.

4. I bless God I am thought worthy to suffer for his name, and for so good a cause; and if I had a thousand lives, I would willingly lay them down for the cause of my King, the Lord's anointed; the Scripture commands us to fear God and honour the King, to be subject to every Ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether to the King as supreme, or to those that are in authority under him. I have been always faithful to my trust, and, though I have been most basely accused for betraying Liverpool, yet I take God to witness, it is a most false aspersions, for I was then sick in my bed, and knew not of the delivering of it, till the Officers and Soldiers had done it without my consent, and then I was carried prisoner to Sir John Ashmole.

Afterwards I came down into the Country, and finding I could not live quietly at home, I was persecuted by Col. Farley, Col. Courtenay, Lieut. Col. Forbes, whom I took for my good friends, to march in their troops, which I did, but with intention still to do my King the best service when occasion was, and so I did; and I pray God to turn the hearts of all the Soldiers to their lawful Sovereign, that this Land may enjoy peace, which tell them it will never do; and though thus tell me, yet will I put my trust in that; wherefore I trust in God he will not fail me nor forsake me. Then he took his Bible, and read divers Psalms in for his own occasion and consolation, and then put up divers prayers, both publicly, and some privately; which being ended he was executed.

XXIV. The Proceedings, Examination, and Trial of Col. EUSEBIUS ANDREWE, (a Barrister of Gray's-Inn.) before the High-Court of Justice, Aug. 16, 1650, for High-Treason.

Published by Francis Buckley, Gent. who was Assistant to Mr. Andrewe in the time of his Imprisonment, and an Eye-witness of all the bloody and execrable Proceedings.

ON Monday the 24th of March, 1649, Col. Andrewe was taken prisoner at Graysby by Major Forster.

The next day, he was committed before the Lord-President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, Kent, and Thomas Earl, Esq. three of the Members of State, delegated by the Council for the taking of the examination of him, and of Sir Henry Chibboly, Kent, Dr. Henry Edwards, and Mr. Clark, casually seated in the same Inn with Mr. Andrewe.

These Gentlemen examined him by punctually to every action and circumstance that had passed on his part since he took up arms, and especially since the surrender of Windsor, and his return from thence to Leam; and also concerning his several Lodgings, Names, Acquaintances, Removes, Abodes in the Country, Correspondencies by Letters, and Interest in places and persons, as if they had kept a Diary for him. Which considered, and that Sir John Gell, Bart. Major Bernard, Capt. Smith, Capt. Bayley, and Capt. Alford, (with whom he had the last and most questionable correspondence) were all in custody, he found himself to be betrayed, but could not at present grieve by whom; but well saw that he had better fall in his confidence, than to deny what he saw by the perfidy of some of these formerly trusted, and examined before his coming up.

In his Answers, he would have been circumstantial, but was kept close to the Question: at his departure he desired that he might let down his own Narrative, according to his own sense, which was granted him to prepare, and to send or bring to them as there was opportunity. And having totally, as much as in him lay, executed his fellow-prisoners as to any thing relating to his Delinquency, he was with them committed to the Gatehouse.

Wednesday following, he was re-examined and re-examined.

On Friday, he was again examined, and delivered in his Narrative to the Lord-President, and the House. But business happening, detaining the other two examiners, he was by the President returned.

On Saturday he was recalled, and there, as at all times before, was and treated with civility, and no little pressure to discover some great persons, his supposed confederates: the aim, as he conjectured (and that upon strong inducements, and some expressions) was at Sir John Parnes, Sir John Charles, and Sir Thomas Whitmore, &c. But he accounted it a great blessing in his unhappiness, that his misfortune was not fatal in any of his friends or familiars, who yet knew nothing of the extent of his Imprisonment, more than for what they were beholden to common fame.

On Sunday, he was called out of his bed, and by two Messengers, his Keeper, and his Man, brought into a boat at King's-bridge, at Windsor, and thence carried to the Tower. The warrant, which at the Lieutenant's house was read, informed, that he was committed close prisoner for High-Treason, in endeavouring to subvert the present Government, &c. to be kept still delivered by Law.

The Narrative follows.

To the Right Honourable the Council of State;

The humble Narrative of Col. Eusebius Andrewe, as to the Questions and Matters of charge, whereupon he was examined before President Bradshaw, Sir Henry Mildmay, and Thomas Earl, Esq. in that behalf delegated by the Council the 27th of March, 1650.

May it please your Lordships,

BEING unanimously, and by a treacherous practice seduced into an assent which renders me obnoxious to your Lordships Displeasure and Justice, and thereupon committed and brought to examination, I assured your Lordships delegates that I came with a resolution to deal candidly, and not to perjure my life by framing a lie, or denying a truth. The last purpose I still retain, calling myself wholly at your Lordships feet; humbly praying leave, that while I answer to matter of fact, I may be permitted to cloath it with pertinent circumstances; that while the one lays me liable to your Justice, the order may bring me within the capacity of your mercy; which in case it is afforded, I shall embrace with all humility and thankfulness. And if I am, I shall discharge within my bosom to justify God Almighty in his promotion of my ruin; and I hope Charity enough to forgive whoever have, or shall be instrumental to it, and bear the burden of my folly, with a full confidence of God's reserved favour.

My engagement for his late Majesty began soon after Henry Town, 1642, and continued until the surrender of Worcester, in July 1650.

I have consented to make my companion, not having a considerable, and not willing to own an intolerable estate.

I have not taken the prohibition, solemn league and covenant, negative Oath, nor taken the protest engagement.

John Bernard, formerly a Major under me, and by reason of his good parts and valorous demeanor, being in my good opinion, at my return to a private practice in my calling for my necessary support, frequent by order, and I passed to me such occurrences as he met abroad in discourse, and did often involve the discourse of the Reformation, the fallacies of the Levellers and Arians, and the proceedings of a certain Committee, or like Council of Officers, of which Col. Clive was chief, and himself after Col. Clive, upon a personal charge against him, for opposition, and against me, for my former delinquency, to the passing, promoting, or countenancing in which I was originally a stranger, it did over interest myself therein rather than the hearing his discourse; neither did ever willingly or intentionally meddle with any of the persons or actions of the Reformation, Levellers, or Arians, upon any of his discourses.

About St. James's Park, Major Bernard offered to me a acquaintance one Capt. Blythe, who soon after brought with him one John Gell (who presented to him he had concerned under Sir John Gell, was sincerely his friend, and until this time his dependent), who, submitted frequently produced to me treatises of Letters, (with the copying of which he proceeded to be entrusted under Mr. Raymond) which did appear to portend the occurrences in reference to the affairs of State, and their consequences at home and abroad, from their several agencies, which I only read in his sight, and immediately delivered them back, he pretending that he was to carry them to Mr. Thomas Bury to be transmitted over sea.

Capt. Blythe, and John Bury, in their discourses did insinuate that their interest was great in the Reformation, and that by them great advantage would accrue upon my insuperability to be done for the Royal Party, and magnified Sir John Gell's interest in his Country, his reluctance at what he had done in the Parliament's service, and his willingness to expiate his former fault with a beneficial service to the Prince. And Major Bernard propounded, that a former design in the time of the war laid by me for the taking of the life of Edw., might by their help, and the conjuncture of force brought to be effected by Sir John Gell, then to me a stranger, and by John and Bury, pretended to be willing and able to raise considerable numbers, to be raised and executed; and thereupon it was concluded, that I should with Bury try with me Cambridge would engage in it, and then ride down to Sir John Gell, to see if his strength and purpose were such as pretended; and this got to be repeated but upon the contingency of facilities in London, and London, was he full at last as concluded.

About the middle of December, Capt. Blythe brought me insinuations, to draw a petition for Sir John Gell, for the granting of his arrears, which I drew accordingly; and not long after, I was invited to give him a meeting, till then having not seen or corresponded with him, and received an invitation and instruction to arbitrate between him and his Lady, with Sir Thomas Pennington. And amongst other discourses, Sir John Gell did take notice of his inequality of his service, and his illness, and the multiplicity of what, and other services, to an end they intended not, and that he desired to be so understood, and when opportunity should be, to be introduced to the Prince, and did insinuate, that if ever he was to be up again, it should be for the Prince; and at several other subsequent meetings the discourses were general, and much to this purpose, but no particular design had or contrived.

The time limited by the Act for departures, viz. being near expired, and myself being purposed to withdraw into the Country, used the Summer Voyage, into some of the Plantations, and so to purpose being in treaty with Sir Edmund Pender, about the conditions of New Armo plantation, of which he was then almost Count Palatine, and Proprietor; on Saturday 16 March, I was unexpectedly visited by Major Bernard and John Bury, and they enquiring my resolution concerning my leaving the Town in obedience to the Act, I signified my purpose to go to New Armo or to Perkins; upon which they took an opportunity to make a proposal to me in effect, that they had a considerable design laid, and friends and money to set on foot and back it, and that I should have two or three hundred pounds in hand power to draw money by Bills of Exchange, for which reason should be necessary for my support, and management of what should concern the said design in London, if I would undertake to go over, and promote it to the Prince. And they did then in general terms signify, that it was an easy matter, especially the Cavaliers going out of the Town, by complicity in all Countries, to surprise the hearts of the army at their several quarters; and did insinuate, that Major Bernard had a design in thought, which as I remember he produced, and I believe was concerning such purposes, but was not read, but referred to further time of consultation. My answer was, that if the money were ready, I would dovert any former purpose from any Plantation, and entertain the motion.

Some meeting, they came again and informed me, that several persons of quality and fortune in Kent, Buckingham, and Derby, were, or would then presently come up near the Town, and would join in an engagement, and advance money; and that Sir John Gell would also engage, and might with a word of his mouth bring in his friends, and Sir Andew Kerrison, Sir Guy Pender, and Mr. Fitzherbert, and a fourth person, whose name I remember not; and therefore desired me to draw an engagement, (which I did in a loose paper, after the lease of them or one of them, the said Bernard, or Bury, introduced) and to move Sir John Gell to join in such an engagement; but did permit me to join in the same at that present, for the countenancing of their before mentioned friends, amongst whom, I remember only their surnames Byon, Thatch, Baker, all to me absolute strangers.

That day I spoke with Sir John Gell, and acquainted him with their offer and proposal to go, and deliver from him. He answered, that he could not meddle with doing in that design (which he took upon him to be acquainted withal), for which he was to them in no capacity, nor would be engaged under his hand and seal, to be he and so, by my future action for them; that that design was a fellow given to drink, and to his tongue; but entrusted me, that if I went over upon this occasion, to solicit the Prince with a good opinion of him, and that he would do nothing against him; and if he were at all in command, he would be to his advantage, or to that effect.

I returned to them Sir John Gell's answer, with which they were not, or seemed not altogether satisfied, and appointed on Monday at five of the clock, that the persons of the Counties of Kent, Buckingham, and Derby, or some of each County from the rest, should give a meeting at the Town Cross, at the Stony Cross, and be all furnished in the design, and give their respective portions of money as he paid in present, and raised for the future, desiring me to take care to move, that they might be also provided for, so to be able to hold intelligence, and ride about from place to place to lay the design.

At the said time, and Major Bernard produced two letters, one subscribed by Smith, another by Thatcher, purporting that the Knights Gentleman were come as far as Rebeck, and would that night be within twelve miles of London, and be there all day, and then in the evening, on Tuesday by eight of the clock, would at any place give meeting to him, and his Colours; and that they were actually desired to bring forward to them that night, which he was actually desired to regard, and that they should come on nearer, in fear of the watchfulness of Colonel Bloss, and that the two hundred and fifty pounds were ready to be laid down to perform their undertaking. No man of any County giving any meeting according to the first appointment at the Queen, but the said Bernard and Blythe, and one who calls himself Captain Ailly, only known in face to me, who pretended to be privy and knowing of the truth of all that their former discourses and their letters tended to, and Bernard pretending to go instantly to Smith from Rebeck, I brought him and Blythe to the wine-side, and in the walk we saw Smith again to obtain Sir John Gell's signature and seal to the engagement, which Blythe had then already engrossed, and that I would go presently to Rebeck with them about it, which I refused, and told them, that I was able to satisfy any man of quality, discretion, and secrecy, concerning Sir John Gell's reality, though not actually engaged; and I left them.

That night about eight of the clock, one Smith came to me (till then an absolute stranger), and Capt. Ailly came to me, and brought me a letter from Major Bernard, highly reproving me and Sir John Gell at backwardness, and with holding our own hands from the engagement, and that we intended our own honours upon their dangers, without giving them assurance of our secrecy and confidentiality; and that unless the engagement were subscribed by Sir John Gell, his Knights persons would not proceed further. I was known to Sir Smith, who took upon him to come as from them for introduction in that point. And in answer, I said a vote of secrecy said him, that I was I failed concerning Sir John Gell, and affirmed, that if any Gentleman of quality or whole judgment the rest would oblige, should address to Sir John Gell, that under an Oath of secrecy he would satisfy him, but could not trust Blythe, and Bernard was to him a stranger. With this they departed, affirming me that they thought no more would be expected from Sir John Gell, and that they would, or one of them, away that night to the company; and that the next day being Tuesday, the money should be paid at the Palmerston-head.

They broke their time, and my occasion press me into London, being next day to be gone by the Act; and about nine of the clock next day, I was sent for by Captain Ailly and Blythe, who delivered me a letter from Bernard, pressing me to subscribe the engagement which Blythe engrossed; and that being done he would go with me the next day to Grimsford, and the Gentlemen of Kent should meet there, and there the money should be paid.

The ride being for his passage on Wednesday, Bernard came not, but Blythe presented him to be at Palmerston-head with the Backinghamshire Gentlemen, and that he was well-looked, and would come presently, and should tell me; and to Captain Ailly and myself, with no more than fifty shillings in my purse, amounting upon the money there, went to Grimsford, and expected till Thursday night, but found no Knights men, and so one from London coming. Capt. Ailly went that night with one Seemore-code for London, to enquire the reasons, and on Friday morning early came Major Bernard, and Mr. Smith with a letter from Blythe, purporting that if Sir John Gell would not con-vince under his hand and seal, with such whole names were subscribed (of which I only know Bernard, Smith, Blythe, and Ailly), they would go over themselves (meaning himself and Bernard) to the Prince, and would back mine and Sir John Gell's with him, and dis-appoint all that I promised in his favour; and that he had letters from Sir John Gell, which he could produce, should make him appear his refusal, or such refusal; and therefore desired me to write to Sir John Gell, to let him see his danger; which I did, laying the case before him, and not putting him, but leaving him to do as God should direct him, and his judgment lead him. With which letter Bernard and Smith went away, with assurance that whether Sir John Gell engaged or not, I should hear next day from them, and if he did engage, they would come down and go for Rebeck, where their former undertaking should be performed to me; and if he did not, I should be disappointed, and have my subscribers and find me, and the design should fail. I expected till Saturday night, and finding no answer, resolved on Monday to intend my journey into the Country, upon my first purpose for New Armo; and in the morning early was fired by a party of horse, and brought to London.

My Lord,

In that Narrative you will see a believing nature wrought upon by insinuations men, such who cannot be true to any, whilst false to parties. The pretended design vanish, as never being more than a phantom, and not worth your regard, the real design effected, so far as they had power or opportunity; that is, to bring the game into the tool, and there leave them to be entangled and made a quarry.

* This Engr is time, as some others both of substance and circumstance, are rectified upon better memory, by some following papers sent to the Lord President. You

You will find me passively obdurate, being prompted and incited by their information, and not once but heartily to them.

It lies in your Lordships power to cut me off, by extending which, you can arrive to no further remedy at all, and possibly, by an Act of lenity, you may do an office acceptable to God.

Consilium vobis, modo in rebus meo.

Whoever shall be present at my Trial, or into whose hands this Narrative shall fall, will easily conclude with me,

Quæ vult parat Deus, hæc donat præter.

EUS. ANDREWÆ.

On Tuesday the first of April, after his removal to the Tower, he was called to be further examined, and at his return went back to them some particulars, (was) concerning Captain Holmes, by want of memory not before specified. And in case the House should have sufficient light by the said Holmes, it might have made Mr. Andrewe capable of lawful favour by reason of his tenacity concerning the said Holmes, who (for aught Mr. Andrewe knew) was guilty of his being betrayed, and if so, might as well impute his knowledge of Holmes's purposes, to the end that Mr. Andrewe's concealment of them might augment his crime; and also concerning Mr. Thomas Bernard, who being at large and unquestioned, Mr. Andrewe had cause to have the like jealousy of.

On Friday next morning following, being the 11th of April, he was called again, and was confronted with Sir John Gell, and avowed what he did indeed neither directly deny, nor was troubled that he did aver, freely telling the President, that he could not remember some things in point, yet he was confident that he would not do him, or any man wrong; and then declared to the President, that he look'd upon Sir John Gell, as upon himself, as a betrayed man; but as concerning others, he knew not by whom, he had been first in his confessions, though to his own injury.

He then questioned these Lordships, upon better memory, in point of material circumstances. They desired him to put them into writing, and to send them, and they called for his head to the former examinations and papers; which he gave them, and the same day went to them as follows:

To the Right Honourable the Lord-President and Council of State.

May it please your Lordships,

ACCORDING to the favourable licence by your Lordships to me given, I have digested into writing these matters of circumstance, wherein my Examinations and Narrative are in defect of my memory only in certain and strictly bounden paying, that they may be received and read a part of that relation, which I must abide by at my Trial, and that the former errors may be rectified, and defects supplied so far, as by this supplementary account upon my belated recollections given, may be done. And I shall then be confident, I shall appear not to have wilfully concealed (however guilty) or misinterpreted any thing pertinent, whether the same carry with it my condemnation, or excuse.

What passed between myself and Mr. Bernard, before my acquaintance with Holmes and Boyles, and which is express in my Answers and Narrative, was then time before Easter-Term last, when there was an order for departure of persons in my condition, from this Tower, and I, in obedience thereto, did leave this city on Saturday the 6th of May, and came to Mr. Gifford's house at Gifford-Hall in Suffolk, on Thursday following; from whence I thence rode at any time more than five miles, until the 16th of May, when I was sent for to make assurances between a husbandman and her husband in point of pasture, by them to me mutually referred: in which business, and in other matters between another husbandman and a Merchant of London, being under reference to arbitration; as also in endeavouring to get some friend to contract in the behalf of my daughter, for the reversion of a Lease holden of the Dean and Chapter of Ely, in which she is interested for a life in being, I continued in and near the City until the third day of September; in which time Bernard voluntarily brought to my acquaintance Holmes and Boyles, upon the pretences in my Answers and Narrative set forth, to which I humbly refer.

The note which mentions Boyles's going with me to Cambridge, and so to Sir John Gell, which in my Answers I have expounded, was drawn from me by Bernard's importunity, and written at his request; but what was made of it, (other than to say it up, and receive it for his present purpose) I know not, nor had any account of it, but went away the third of September, there being no conclusion of any thing to be done in this business, or circumstance possible. But Mr. Bernard, who knew how to direct me, persuaded by Letter to intimate further to me; when from after that, I never received any Letter or Message to that, or any other purpose, until my return into Middlesex-Town; when he told me, that the indiscreetness of things in Ireland had been the impediment.

As to the day, viz. the 18th of October, being the Fast day at Ely, it was only in discourse mentioned to be an opportune time, in case the life were so (which it was not) possible. Neither any solemn, or serious discussion, consultation, then-taken, or then-after made or laid, other than in transitory conversation; nor any perfect agreement as much as by word or promise, until that fresh discourse was let on foot by Bernard.

I drew Sir John Gell's petition before Christopher, and had several compliments from him by Holmes, (at least presented) before I drew him, and I believe, after I withdrew I was invited to him, and escorted by him in the removing the differences between him and his Lady; in the last Term I did so in answer, and in the several times of our casual or occasional meetings, the differences have continued to what I have before signified, and in your presence and his avowed; and how so exactly to move your Lordships, in account in time, I cannot.

As to the matter of the engagement, I shole by what I have formerly said, with this note, that my engaging, which was late in the night, before my riding out of Town, in obedience to the Act, I was persuaded by Boyles that Sir John Gell, and their pretended friends of the Country did not engage, I should be disappointed; and in the hour of my going away, I would be ready to recede according to promise, but by Boyles's pretended to be at Tisbury-Court went from Readingshire men, and that he would undoubtedly follow; I told Boyles, as I remember, in the presence of Captain Ashley, that whether he came or not, I must for the present remove to Gifford, not having convenience of horse to go elsewhere so suddenly. And if there were persons at Bernard's part with me, I should be ready on mine; and if not, I desire to be disappointed, and left to pursue my private occasions into Surrey. And I did really carry with me words of my Clients to have employed myself upon, in case of their failure with me.

I humbly beg your Lordships pardon for a favourable interpretation of this trouble, which is a duty to truth, and right to others and myself, which could not be omitted by

(My Lord)

Your Lordships humble prisoner, and servant,

EUS. ANDREWÆ.

That, together with a petition for allowance and liberty of travels, returns, being the same day signed in the presence of the Lieutenant, were sent up, and sent to the Lord-President's own hand.

This was his second petition, which with a former to the same effect, (and out of moment to fulfil) did never receive any answer.

At the same time he went to Sir Henry Mildmay on the behalf of the Gentlemen who were taken with him.

Mr. Andrewe at several times took upon him to aver to the Committee of State, that they had spies upon him for some years, and particularly Bernard; which the Lord-President did not deny, but yielded the State, by the practice of all means, to sit watching upon persons of all conditions to them.

This day the Lord Grey was with the other three of the State.

His third petition for about Easter, being by Sir Henry Mildmay and Mr. Sir put upon it, to submit himself, which petition of favour he brought the State in such manner; which for his relations sake he did, but with some caution, in these words:

To the Right Honourable the Lord-President, and Council;

Th. humble Petitioner of Eusebius Andrewe,

THAT your Petitioner in fervently sensible, and humbly acknowledges, that for his high delinquency against the State he is become forfeited to their Justice.

That he hath not in the least perverted with your Lordships, in the confession of his proper faults and follies, nor hath kept tight referred concerning himself, or any person, or thing, which may satisfy your Lordships, and more secure the State; and it is not possible to be look'd upon as capable of your present favour and future mercy, which he now doth, and shall always implore.

That his present, delivered condition is made more uncomfortable, by his wants, and the exclusion of his friends and relations; without a supply, in which life itself becomes a punishment.

Your Petitioner beseeches himself at the feet of your Lordships, humbly prays,

That his being prosecuted before the High-Court of Justice, may be suspended.

That by your order, his past and future charge of necessities may be discharged, which he requests your petition.

That his friends and kindred may have recourse to him, and that he may have the freedom of his pen.

And in case your Petitioner shall be found in the least to multiply those favours, he shall expose himself worthy of a total deprivation of them, and of your severe goodness towards him.

And your Petitioner, &c.

This was less than was look'd for, though as much as he could venture on; in which his desire for respect of his Term was infinitely, to prevent only his being the first, and exasperating them by giving others aim in his pursuing the Court.

This petition was solicited thirty-three days, but no answer could be obtained, and his wants growing upon him daily, he put in the Lieutenant's hands this following petition:

The Petition, (sent) this as formerly, &c.

THAT your Petitioner hath been twelve weeks close prisoner, his friends neither permitted to visit, nor daring to relieve him, his force for necessaries far beyond his ability to discharge, his credit profligate, and nothing more visible to him than his immediate perishing.

That he hath not been wanting to pray your favours, having these petitions lodged with your Lordships, constantly followed, and answered.

That he hath in his confessions spared nothing which can more conduce to the State's security, or his own contentment.

Your Petitioner therefore humbly prays,

That if at all he must, he may speedily receive his Trial, he being ready to submit to the will of God in the issue.

That if money be relieved for him, which he hath, and hath implored, your Lordships would please to admit him to live out his garden, and to a free conversation in that Commonwealth, upon security given for his future good demeanour.

That in the mean time he may have the liberty of the Church and Town, and the freedom of his friends relief, and that order may be given for the debt incurred there in the time of his close restraint to be discharged.

And your Petitioner, &c.

The Warrant of Committment, which I could not get a Copy of till the 14th of July, is as follows:

THESE are to will and require you, Kenneth to receive into your custody the body of Eusebius Andrewe, Esq. and how you are fully to keep in close imprisonment in the Tower of London, in order to his further examination, he being committed unto you for High-Treason, in plotting in treason during the subversion and alteration of the present Government: that you are not to fail, and for so doing, this shall be your Warrant: Given at the Council of State sitting at Whitehall, this 20th day of May, 1650.

By word of the House and by the act of the Council of State appointed by Authority of Parliament.

At a Court of the Town of London.

John Bradshaw, President.

That

This Warrant is vicious in itself, for two Reasons, which make a right Warrant of Commitment, Coke's 2d Part Instit. fol. 52, 529, 531. allowed by the Parliament.

1. That it is not done by due Process of Law.
2. That it hath not a Conclusion, viz. 4 And safely to keep until he be delivered by due Course of Law.

But being it indefinite, and is rather a Condemnation to perpetual, as well, to arbitrary imprisonment, which is worse.

The close imprisonment is but in order to his further Examination, and he had been twice since committed, and signed his Examination before Egbert, and did not refuse to answer any Questions demanded of him.

The Warrant is dated from the Council of State sitting at Whitehall, the 23d of July; whereas he was brought to the Tower the 23d of March, being Sunday, by seven in the Morning, at the opening of the Gate (no Council sitting) and the Warrant signed on Saturday the 23d of March.

Having answered a Month in Expectation of an Answer to his last Petition, he petitioned the Parliament again.

To the High and Honourable the Parliament of England,
The humble Petition of Estheus Andrews, Esq. sole Prisoner in the Tower of London,

Sheweth,
THAT your Petitioner hath been, by a confederate Pack of Scoundrels, wrought into Actions, which (abstracted from their Circumstances) render him liable to your Justice; and thus done, not without their further Hope, that your Petitioner, as they supposed, had Interest to have drawn divers Persons of Quality and Fortune into the same Engagement.

That being of that Part of their Aim, the said Confederates did betray your Petitioner to the honourable Council of State, by whose Warrant he hath been Extorted Weeks a Prisoner, without a Person of his own, the Access of Friends, or Means of Subsistence allowed; and is to perdition by his Wants, before it be distinguished by a publick Trial, wherein he be a better Object for the applying of your Justice, or your Mercy.

That he is hereby disabled to be accountable to the Service of God, the Duty to his Family and Friends, and to those who give him Credit for Bread. And in case he should be called from such his close Retirement to an Trial, must be deluged and deprived of all his Means of making his reasonable Defence, which, however it may suit with Policy, will not be consistent with Religion and Honour.

Your Petitioner having for Relief in the Premises, by all opportune Addresses, and by several Petitions importunately followed, and sought the said Council of State without Answer, in the deep Sense of his pressing sufferings humbly suppliceth to this high Court, calling himself wholly thereupon, and as humbly prays,

1. That you would present your Justice by your Mercy, and admit him to sit out his Pardon, upon Security given for his future good Behaviour to the State in this Commonwealth.
2. That if that be too great a Favour, you would grant him Licence to depart the Commonwealth, he engaging not to act, or contrive against to the disturbance of the State.
3. That if he be not thought capable of either, but that he must receive a publick Trial, he may have a convenient time of Preparation, after a qualifying of his Imprisonment.

1. That in the mean time he may have the Liberty of the Tower, and visit of all Friends; and that by your Order, his Debt for Livelihood, incurred in his close Retirement, may be discharged.

In all which your Petitioner is ready to submit to the Will of God, whose Providence hath put Justice and Mercy into your prudent disposing. And shall ever pray.

Notwithstanding his Petitions and Letters, he was brought before the High Court of Justice (in August), at which John Bradbury was President, and his own Narrative was urged against him as a Confession; and Attorney-General Prentiss used him with very ill Language. But he put into Court his Answers in writing, which were as follow:

The humble Defence of Estheus Andrews, Esq. in his Defence, to the Proceedings against him before the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th Day of Aug. 1650.

THE said Respondent (with the Favour of this honourable Court) receiving and praying to be allowed the Benefit and Liberty of making further Answer, offers to this honourable Court,

First, That by the Statute or Charter, filed Magna Charta, which is the fundamental Law, and ought to be the Standard of the Laws of England, confirmed above thirty times, and yet overruled, it is in the 23d Chapter thereof granted and enrolled,

1. That no Freeman shall be taken, or imprisoned, or be diffided of his Freedom or Liberties, or free Customs, or be outlawed, or exiled, or be any otherwise destroyed; nor will we put upon him, nor condemn him, but by a lawful Judgment of his Peers, and by the Laws of the Land.
2. We will sell to no Man, nor give to any Man Justice or Right.
3. Somewhat, That by the Statute of 43 Edw. III. c. 2.
4. The Great Charter is commanded to be kept in all the Points. And,
5. It is enacted, that if any Statute be made to the contrary, that shall be void for ever; which Statute is unenforced.

The Respondent sheweth, That by an Act of the 23d of March, 1650, entitled, An Act for establishing an High Court of Justice, Power is given to this Court to try, condemn, and cause Execution of Death to be done upon the Freeman of England, according to the major Number of any twelve of the Members thereof shall judge to appear in Justice.

And thereupon the Respondent doth humbly inter and offers for Law, That the said Act is diametrically contrary unto, and utterly inconsistent with the said Great Charter, and is therefore by the said record Statute to be null and void.

That it can with no more Reason, Equity, or Justice, hold the Value and Reputation of a Law (the said Statute before recited being in Force), than if, contrary to the second Clause in the 23d Chap. of Magna Charta, Vol. VII.

it had been also enacted, that Justice and Right shall be deferred to all Freeman, and sold to all that will buy it.

Thirdly, That upon presenting, by the Pension of Right, 3 Ger. that contrary to the Great Charter, Trials and Executions had been had and done against the Subjects by Commissioners Martial, &c. it was therefore prayed, and by the Commissioners granted, That,

1. No Commissioners of the like Nature might be afterwards issued, &c. And that done.

2. To prevent, lest any of the Subjects should be put to Death, contrary to the Laws and Statute of the Land.

The Respondent humbly sheweth and sheweth, That

This Court is (though under a different Style) in nature, and in the Proceedings thereof, directly the same with the Commission-Martial; the Freeman thereby being to be tried for Life, and adjudged by the major Number of the Commissioners sitting (as in Courts of Commissioners Martial was granted), and was agreeable to their Constitution, and consequently against the Petition of Right, in which he, and all the Freeman of England (if it be granted there by any such) hath, and have Right and Interest; and he humbly sheweth his Right accordingly.

Fourthly, That by the Remembrance of the 13th of December, and the Declaration the 27th of January, 1641, the Benefit of the Laws and ordinary Courts of Justice are the Subjects Birth-right.

By the Declarations of the 13th of July, and the 15th of October, 1641, the Preservation of the Laws, and the due Administration of Justice, are owed to be the justifying Cause of the War; and the Ends of the Parliament's Affairs managed by their Swords and Councils. And God's Cause is by them implicated, in case they should ever decline their Ends.

By the Declaration of the 27th of April, 1646, Promise was made not to interrupt the Course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

By the Ordinance or Veto of Non-admittance, Jan. 1648, it is adjudged on the Parliament's behalf, That Though they lay the Kings side, yet they will govern by the Laws, and not interrupt the Course of Justice in the ordinary Courts thereof.

And thereupon the Respondent humbly intereth and sheweth, That

The Constitution of this Court is a Breach of that publick Faith of the Parliament, exhibited and pledged in the Declaration and Veto to the Freeman of England.

And upon the whole Matter, the Respondent (having as aforesaid) doth humbly shew for Law, and sheweth as his Right,

1. That this Court, in defect of the Validity of the Act, by which it is constituted, hath not Power against him, or to put him to a further Answer.

2. That by Veto of Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and the before-recited Remembrance and Declarations, he ought not to be proceeded against by this Court, but by an ordinary Court of Justice, and to be tried by his Peers.

And prays, that this present Answer and Salvage may be accepted, and registered, and that he may be tried by his Peers accordingly.

EUS. ANDREWS.

The further and second Defence of Est. Andrews, Esq. to the Honourable the High Court of Justice, presented the 16th Day of Aug. 1650.

THE said Respondent (with the Favour of this Honourable Court) receiving and praying to be allowed the Benefit and Liberty of making further Answer (if it shall be adjudged necessary), in all Humbleness of spirit presents Answer, offers to this honourable Court,

That by the Letter and present Sense of the Act, entitled, An Act for establishing an High Court of Justice, the said Court is not qualified to be a Freeman of England (and such the Respondent asseeth to be) for Life in Case of Treason.

First, For that, 1. The said Court is not constituted a Court of Record, and (but upon Record) cannot at all have that Account of their Freeman, which Kings were wont to have of their Masters of Justice.

2. The Freeman, and such who are and may be concerned in him, can have no Record to shew unto, by which to preserve the Rights due to him and them respectively, viz. of

1. A Writ of Error, in case of erroneous Judgment, due by the Proceedings.
2. A Fine of Answerers acquit, in case of new Question for the same Fact; the Right so which, and the Necessity of such Record, appears by
3. A being enlarged upon Acquittal, as is the Freeman's Due, by the Stat. 14 Hen. VI. c. 3. and the Case thereupon grounded.
4. A Writ of Conspiracy against those who have produced the betraying the Life of the Respondent not to be brought before Acquittal, and so Acquittal but upon Record, as appears by

This Court is to determine at a Day, without account of their Proceedings, have Power to try, judge, and cause Execution, but not to acquit or to give Enlargement; so that the innocent are thereby punishable, the innocent not preferable; the injured and betrayed not vindicable; which are Decrets incompatible with a Court of Justice, and inconsistent with Justice itself, and with the Honours of a Christian Nation and Commonwealth.

Secondly, For that the Members of this Court are by the Act dispensed to be sworn,

1. Not in conspicuo populi, for the Freeman's Satisfaction.
2. Not in Words of Integrity, and obliging to Equality.
3. In Words of manifest Partiality, viz.

Psalm. 39 Ed. III. fol. of Count's Case, 4 Ed. III. Rot. Par. Num. 1. Court de Ardenne's Case. 48 Ed. III. Rot. Par. No. 23. Sir John de Lee's Case.

Richard and Darby's Case, 4 Rep. 152. Ainslie's Case, ibid. 33. Ainslie.

Dyer fol. 120. and Ainslie, fol. 33. The Year Book of Hen. VI. 20. fol. 19.

The Peasants' Case, 9 Rep. fol. 55.

I go to no left) that-offe pemptively; and for reason of challenge for number.

This was judged in 33 Hen. VI. shridged by Fit. Herbert, fil. 26.
per challenge, where eight Jurors were sworn, and the rest challenged, a new return made, and those eight returned, and though formally allowed and sworn, yet challenged, and adjudge good.

The like allowed in Hill. 1 Jac. in the case of Sir Walter Raleigh and Breth.

If this benefit were allowed me, my Lord, to except or challenge the whole Court, who are in number and quality my Tories, as a Jury are,
I should not need to be pemptory in my challenge, being furnished with abundant reason.

(Here he was interrupted by Kelly, who said, those Statesmen and Cases were out of date now).

My Lord,

A Jury of Justice will be no more nor less, if what I am accused of,
to have endeavored, should take effect; and therefore are not like considered: I cannot lay the blame of the Court (or if I should, I should not be believed), and he that but whips against I Diana at Epiphany, makes all the Crimes his enemies.

3. The second benefit and right, which by denying me a Trial per juram, you take from me, is the benefit of facing, hearing, and counter-questioning the witnesses produced against me; which, in such way of Trial, ought to be observed.

Thus such is the Law, & Mr. Stanford asserts in his Pleas of the Crown. And,

In Treason, two sufficient witnesses by the Statute  of Edw. VI. are required; sufficient in relation to their quality, and to the falsity of their testimony.

Sur Edmund Cole (an Author as authentic as any) puts this for Law in his explications of the words in the Statutes for Treason, Perjury, and Attainder: because the punishment was great, the proof should be pene-trant; not upon presumptions or inferences, or dreams of wit, but upon good and inherent proofs. And thus he makes good by the Authority of J. Stanford, and the several Statutes of Philip and Mary, and of Queen Elizabeth, and of Edw. VI.

Now, my Lord, an evidence either taken in writing, as the person will voluntarily give it, or casually taken as the examiner will ask it (who is not seen to take it indifferently, no more than the franks of the questions are to be proposed than fairly), may be a firming fact, apostle, and a full testimony; or concerning the person giving testimony, or concerning the matter, the way, the power, &c. the whole laid together may prove either nothing, or a malevolent thing.

The case of Sir Thomas Boleyn, Lord-Chancellor, accused for bribery, is common, and I hope, if mine have fair play, it will prove so well.

3. The third and last right and privilege you take from me, is the main of all the rest, and to the making of which, as it should be made up) all the rest are but consequence, and leading; that is, of a fair verdict.

My Lord,

By a Jury a verdict passed from all, or not at all; and one knowing and conscientious man may preferre that innocent man, whose eleven either ignorant or careless men would deny.

This Court's sentence is to be fixed by number of voices, and some of them give it: we judging their own judgments, but concerning where their opinion is (as Judgment shall lead them), which, as it was the great evil of the late Court of Star-Chamber, for whether or it is used (in Trial of Life especially) it is and can be no other than an evil.

My Lord,

By and from a Jury a verdict passed before their discharge upon their reciprocal sifting, say affairs of nature; and therefore they will give it both the right, because that evidence is fresh in memory, without the intervention of other matters, as also for that they are without opportunity to be perjured by money or friendship. If this Court receive the evidence today, they may at any time (before the eighth of September next) give their sentence; for were damn I never expect but from a Jury; and in the mean time, how much their own affairs may put the remembrance of me out of their heads, and how much the State's power may put my story out of their heads, I have full cause to suspect. For first, I will not, being resolved never to be in love with that life which the Common Law of England cannot protect, and had rather die the Law's Martyr, than live the State's Slave.

My Lord,

I have said; and now it only remains that I tell your Lordship, that I defer you to take into consideration what I have said, and that you would not suddenly, but deliberately give your judgment, whether I ought to plead before you as Judges, and to the charge in the Articles, and not in a Preference of Indifference? Whether to be tried without a Jury, and condemned upon evidence unseen? Which this is (and I desire it may be reconsidered). As I do not now willingly retire to plead or answer, but offer my reason for the suspension of my Plea, until your judgment in the points be known and pronounced; so, if I be in them over-ruled, I shall then give such answer to the charge, as shall become a man on my condition.

Not volunter Dei, made in raised mood.

EUS. ANDREWS.
3. 7. 2. 1650.

Here the Attorney-General Proctor put a Stop to Mr. Andrews, telling him, that the Court was not at leisure to take notice of those Law-Cases, but of his condition; That he had an affidavit in aid, though nothing effectual sufficient Treason, and for that reason he desired death. And thereupon the Court pronounced sentence against him, That he should be hanged, & drawn and quartered: but on his Petition to the Parliament, an Act passed authorizing Commissioners of the High Court of Justice to issue their warrant for the taking him according to his Petition.

Col. Andrews. If I be over-ruled by the Court, that I make either answer or be sentenced for my misdeeds; then I move that I may have a Copy of my charge, and a day assigned me to deliver my Answer under my hand.

U. de the Respon.

1. If the Court proceed upon Articles, they cannot in reason conceive that I can plead the general issue in particular; I am to doing, in case I be convinced of any one Article, I shall receive the doom at all.

2. For that 4 facts some of the Articles may be true, yet so such they may not be available against me, and upon the year of this, I find that I cannot be convicted, last with circumstance, and as instead of being allowed the freedom of my defence, which is allowed to every Thief in Anglia, I shall be tried and taxed by such confessions, or proof, as will be the ruin of my prof. cation, and not preserve myself by making myself and actions understood.

The Articles are of several kinds and names; and as one single Plea will not be applicable to the whole, so it is but requisite that I have a Copy of them, to give thereby to each one as proper an answer, which though in indictment is not allowed, yet in this way of proceeding was never denied in the most arbitrary Courts.

The Counsel-Table gave a charge, and received answer in writing, in obeyance of Constraint against themselves and commands.

The Star-Chamber afforded the Defendant a Copy of the Bill, and liberty to examine and cross-examine witnesses, in case the fact charged were denied by the Answer.

The High-Commission the like, by their Articles and Proceedings upon them.

My Answer, if not in writing, may either not be understood, or mis-apprehended, or mis-taken down by the Clerk, to my prejudice.

If this be denied me, then I shall conclude they intend to wipe off my head, with the smooth glass face of pretended Justice; and shall apply myself to my attorney, to inform me of what has passed between the State and me, I may conjecture; and then I will prepare these following words to help my memory, which as a rule of so much concernment, is not totally to be relied upon.

First, As to what may be alleged against me in general terms, as a disaffected person, an opposer of the State, or otherwise, &c.

There are two things which draw subjection, and oblige persons to a Commonwealth.

(1.) Protection to the State.

(2.) Personal engagement, or fealty to the subject.

(1.) Protection I have received none, but stand in the condition of a prejudged person.

1. Else if (any) iniquitable, and not permitted by the Law of the Nation to violate it.

2. Calling taken away, which the Law would not have done, had he been Convicted.

3. Dwelling not permitted where I can abide, but where I may be obnoxious to want, and to the State's infliction of punishment, when they shall take occasion to repeat upon me any thing they shall call a crime, in reference to my past actions for the late King, and my advantage.

4. Right I can have none, unless I will damn my soul to promote my estate, or repair my wrong by a contra-legal and contra-constitutional engagement.

This was sufficient reason, owned and justified by the Parliament, for their substitution of obedience, & honor to Charles, by their Declarations, and Ordinances.

(2.) Fealty or personal engagement I have given none, viz.

1. I have not taken the prohibition of Alley 1642.

2. I have not taken the solemn Oath and Coesent; yet if I had, I might have justified my actions by them.

3. I have not taken the negative Oath, because my Oath of Allegiance (from which an man can shrieve me) is a negative to that, &c.

4. I have not taken the priest engagement, much more against my Oath of Allegiance than the negative Oath.

If I had had no little conference as to have taken them, I would have had as much as to have kept them; and the State cannot in reason expect from me, or any other, that we should take a forced oath, when we see no conference meet of keeping the first; nor to take a second, the first and second being broken, without other dispensation than power, which, like Alexander's sword, cuts the Golden knot which it cannot loose.

Neither lack any man assistance, if he should take the last engagement, that he should have liberty to keep it longer than the sanity of the State held to the new new change of Government.

And therefore I stand clear as a down-right subject of England, to stand or fall by the Common Laws of Engl. and, if they will deny me just, they deny my Birth-right, which is equally rightful, and I move just, they deny me my estate, my calling, my abode, my means of rights.

So deny me the right to be an citizen of London, I justify myself.

1. By the late King's Commission, which my answer shows I had, and under which he was by the same King confirmed my V. 1642.

2.  What was done, was in done, when he who gave me the Commission was on being, and oppressed by unjust unjust men, and what I did, was in order to his enlargement from his thraldom, and reformation by his lawful power; which was that to which my duty as a subject, by my Oath of Allegiance did bind me in general terms, and the duty of my qualifications laid me under a particular obligation.

It was done before the new reformed Parliament were, or pretended to be the supreme authority of the Nation, or had assumed the power of Government, or were trans'd into a State; and consequently I am not answerable to them for any opposition to them, further than the Common Law binds to Parliaments without their head and hand, or defective in their members; and as to such offence (if it be one) this Court is not qualified to take any cognizance.

Thirdly, As to the design concerning the supple of the Life of Ely, it was but a bare discourse or communication, and no formal design laid, agreed unto, nor person engaged in it, so much as by promise.

And in cases of conspiracy against the Lives of Kings there were some Statutes made, that very words and communication should be reputed Treason; but all repealed, as expired.

And not thought fit by wisdom of Law-makers (having indisputable power to make Laws) to be covered hence the days of Queen Mary, notwithstanding their very many Treasons hatched and designed against Queen Elizabeth, and King James, &c.

If in the highest point of Treason, communication be not Treason against lawful Princes, certainly an offence, where the offence (such as it is) is of a far inferior nature of itself, if it had a far inferior object, as subject, concerning whom such discourse was holden.

Fourthly, As to my supposed corresponding with the King, the Lord Higham, and the Earl of Gloucester, (I trust) it was so long time, as that it falls not within compass of this Court's Commission to try, being charged as infant mortis of a juror, and my charge not exhibited to the Court of Justices, before the 1st of July. My last letter received from Lord Higham, bears date at the Mage, 18th or 22th of June, and was received in two days into St. James.

Fifthly, As to the drawing, signing, or sealing of the engagement, it consists of several branches.

That de facto I did it, and must not deny it, because I have confessed it, which was more than needed, so them who knew it without enquiry; for I dare aver, that they had their instrument by them employed, and cherish'd in betraying me to it: And have since years past had a room in my house to watch me and my motions, which I did affirm to the Lord-President, and he did deny it, but fact, it was no more than did become any State to do, who had so much cause to hold an active man in suspect, as they had not, having never come in, and laid down the Catchwords, but held to my purpoises, and was ready upon every occasion to take fire.

And this I will prove, if I have legal (or because that word is worn out of use), far dealing from the Court. And.

1. Of that I may justly infer, what will be visible enough, that it is in the State's Act, and but my Consent, and they in no danger of me, but that I should preserve myself from their new Laws; and the lapse of which I was not otherwise, or by any other action fallen.
2. As to the parts of it,
3. It consists of an Oath of secrecy.
4. An swearing of King Charles II. to be faithful.
5. A resolution to endeavour to make him such.
6. A resolution to the State, under the names of rebels, and opposers, who would not have him so to be faithful.

To this, as they are resolved,

The Oath of secrecy hath relation only to the not discovering the co-conspirators in that resolution, and the resolution itself being not Treason, the Oath of keeping secret that resolution is not greater than the thing resolved.

1. The thing resolved was to endeavour, but was not an actual endeavouring.

2. If it were an actual endeavouring, yet it can only be supposed, that it must be endeavour'd by a war to be levied; and the endeavour to levy a war never actually levied, is not Treason against the King, against whom only, and his relations, by the old Laws, which are Laws, a Treason can be committed: and Petty-Treason Law not secured for.

That a bare intention, resolution, or engagement to levy a war is not Treason, I refer myself to my Lord Coke; who tells us, (and he is a man of credit) in his Book (printed and allowed for Law by the Houses when they were two) that a conspiracy (and this engagement amounts not to so much, but rather to an intention only to conspire) to raise a war, (as hath been said, and so resolved) is no Treason by the Act of Edw. III. until the War levied, as within, or to be machined by those words in that Law (Overt Act); and if it were not Treason in these words in the original, (it falls not within the words of the translation of this new-born Law, nor, by any open deed.

As to the first and third branches of the engagement, which are interwoven, I conclude that neither of them, that is to say, neither the Oath, nor the Resolution, are Treasons either within the old, or the new Laws, either in respect of the persons against whom, or the progress made in the thing itself.

3. As to the owning of Charles II. it falls not within your Law; for that it is not a Publishing, Proclaiming, or publicly Declaring his Title. The words of the Act are, (proclaim, declare, publish, or any way promote) which promoting is matter of action more than a private owning.

And this by the Oath itself was not to be publish'd, nor could, without publishing the engagement itself, which was contrary to the Oath.

And though it may be objected, that the raising the war could not be done, but by publishing his Title, and the Engagement at last, yet that, if it be granted, was no forwarder than an endeavour; no more was this publishing, and being not done, falls not within your Act.

The criminality of the State is but guessed at by implication (for they are not named) to be meant, and I believe your Law reaches only to things moral, and not constructive only; and for the word Rebels, I hope they will not take that to themselves, and the word Opposers is a very innocent expression, and at the worst is all but a scandal.

Lastly, In this engagement what it will, yet the terms upon which I signed and sealed it were such, as that it was my act not absolute, but upon condition, and to be undone and avoided, in case of the non-engaging of hands, by the State's decay assured to be ready to do it; and at whose instance, and for whose satisfaction, it was intended to be defined at any other.

If the Court proceeds by way of Indictment, then I shall move, that those persons may be confronted, whom in my Narrative, Examinations and Letters I have named; and that I may demand of them, &c.

* Coke 3. 348. fol. 24. and 35.

† 25 Edw. III. cap. 2.

As also that Major Parker may be produced to be likewise demanded of, as a person by me lately, and hence my papers sent to the State, discovered to be of the Plot to betray me.

If the Court proceed by way of Articles, and upon Examinations taken against me, I desire, and that it be granted, that I may examine my defence, as in all Courts, where such proceedings were used, was allowed.

If it be objected, I that it was not used in cases of Treason, I answer, it is true; if they hold the ancient way of Trials, not, but if they proceed this way, it is but just; and otherwise the Court are at liberty to use all means, public or private, to catch me, but I have none to defend myself: so that it appears, that they seek not to do justice, but Execution.

And whether they be confronted or examined, these questions are to be propounded, either interrogatory, or by Interrogatory, and if by Interrogatory, I must stand upon a fair way of examination, &c.

I have none on one form, as well as one for the State's behalf, may be present, and for down the examinations or depositions; and that I may have a Copy of them as well against me, as for me, as well taken already by the State, or to be taken upon my motion.

The Questions.

1. Whether he knows Major Bernard, how long? &c. What communication and correspondence concerning me, or my actions laid between them? Whether he knows of the supposed design against the Life of Ely, and of the late engagement? How he knew them, and upon what reason, and to what end I discovered to him, and by whom?

2. Whether he did inform the State (or any Member of the Council) of them, and how long he hath so informed?

3. Whether he ever had in his custody the engagement under the hands and seals, and my letter to Sir John Gell? If so, where, and whether not at Gray's Inn at any being there? Whether he went first to watch me, and knew of my being there, before my being approached?

The three questions (status materialis) to be propounded to Bernard; and farther to him, and to Bryles, Holmes, Atley, Smith, as they are marked.

4. Whether he did propose in both designs to me, or to him? Whether I fought him, or he me? In what disposition he found me, upon the time by the Act limited for depuration? &c.

5. Whether he would tell me in the particulars of persons, confederates or money, ready to engage and to be advanced; and if not, then to what end he feigned these to me?

6. Whether the letters by him to me produced from Smith, and Thorn or Thorn, were true, or feigned; and if feigned, to what end, and by which for an work?

7. Whether he were fit upon me, to watch my ways and motions? And whether he were not promised, or did design unto himself profit for the discovering of me, and such whom I should bring in?

8. Whether I from'd, or ever read the said supposed design? Or was to be at St. James acquainted with it?

9. Whether he brought, or I fought Bryles, or Holmes? And whether confederates with him, or designed upon by him?

10. Whether my engagement were absolute, or conditional, and what I signified at my departure, and upon Bernard's not coming; and where Bernard was pretended to be, and where he really was? What promise I had concerning the return of my engagement, in case Sir John Gell did not engage at Gray's Inn?

11. Whether copies of Letters weekly showed to me were read or feigned? And if feigned, why pretended to be read?

12. Whether there were really any Kearby, Darby, or Stuckinghamshire men, and who, confederates? &c.

These preparations formerly made in rough notes, were transcribed and put into forms, and finished the 8th day of July 1650, by God's good assistance; notwithstanding my abundant disadvantages of close imprisonment, and want of Books, or Advice, and I commit and submit the rest to God, whom I beseech to fortify my spirit, and enlarge my understanding, when they shall come to be made use of; myself resolving to be the Law's Confessor while I live, and (if called to it) to be the Law's Martyr, when I die by the hand of the impending violence, under the specious name of Justice.

His Exceptions to his Triers.

John Herle, Esq. a man who hath had his hand in blood, viz. Mr. Barnes Halloway in a duel, for which was seized, &c.

A person trying me, a Juror, and in this way of Trial he is such, ought to be a Freeman, not, not in person, but in his pre-judging opinion; which he is not, having published that the Respondent was the greatest Traitor in England; and that there was enough under his hand to hang him the Respondent.

Sir William Bury, Comptroller, John Stone, two of my Triers, were employed to examine the Respondent, on the 24 of July 1650, and brought with them all the evidence against him; and therefore in their capacity of my Triers, by the rule in challenges, they are challengeable, and incapable to sit.

But no regard was had to any of his Exceptions, or any Answer returned to his Questions; and he was ordered to be beheaded.

The last Speech of Col. Eusebius Andrewes, on the Scaffold at Tower-Hill, August 22, 1650.

THE Lieutenant of the Tower delivering the Colonel to the Sheriff, said, He had brought him thus far on his journey. The Colonel replied, I hope I shall consider sure in the way, not go out of it.

When he came on the Scaffold (killing the clock) he said, I hope there is no more but this block between me and Heaven. After he had been some while on the Scaffold, he spake to the people as followeth:

Christian Gentlemen and good People,

Your sufferings here this day is to be a sad spectacle, a man brought in a moment to be unlearn'd, cut off in the prime of his years, taken from further opportunity of doing service to his King, his Friends, the Commonwealth, or especially to God. It seldom happens but upon very great cause; and though, truly, if my general known course of life were enquired into, I may modestly say, there is such a moral honesty, as force may be to forward as to expellation, why this great judgment is fallen upon me? That know, I am able to give them and myself an answer, and out of this breath, to give a better account of my judgment and Execution, than my Judges themselves, or you: It's God's just displeasure towards me, for my first long unrepented of, many judgments withold, and merits lighted; therefore does my gracious Father punish me with these conditions, that he may not lose me, and I pay you all me with your prayers, that this sad may not be fruitless: that when under his rod I have laid down my life, by his staff I may be comforted, and returned into Glory.

I am very confident, by what I have heard since my sentence, there are more exceptions made against the proceedings against me, than ever I made; my Friends had a Law, and the validity of that Law is indisputable for me to say against it, or to make a question of it, I should but shame myself and my discretion. In the firstness of the Law, something is done by me, that is applicable to some clause therein, by which I stand condemned; the means by which I was brought under that interpretation, of that which was not in myself intended maliciously, being testimony given by persons whom I pay, do call, yet to profess, that I cannot condemn my Judges for judging sentence against me according to legal Justice; for equity lies in higher breaths. For my accusers, or rather betrayers, I pay, and am sorry for them; they have committed Justice's crime, I with and pray for Sir Peter's sins; and I with other people be happy, they may be taken up betimes, before they have drunk more blood of Christian men, politically, his deferring that myself.

It is true, there have been several addresses made for mercy, and I will lay the obstructions to nothing more than my own sin; and being God testifies in, (I having not glorified him in my life) I shall do it in my death, I am content.

Profess, in the face of God, particular malice to any one of the State or Parliament, to do them a personal injury, I had never; for the cause in which I had a great while waded, I must say, my engagements and pursuit in it, hath led on scraps upon my conscience; it was upon principles of Law, whereas I am a Protestant, and upon principles of Religion, my judgment rectified, and my conscience satisfied, that I have purified these ways, for which (I think God) I find no blackness upon my conscience, nor have put this into the head-roll of my sin.

I presume not to decide controversies, I desire God to glorify himself in prospering that side that hath right with it, and that you may enjoy peace and plenty here, when I shall enjoy my God.

In my conversation in the world, I do not know where I have an enemy with cause, or that there is a person to whom I have regret; but if there be any whom I cannot reconcile, under the nation of Christian men, I pardon them as freely as if I had forgiven them, yes, I forgive all the world, as I desire my heavenly Father for his Church to forgive me.

For the business of Death, it is a sad sentence in itself, if men confide with flesh and blood: But, truly, without boasting I say it, or if I do boast, it is in the Lord, I have not to this minute had one consolation with flesh about the blow of the Axe, or one thought of it, more than my passport to Glory.

I take it as an honour, and I owe a thankfulness to those under whose power I am, that they have sent me hither to a place, however of punishment, yet of some honour, to die a death somewhat worthy my blood; and that courtesy of theirs hath much helped towards the satisfaction of my sin.

I shall desire God, that those Gentlemen in that sad head-roll to be tried by the High Court of Justice, that they may find that really there, that is nominal in the Act, do High Court of Justice, or Court of High Justice, high in its righteousness, not in its severity; no more shocked with the testimony of folks that fall blind for gain. Probes, forgive them, and I forgive them, as I desire that to forgive me.

I tell you now to pray for me, and not give over praying until my last moment; that as I have a very great load of sin, so I may have the wings of your prayers assisting that Angel that shall convey my soul to Heaven. And I do not but that I shall there see my blessed Saviour, and my pallant Master the King of England, and another Master which I much honour, my Lord Cople; hoping this day to see Christ in the presence of the Father, the King in the presence of him, my Lord Cople in the presence of them all, and myself with them, and all Saints, to rejoice for evermore.

Dr. Swinburn. You have this morning, in the presence of a few, given some account of your Religion, and under general notions or words, have given account of your Faith, Charity and Repentance: (then speaking to the bystanders-by) if you please to hear the same questions asked here, you shall, that it may be a general testimony to you all, that he dieth in the favour of God.

(To the Colonel.) Now, Sir, I begin to deal with you; you do acknowledge, that this stroke you are by and by to suffer, is a just punishment laid upon you by God for your former sins.

Col. Answer. I dare not only deny it, but dare not have confesse in. I have no opportunity of glorifying God more, than by taking thank to myself, and I have a reason of Justice for justifying God in my own holiness, which I have incurred to you.

Dr. You acknowledge you deserve more than this stroke of the Axe, and that a far greater misery is due to you, even the pains and torments of Hell, that the Damned there endure.

Col. I know it is due in righteous judgment; but I know again, I have a satisfaction made by my elder brother Christ Jesus, and then I say it is not due; it's due to me, but acquiesced by my mediation.

Dr. Do you believe to be saved by that mediation, and no other?

Col. By that, and that only, renouncing all secondary causes.

Dr. Are you truly and unfeignedly sorry before God, as you appear to us, for all these sins that have brought you hither?

Col. I am sorry, and can never be fainthearted enough, and am sorry that I cannot be more sorry.

Dr. If God should by a miracle, not to put you to a vain hope, but if God should, as he did to Hezekiah, renew your days, what life do you resolve to lead hereafter?

Col. It is a question of great length, requires a great time to answer; men in such degrees would promise great things; but I would first call some friends to limit how far I should make a vow, that I should not make a rash vow, and to offer the sacrifice of fools: but a vow I would make, and by God's help endeavour to keep it.

Dr. Do you with health and happiness upon all lawful Authority and Government?

Col. I do prize all obedience to lawful Government, and the adverseness against them is sinful; and I do not justify myself (whatever my judgment be) for my thus venturing against the present Government; I leave it to God to judge whether it be righteous; if it be, it must stand.

Dr. Are you now in love and charity with all men? Do you freely forgive them?

Col. With all the World freely; and the Lord forgive them, and forgive me, as I freely forgive them.

Dr. You have for some late years laid down the Gown, and took up the Sword, and you were a man of note in their parts where you had your residence; I have nothing to accuse you for want of diligence in hindering the doing of injuries; yet possibly there might be some wrong done by your Officers, or those under you, to some particular men; if you had your estate in your hands, would you make restitution?

Col. The wrongs themselves you bring to my mind are not great nor many; some things of no great moment; but such as they are, my desire is to make restitution, but have not wherewithal.

Dr. If you had ability, you would likewise leave a legacy of thankfulness to Almighty God, something to his poor servants, to his lame members, to his dead members, to his dumb members.

Col. My will hath been always better than my ability that way.

Dr. Sir, I shall trouble you very little further; I thank you for all these heavenly Calumnies I have enjoyed by being in your company these three days; and truly I am very sorry I must part with so heavenly an associate; we have known one another heretofore, but never to Comradery this day; I have rather been a Scholar to learn from you, than an Instructor.

I wish this stage whereon you are made a spectacle to God, Angels and the World, may be a school to all about you; for though I will not diminish your sin, nor shall conceal or hyperbole my own; for they are great ones between God and myself, but I think there are few here have a lighter load upon them than you have, if we consider things well, and I only with them your repentance, and that measure of faith God hath given you, and that measure of courage you have attained from God, and that constant perseverance God hath crowned you hitherto with.

Col. His Name be praised!

Here the Doctor prayed with him almost a quarter of an hour, after which the Colonel turning himself again to the people, spoke as follows:

One thing more I desire to be clear in; there hath a common imputation upon the Cavaliers, that they are Papists, and under that name we are made odious to those of the contrary opinion. I am not a Papist, but renounce the Pope with all his dependencies. When the distractions in Religion first sprung up, I might have been thought apt to turn off from this Church to the Romish, but was utterly unsatisfied in their Doctrine in point of Faith, and very much as to their Discipline. The Religion I profess, is that which putteth under the name of Protestant, though that be rather a name of distinction, than properly essential to Religion: but that Religion found out in the Reformation, purged from all the Limbs of Rome, in the Reign of Edward VI. purified in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and King Charles, that blessed Prince deceased; that Religion, before it was defiled, I am of, which I take to be Christ's Catholic, though not the Roman Catholic Religion.

Then he turned himself to the Executioner: I have no reason to quarrel with thee; thou art not the hand that throws the stone: I am not of such estate to be liberal, but here in gl. for thee, which is all I have; now tell me what I lack:

Executioner. Your hair to be turned up.

Col. Show me how to fit myself for the block, he turned up his hair, which he docket off, his hair turned up, he turned himself about to the people, and prayed a good while. Before he lay down to the block, he spoke to the people as follows:

There is none that looks upon me, though many faces, and perhaps different from me in opinion and practice, but hath something of pity in it; and may that mercy that is in your hearts, fall into your own bosoms when you have need of it; and may you never find such a block of sin to stand in the way of your mercy as I have met with.

I beseech you join with me in Prayer. Then he prayed, leaning on the Scaffold, half a quarter of an hour. Having done, he had some private conference with Dr. Swinburn; then he taking his leave of the Sheriff and his friends, kissing them, and flouting him next him, he prepared himself for the block, kneeling down, first, let me try the block; which he did. After calling his eyes, and having them very intently fixed, he said, when I say, Lord Jesus receive me, Executioner then do thy office. Then kissing the Axe, he lay down, and with as much undaunted, yet Christian Courage as possibly could be in man, did he expose his Throat to the fatal Axe, his Life to the Executioner, and commended his Soul into the hands of God, as into the hands of a faithful and merciful Creator, through the meritorious passion of a gracious Redeemer. Saying the fore-mentioned words, his head was smitten off at one blow.

Postscript. Here again.

He died very peacefully.

* Mr. Widdell in his Memorials, page 247, says, The High Court of Justice (afterwards) proceeded against Sir John Cook, and he was sentenced by the High Court, for Misprision of High-Treason, to forfeit his Estate, and to be imprisoned during his Life.
 Page 478. Capt. Abdy was sentenced by the High Court of Justice to have his Head cut off, and one Arm to be hanged, for conspiring against the Commonwealth, in the unreasonable engagement of Col. Annesley.
 Mr. Boscawen was executed at Tyburn, 21th of October 1650, according to the Sentence of the High Court of Justice; but in regard that Capt. Abdy only subscribed the engagement, but added nothing to it, he was pardoned by the Parliament.

XXV. The Trial of RICHARD FAULCONER, at the King's-Bench, in Term. Pasch. 1652. for Perjury.

ON the 12th day of July, 1652, an Indictment of Perjury was delivered to the Grand Jury at Guildhall, London, the Copy of which Indictment was as follows:

Know all, Be it remembered, that at the general Quarter-Session of the said Justice Holden for the City of London, at the Guildhall of the said City, on the 17th day of June, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and fifty-two, before John Crooke, Mayor of the City of London, Thomas Arden, Thomas Anderson, and Thomas Fox, Aldermen of the said City, and others their Fellow-Judges, assigned to keep the publick Peace in the said City, and all the said and determine divers, sundry, and other misdemeanours committed within the said City, in the Court of Robert Drury, Esq. Henry, John Harvey, Peter de Alden, Esq. Benjamin Thorne, Thomas Paine, Joseph Raine, Esq. Samuel C. Jones, Richard Paine, John Drury, Esq. Robert Drury, Esq. Robert Drury, Esq. Robert Drury, Esq. and Thomas Drury, Esq. and the said Robert Drury, Esq. and others, and charged to enquire for the Keepers of the Liberty of the City, in the Authority of Parliament, and the Body of the City aforesaid, it is presented that the Bill following is true.

Know all, Be it remembered that the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by authority of Parliament, upon their oath do certify, That Richard Faulconer, of the County of Middlesex, in the County of Southwark, Gent. not having the fear of God before his eyes, but moved and seduced by the infestation of the Devil, and minding and endeavouring to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Cromwell, Baron of Haverhill-Market, in the County of Berks, in danger of the loss of his life, and of the liquidation, confiscation, forfeiture of all his Lands, Goods, and Chattels within this Commonwealth of England, the 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord God, one thousand six hundred and fifty, at the Parish of Mary the virgin, in the Ward of Cripplegate, London, before Samuel Roper, Esq. John Roper, Esq. Edward Wray, Esq. John Roper, Esq. and Arthur Spack, Esq. then being Commissioners for corresponding with Delinquents, and for managing of all and every the Estates in Delinquency, and Peppercorn, that the 15th day of April, in the said year of our Lord, One thousand six hundred and fifty, were, or then stricken off, by undue sequestrations, did, upon the said Lands, Goods, chattels, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, swear, and upon his sworn oath before the Commissioners aforesaid, on the said 15th day of February, in the said Year, one thousand six hundred and fifty, then having power to administer the said Oath, then and there deposed concerning the said Lord Cromwell, in these English words following, that he to say, that about a fortnight before the conclusion of the Treaty at Breda, the Lord Cromwell, the Queen of Bohemia and her two Daughters came to Breda to the said King Charles, and went not thence till the King went to Haverhill, a baron of the Prince of Orange. That during that time, this Informant saw the Lord Cromwell drive twice in preference with the said King, and every Day with the said King at the Court there, he being there with the Queen of Bohemia, and her two Daughters, to take their leave [as they said] of the King of Scots, before he went to Scotland. That several Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the said King, to arrest them in flight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of heretics and idolaters, and to send them into England in Scotland for the recovering of his just rights, and restoring him in his Throne; and deputed this Informant and Colonel Drury to prevent the said Petition, who indeed drew the same. That when this Informant and some other Officers came to the Court at Breda, intending to prevent the said Petition immediately to the King's hand; but finding the Lord Cromwell very near to him, likewise the Marquis of Newcastle (who preferred his brother Sir Charles Cavendish, to kiss the said King's hand the evening before the said King's departure, who this Informant saw kiss the King's hand accordingly,) the Lord Cromwell, the Queen of Bohemia, the Queen of Scots, the Lord Cromwell, Sir, and a great number of soldiers; this Informant, with Colonel Drury, applied themselves to the Lord Cromwell, introducing him to go before the Petition to the King, and to present it to the King of Scots. The said Lord Cromwell, taking the Petition and reading the same, cheerfully said to Colonel Drury, that he would sign the same, and to the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and to say, I will speak for you. Upon which they applied themselves to the said Queen, and she preferred the Petition; after which, the King of Scots, the Lord Cromwell, the Marquis of Newcastle, and the Queen of Bohemia, with some other Lords, went into a withdrawing Room, where this Informant and company could not enter. But the Lord Cromwell came forth of the withdrawing Chamber, and told this Informant and Company, That they should be not as before from the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, and that it had passed in the Queen of Bohemia to their Petition, who afterwards came and told this Informant and company, that the said Queen preferred their Petition, and that the King had taken order for it. The next Morning at three of the clock, the King departed, but this Informant and Company had their quarters furnished by the Princess of Orange, according to the said King's order upon their Petition, and thereby to enable them to follow the said King in the protection of those was against the Parliament of England, which was the effect of their aforesaid Petition. That this Informant saw the Lord Cromwell very often and familiar with the said King, and enter with the said King into the withdrawing Chamber, so that there the last Night the said King was at Breda, very late, which said Oath was, the said 15th day of February, in the year of our Lord one thousand six hundred and fifty, at the Parish of Ward aforesaid, reduced into writing, and sworn before the said Commissioners, then having sufficient and lawful power so to administer the said Oath, and to take the testimony and depositions of witnesses upon their Oath in such cases. Whereas in truth neither did the several Officers, or any Officer make a Petition to the said King, to arrest them in flight for him against the Commonwealth of England, nor did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King to send them into England, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of heretics and idolaters, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just rights, or re-constituting him on his Throne; nor deputed by the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to prevent the said Petition, in the said Court mentioned; nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, apply themselves to the said Lord Cromwell, intending him to prevent the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, instruct him, the said Lord Cromwell, to present the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did the said Lord Cromwell take the said Petition, or send the same; nor did the said Richard Faulconer and Colonel Drury, then in the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and to say, I will speak for you. Nor did the said Lord Cromwell take the said Richard Faulconer and company, in the said deposition mentioned, that they should receive an answer to their said Petition, or that he had spoken to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf, as the said Richard Faulconer in and by the said deposition hath deposed. And the said Jurors standeth upon their Oaths aforesaid, do say, that the said Richard Faulconer, in manner and form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper act, consent and agreement, did contract wilfully, fully, and commit a Perjury, to the great dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great damage, loss and injury of the said William Lord Cromwell, and in contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth, in the said example of all others in the like case offending, and against the publick peace, &c.

SADLER.

This Indictment, upon the Testimony then produced upon Oath, was accordingly found by the Grand Jury.

The same day that this Indictment was found, Colonel Drury, who had given Evidence to the Grand Jury, returned to Windsor, to Captain Blype (having been formerly examined by him concerning the Lord Cromwell, and told him, that as he was that morning going down Haverhill, he was served with a Subpoena to appear that day at Guildhall, London; and that he was examined there concerning the Information given by Faulconer against the Lord Cromwell; and that after he was sworn before the Lord Mayor, he gave the same Evidence to the Grand Jury, which he had formerly given to Captain Blype upon his examination. Whosoever the said Captain Blype took the Wit under seal out of his hand, with which he was served to appear, and said to Drury, How durst you be examined against the Commonwealth, and not acquit me first therewith? And said further, Mr. Mayor (meaning the Lord Mayor) had better have done something else than so have suffered that Indictment to be found; and immediately calls for a Messenger, and commits the said Drury to the Custody of one Middleton, a messenger to the Council of State, who forthwith carried Drury away Prisoner into the Strand, on the heads of the said Middletons, where the said Drury was kept by him in great custody, till Sunday, that the Sessions was held; by which refractory of Drury, who had Faulconer's own hand-writing to produce against himself, and to be so otherwise the most material witness against Faulconer, there could be no further prosecution upon that Indictment that suffices.

In Midwinter Term, course was taken to remove the Indictment by a Conduci into the Upper-bench, to the end the said Faulconer might be outlawed for Perjury. The Record being accordingly removed, a Capias in order to an Outlawry was taken out against the said Faulconer, who for several Sessions before had refused to appear. At last the said Faulconer was taken upon the said Capias, and carried to Newgate, where he lay for some time, but would not appear, nor plead to the Indictment, whereupon the Prosecutors for the Commonwealth were enforced to move the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring him to the Bar, that he might be enjoined to plead; and accordingly the Court required him to plead; whereupon he pleaded Not guilty to the Indictment.

In Hilary-Term following, a day was appointed for Trial upon the Indictment, at Guildhall, London, before the Lord Chief-Justice Rous, where the said Captain Blype and Faulconer appeared with their Council and Witnesses; and Mr. Raynolds also appeared in behalf of the Commonwealth with Counsel and Witnesses, and had given in the Record to have the Jury called; but it fell out, that a procurator of Integrity then in Court, who had given certain knowledge when and where the said Oath was taken, gave Mr. Raynolds notice, that the Oath given to Faulconer, was administered unto him at Windsor, in Midwinter, and not at Haverhill, as he had said in London; and therefore the place being mislaid in the Indictment, a Writ of Coram non Jurato could not find a first day in Midwinter; whereupon Mr. Raynolds immediately withdrew the Record for that term, and gave a stop to the Trial.

No

No time was mis-spent to recover this Mistle; for within two Days a new Indictment was drawn, and preferred to the Grand Jury in Abbeys for [Sir Henry Blunt being Forceman], where the Indictment was found; and was as followeth:

History Term, 1652.

Abbeys. Before this time, that is to say, upon Tuesday next after the Morning of the Publication of the Virginia story, the same Term, before the Keepers of the Liberty of England, by Authority of Parliament, in the Upper-Bench at Windsor, by the Oath of twelve honest and lawful Men, it is presented, That Richard Faulconer, late of Windsor, in the County of Surrey, Gent. not having the Fear of God before his Eyes, but moved and seduced by the Insinuation of the Devil; and wilfully and unlawfully to bring the Right Honourable William Lord Cromwell, Baron of Hampden-Market, in the County of Windsor, in Danger of the Loss of his Life, and of the deprivation, Confinement, and Forfeiture of all his Goods and Chattels, Lands and Tenements, within the Commonwealth of England, the 10th Day of February, or the Year of our Lord God, one thousand six hundred and fifty, at Windsor, in the Parish of St. Andrew in the Field, in the County of Windsor, before Samuel Lord Egmont, John Lord, King Edward, William, Edw. John, Baron, Edw. and Archer, Baron, Edw. then being Commissioners for composing with Deputies, and not minding of all and every the Duties of Delinquents, and Popish Recusants, that the 18th Day of April, in the said Year of our Lord God, one thousand six hundred and fifty, were, or then after should be under Segregation, did, upon the holy Evangelists, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper Act, Confess, and Agreement, swear, and upon his corporal Oath, before the Commissioners aforesaid, on the said 10th Day of February, in the said Year one thousand six hundred and fifty, then having sufficient and lawful Power to administer the said Oath, and to take the Testimony and Depositions of Witnesses upon their Oaths in such Cases, then and there deposited, That several Officers, about thirty in Number, made a Petition to the said John Lord Cromwell, to entreat him to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the Name of barbarous and infamous Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just Rights, and re-imbursing him in his Throats. And did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners, swear, that the said Officers deposed him, the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, to persecute the said John Lord Cromwell, who, as the said Richard Faulconer, then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners did swear, indeed drew the same; and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners, swear, that he, the said Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, applied themselves to the Lord Cromwell (treating the aforesaid William Lord Cromwell), intending him to present the said Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the King of Scots; and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners, swear, that the said William Lord Cromwell taking the said Petition, and reading the same cheerfully, said to Colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, These is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will just for you. And that the said William Lord Cromwell did present the said Petition; and did also then and there, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, before the said Commissioners swear, That the said William Lord Cromwell also told him the said Richard Faulconer, and Company, *That they should require an Answer from the Queen of Bohemia in their Petition, and that he (treating the said William Lord Cromwell) did speak in the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf.* Whereas in Truth neither did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entreat him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England. Nor did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entreat him or them to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the Name of barbarous and infamous Rebels, either in England or Scotland. Nor did several Officers, or any Officer, make a Petition to the said King, to entreat him or them, to fight for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the Name of barbarous and infamous Rebels, either in England or Scotland, for the recovering of his just Rights, as re-imbursing him in his Throats. And whereas in Truth, the said Richard Faulconer, and Colonel Drury, were not deposed by the said Officers to present the said Petition, in the said Oath aforesaid; and whereas in Truth, he the said Richard Faulconer, with Colonel Drury, did not apply themselves to the said William Lord Cromwell, intending him to present the said Petition to the Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. Nor did the said Richard Faulconer, with the said Colonel Drury, intend him the said William Lord Cromwell, to present the said Petition to the said Queen of Bohemia, to present it to the said King of Scots. And whereas in Truth, the said William Lord Cromwell did not take the said Petition, nor read the same; nor say unto the said Colonel Drury, and him the said Richard Faulconer, These is the Queen of Bohemia, deliver it to her, and I will just for you. And whereas in Truth, the said William Lord Cromwell did not tell him the said Richard Faulconer, and Company, In the said Deposition mentioned, that they should receive an Answer from the said Queen of Bohemia to the said Petition, nor that he the said William Lord Cromwell did speak to the Queen of Bohemia in their behalf; as the said Richard Faulconer is and by the said Deposition hath deposed. And so the Jurors aforesaid, upon their Oath aforesaid, do say, That the said Richard Faulconer, in Manner and Form aforesaid, corruptly, wilfully, falsely, and maliciously, of his own proper Act, Confess, and Agreement, did commit wilful, false and corrupt Perjury, to the great Dishonour of Almighty God, and to the great Damage, Loss, and Injury of the said William Lord Cromwell, and in Contempt of the Laws of this Commonwealth; to the evil Example of all others in the like Case offending, and against the public Peace, &c.

[The Reason wherefore this Indictment did not recite the Oath in due words, as in the former Indictment, but signed the Perjury in the material Parts of the Oath, was by Reason it came lately to Knowledge, that the original Oath could not be found, and therefore the Oath was to be proved by the Entries so the Book of Parliament, and in Halsbury-Hall, and by the Testimony of the Persons who administered the Oath.] The next Day after the Indictment was found, the Prosecutors for the Lord Cromwell moved the Court for a Habeas Corpus, to bring Faulconer to the Bar to plead to the Indictment; who being brought into Court, desired Time to plead till the next Term: Whereupon the Court made this Order:

That the said Faulconer, having now in Court appeared unto the Indictment, should have Time to plead unto the same, until the Beginning of the next Term, at that the Justice then upon may be tried at the Bar in open Court the same Term.

Term. Pasch. 1652.

Faulconer having all this Vacation neglected to appear, or plead to the Indictment, the Prosecutors for the Lord Cromwell were enforced again to move for another Habeas Corpus to bring Faulconer to the Bar, to appear, or plead to the Indictment; who appearing, desired longer Time to attend his Counsel, which the Court granted accordingly: And the ordinary Rules of Court were given unto him for the temporary Days of pleading, or Judgment to be entered against him; and the very last Day, when the last Rule was out, and not before, he pleaded Not Guilty. And the Court ordered, That the Issue upon the Indictment of Perjury against the Defendant, be tried at the Bar upon Friday on the Morrow of the Assizes of our Lord, and that the Sheriff of Middlesex to attend Archer, Baron, Edw. with the Book of Freeholders forthwith; so that an Indifferent Jury may be returned between the said Faulconer, and the said Defendant, to try the Issue aforesaid, by Consent of the Parties on both Sides.

Mr. Brayley accordingly appointed the Sheriff to attend him the next Day in the Afternoon with the Book of Freeholders; who accordingly attended the Jury, and Notice was given by the Sheriff, requiring three to appear at the Day of Trial.

Friday, May 26, 1652.

THE Jury appearing according to Summons, and Faulconer being brought in Custody, the Court proceeded to try the Issue, and ordered the Indictment to be read; which being afterwards opened by Mr. Brayley, the Evidence was managed by Mr. Admory, Mr. Hale, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Widd, Mr. Phillips, Mr. Bellman, and Mr. Drury; who were of Counsel for the Commonwealth against the said Faulconer.

Before the Counsel for the Commonwealth proceeded to produce any Witnesses, they offered unto the Court and the Jury forming in general concerning the Indictment. That the Indictment was for the Crime of Perjury, wilfully and corruptly committed; that Faulconer makes in Oath, that there was a Petition delivered, in which there was a very short Recitation (as he swears) upon the Parliament, by the Name of barbarous and infamous Rebels, he swore he was desired to deliver it, being drawn by himself and Drury, and (subscribed by) the said Officers; that in order to the delivery thereof, they did require the Assistance of the Lord Cromwell, that he promised to speak for them, and brought them an Answer: But they hoped to prove unto the Jury, that this Oath which Faulconer did take was very false, that it was by Deceit, a Deceit for Money; that the Consequence of it was very notorious, the Ruin of that Gentleman, of his Estate, Fame and Fortune; that Witnesses will be produced to prove what in Truth the Petition was. There was a Petition delivered, but not a Petition to this Effect at all, and Faulconer knew the contrary. We shall produce what it was, and that under his own Hand, whereby it will appear that there was no such Matter in it as he had deposed; the Witnesses themselves will best speak the Particulars.

For the opening of some things concerning this Oath of Faulconer, it is to be observed, he took this Oath before the Commissioners of Halsbury-Hall, at Windsor, and it was there reduced into Writing, and a Transcript was made of the original; which Transcript was sent to the Council of State, and they ordered the same to be reported to the Parliament; and being reported there, is entered in the Journal-Book, and there remains a Record in Parliament.

The first thing, therefore, satisfied upon by the Counsel for the Commonwealth, was the proving of a true Copy of Faulconer's Deposition, in respect the original was lost, or rather mislaid by Faulconer. To prove the same,

A Copy thereof was produced in Court, which agreed verbatim with that Deposition of his, which was filed upon Record at Halsbury-Hall (the proper Court where it ought to remain): And though that upon the File was but a Copy, yet it was Evidence of that Deposition he was sworn unto by them. But this was opposed by the Counsel for Faulconer as not sufficient Proof, and thereupon a Copy of an Order of the Council of State, of March 6, 1650, was produced unto the Court, whereby it did appear, that the Depositions against the Lord Cromwell had been transmitted to the Council of State by the Commissioners at Halsbury-Hall. And it appeared further by the said Order, that Mr. Atterbury-General was appointed by the Council of State to report these Depositions to the Parliament, he transmitted to that Council by the Commissioners at Halsbury-Hall. And the Attorney-General being sworn in Court, did declare, that he reported no other Depositions to the Parliament, than what he received from the Council of State; and that the Depositions produced to him in Court (whereof the said Faulconer's was one), were endorsed with the Hand-writing of the Lord Bradshaw, then Lord-President of the Council of State; and that the Vices of Confession of the Lord Cromwell's Estate did pass upon the Report of the said Depositions, which he presented to the Parliament from the Council of State.

Mr. Forsyth, Chief-Clark to Mr. Radcliff, Clerk of the Parliament, did depose in Court, That the very same Depositions showed in Court to Mr. Atterbury-General, endorsed with the Lord Bradshaw's Hand-writing, were entered in the Journal-Book, as read in Parliament that Day, when Mr. Atterbury-General did make his Report unto the Parliament; which he knew the better to be true, for that he received the same from the Hands of Mr. Radcliff, or Mr. Daniel, the Clerk-Assistant in Parliament, the same Day they were read in Parliament, to be entered in the Journal-Book: And that he did enter the same accordingly with the Votes of Confirmation, which passed upon the reading of those Depositions. And afterwards he and Mr. Daniel did examine the said Depositions, wherein the said Faulconer's was one, after the same were entered into the Journal-Book.

And

And for the further satisfaction of the Court, he produced the Journal of Parliament, wherein the said depositions (and particularly that of Faulconer) were entered, which were read in Court out of the Journal; whereby it did appear that the depositions of the said Faulconer, Kingsburgh and Repley were entered into the said Journal, and did agree with the Copy of Faulconer's and their depositions remaining at Halsburgh-hall, and with the Copy reported by Mr. Attorney-General from the Council of State to the Parliament.

Mr. Wynslow, one of the Commissioners at Halsburgh-hall, being one before whom the said Faulconer was sworn, did testify upon Oath in Court, that the deposition of Faulconer now produced unto him, and whereupon there was an endorsement of the Lord Drury's handwriting, was, as he did believe, a true Copy of that deposition in which the said Faulconer was sworn to; Whitlock, that he had his own hand subscribed thereto (as examined by him to be a true Copy), and that it was used with the Commissioners at Halsburgh-hall, when they take examinations concerning any Person of Quality, to appoint one of themselves to go from the Table to examine the Copy by the Original: but whether, when he subscribed his name to the Copy produced unto him, he did examine the same by the original deposition before it was first for away by the Council of State, or afterwards, or by the Transcript remaining upon the file as a Record at Halsburgh-hall, he could not positively remember; but remembered that the Copy, to which his hand is subscribed, is examined by him, to be a true Copy, was taken when they had the original in custody; but cannot certainly say so.

Mr. Barnard, another of the Commissioners at Halsburgh-hall, before whom also the said Faulconer was taken, did testify upon Oath, that to the best of his remembrance, the particulars mentioned in Faulconer's depositions then read in Court, were the same to which the said Faulconer was sworn unto by himself and the rest of the Commissioners, though he could not remember every Syllable and Letter.

Mr. Wynslow and Mr. Barnard were again produced to declare, what they did remember concerning this clause in the deposition of the said Faulconer's (viz.) That several Officers, about thirty in number, made a Petition to the King of Scots, to intercede with him for him against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, either in England or Scotland, &c. And that upon Mr. Wynslow's declaration unto the Court, that he did well remember that clause in Faulconer's deposition when he was sworn thereto; but whether the number of Officers were thirty or no, he could not tell, but a certain number of Officers were named.

Mr. Barnard did declare the like, but whether the word inhuman was in he could not positively say, but was certain that barbarous Rebels was contained in that clause; and that when Faulconer was sworn unto the same, it was first read unto him, and attended in several places, and then he swore it to be true. And Mr. Barnard said, that he did remember his deposition the better, for that himself and the rest of the Commissioners had several debates upon it at Halsburgh-hall, whether they should therewithal, frequently, or secure the Lord Cromwell's silence.

Having thus used the Oath of Faulconer's silence, which was taken at Whitlock-hall, and brought to Halsburgh-hall, afterwards brought from Halsburgh-hall back again to Whitlock-hall, and from Whitlock-hall to the Parliament, and there entered in the Journal-Book, as the grounds upon which the Votes of Confiscation did pass; and having withal proved that particular clause of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c. the Counsel for the Commonwealth concluded as to that point, and left it to the Jury to judge, and to Faulconer to produce the original, which he hath got into his custody, if he can find any variance in it from the deposition recited in the indictment.

And to prove that Faulconer had got the original Oath into his custody, Mr. Knigh, a Witness, was produced, who did testify upon Oath, that being in the company of Faulconer he did show him a writing written with Captain Bijley's own hand (so far as he could judge one man's hand to be like another), and that Faulconer's name was subscribed therewith, and that Faulconer told him, the said Knigh, that that writing was the original deposition he was sworn unto against the Lord Cromwell, and which he kept on purpose to keep Mr. Bijley in awe (as Faulconer being then in necessity and want); and that the said Faulconer further said unto him, the said Knigh, that he had received 20*l.* for the business of the Lord Cromwell, and was to have more; but said he delivered 200*l.* for what he had done.

In the next place, the Counsel for the Commonwealth did apply themselves to prove the falsity of the Oath (viz.) That there was no such thing in the Petition mentioned by Faulconer in his deposition, [as that thirty Officers did petition to be interceded with for the King of Scots against the Commonwealth of England, by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, &c.] And being to prove a Negative, they applied their proof to a certain time and place, which Faulconer in his own deposition did prove for them; for he swears, that the Petition was delivered the Evening before the King of Scots went from Brady, and that the said King went away the next morning at three o'clock. He swears further, that he and Drury drew the Petition, and were deputed to deliver the same; accordingly they applied their evidence.

Proofs as to the Falsity of Faulconer's Oath.

MR. Hershel being produced, did testify, that the night before the King of Scots went from Brady, Colonel Drury, Captain Brifley, and divers others, were with a little their Petition to remember the King of a former Petition which they had delivered, that some excuse might be taken, that their affairs which they owed in the Town might be paid, that their Landlords where they lodged might not suffer, for they were not able themselves to pay them; and that he went along with them to the great window just over the moat, and there he, the said Hershel, did fix his hand unto the same, and that he was in the Chamber when Drury and Brifley came in to deliver the Petition, in which there was not a word that concerned any thing, but only the relief of their present necessities. Being asked by the Court, if there were not a mention of barbarous and inhuman Rebels, he answered, not any thing of that nature was in it. He further said, that this Petition had reference to a former Petition he was not acquainted withal, nor was his hand fix to the former Petition.

Captain Brifley being produced did testify, that there were divers Gentlemen to great distress met together in Colonel Drury's Chamber, at the time of the Treaty of the said King with the Commissioners at Brady, and that among other things it was agreed to draw a Petition to the King; which was drawn in Colonel Drury's Chamber, expressing their necessities, that the People of the Town might be relieved, and that the Petitioners might not be left to perish: that going to deliver it, they met with Secretary Lang by the way, who told them it was to no purpose, for there was no money come in. Afterwards the Petitioners had notice the King was to depart from Brady; whereupon they met together again, and went into the further end of the Gallery, to draw a short Petition, to put the King in mind of his Promise to Secretary Lang, concerning the People of the Town of Brady, that they might be relieved, and the Petitioners relieved, which Paper he the said Brifley delivered to the State King, who drew it on a Table; and doing so, they stood all around, being likely to be left in distress; and unexpectedly came in the Lord Cromwell, whereupon he, the said Brifley, having long lived in the County, and knowing him to be a lover of boldness, he spoke unto him, and said, Sir, we are a company of poor distressed Gentlemen, likely to be left here in misery (he said, Well); and the next morning the King went away, without giving any relief unto the Petitioners. The Court demanded of Brifley, whether there were no such matter in it as barbarous and inhuman Rebels? He answered, that he read it, and was sure there was no such thing in it, the whole scope of it being to relieve their necessities, which was the occasion of that Petition, being demanded again by the Court, if barbarous and inhuman Rebels were not in the Petition? he answered, No, not any such words at all, nor to make any mention of the Petitioners.

Colonel Drury was in the next place produced, who testified, that being at Brady, Lieutenant-Colonel Brifley, Major Faulconer, Major Hall, Captain Kingsburgh, and divers others came to his lodging, and told him that they were in a condition of starving, and desired him that he would assist them to draw a Petition to the King of Scots, to relieve their necessities, or else they must perish; that the said Drury being in that condition consented unto it, and in his Chamber, in his son's paper-book, the Petition was drawn, Major Faulconer writ it with his own hand; which, said Drury, I have here to show, and so produced the original under Faulconer's hand unto the Court; in which Petition (said Drury) we desired some relief from his Majesty, shewing how we had served the former King, and in what necessities we were. That they were afraid to deliver it to Secretary Lang, for that they were told that the King had not a Particle to relieve himself, and it would be a vain thing, said Lang, to deliver it. That they followed Secretary Lang, and followed him daily for three weeks together, and till he put them off, and the day before the King went from Brady, they drew a short Petition to mind the King of his promise to Secretary Lang, and to desire that the Inhabitants of Brady that had relieved them, might not be undone; that Brifley was deputed with him to deliver it, and he accordingly delivered it to the King; that the King laid it down upon the Table: in steps the Lord Cromwell; then Captain Brifley, having trailed a Pike under the Lord Cromwell, went to him, and told him there were many Gentlemen ready to starve, and desired him to speak a favourable word to the Queen of Belonia. To which the Lord Cromwell answered, Well, as Brifley then told him. The next morning the King of Scots went away, and to nothing at all was done for the Petitioners; that original Petition, which Drury produced unto the Court, of Faulconer's own handwriting, and in the presence of Faulconer, was publicly read in Court, and was as followeth, viz.

May it please your Majesty,

THE great kindness we have always had of your Majesty's present consideration has been the prime cause of our long silence; but now our necessities are grown to great and insupportable, that we are informed either to petition or perish: Most humbly desiring your Majesty, to take into your princely consideration our extremities, who have been ever ready to prostrate their Lives in your Majesty's Royal Father's service: not so much willing and ready to prosecute the same in what your Majesty shall command: Most humbly petitioning your Royal Order, that some course may be taken for our present subsistence, that our future endeavours may not be hindered in that unavoidable calamity, which our Loyalty hath reduced us unto.

And we shall cordially pray for your Majesty.

The Court demanding of Colonel Drury, if the said Petition was Faulconer's own hand-writing; he said Yes, and looking back upon Faulconer, said, he cannot deny it: I did dictate unto him, and Faulconer did write it in my Chamber, and that is the very original that was to be drawn, and being in my hand, it was afterwards delivered to Secretary Lang: the other that was delivered was a memorial, to put the King in mind of his promise when money came in. And Drury further said, that when he was examined by Mr. Bijley, he did give in his Examination the contents of the first and latter Petition; and said, he did express himself at that time of his Examination by Mr. Bijley, to the same effect which he had now done in Court. Being asked by the Court, if the words barbarous and inhuman Rebels were in that first petition? the said Drury answered, that Faulconer moved to have barbarous and inhuman Rebels inserted into that Petition drawn by himself, but was answered by the Petitioners, that as they were Soldiers of fortune, it was unusual language, and so they would not give any use to it. Being demanded by the Court, who was deputed to deliver the said Petition, he said, Captain Brifley and himself, in regard he had many wounds at Cromwell's death, that the King might excuse him his case the more; and that he, the said Drury, was also deputed with Brifley to deliver the same, because he was known to the Queen of Belonia, and some other persons of quality, and Faulconer was not at all deputed. Being asked, if the Lord Cromwell was present at the delivery of the first Petition? he answered No, the Petition was delivered three weeks before; but the Lord Cromwell was present when the said Petition was delivered, to mind the King of his promise. The said Drury further informed the Court, that afterwards Faulconer being discontented that he got no money, said, as he went going into Town, This is a barren Town, that we dwell in, in this state, to follow a thing they call a King (God damn me). I would go into England, and do all the mischief I can.

Proofs as to the Credit of Faulconer.

IN the next place, the Counsel for the Commonwealth did apply themselves to offer proof as to the credit of Faulconer. Mr. Windsor, of Chancery, Attorney at the Common-law, being sworn, did testify to this purpose purpose; That being in his chamber at Closter's Inn, about this time twelve-month, Faulconer came to him, asked how fared the Countryman now Peterfield did? That he heard Faulconer where he had been of so long a time? Who answered, he had been as the Low Chastity, had seen some Lords in Council for the King, that he had been twice against the Lord Craven, which would bring a great deal of advantage on the State; that he had money for the doing of it; and said, that he had received already Shill (it was that sum here mentioned, said Mr. Widdridge, to the best of his remembrance), but Faulconer said, he did expect a greater reward; that the said Faulconer hath been as wicked a man as any in England; that he spent his kint, and left the Country, did wicked acts while he was there: that being at Peterfield, he drank an health to the Devil in the middle of the Street, of which information being given, we went in the Justice of the Peace at the Town, and had him bound over to the Sessions for doing of it; but said, he did not see him since the health to the Devil.

Mr. Justice of Peterfield being produced, testified, about five years ago, Faulconer was eating and drinking of healths, that he did drink a health to the Devil, and said this, I came from my Brother's Epistle and my own; I will never move money, for what there is any in the Nation, I will get it one way or other, and I will do something of Refuge to be talked off; that the name of Faulconer find over die. Being asked in what manner he did drink the health? He answered, in the Street, down upon his knees; that he was present, and thousands can witness it, that he was had before a Justice of Peace for it.

James Craven being sworn, did testify, that in May 1645, after the Siege at Exeter, it was his nature to fall into the company of Faulconer, and as he was in the cellar, was in a tavern, drank his, and was as follows: takes a two-and-twenty Shilling piece of Gold. I was by him, said this, God damn him, and said loudly, he will be long to find in Hein, and these words he used frequently to Bliss, Woman, and Child, ligger, ligger, ligger; and correct him for it, he would say, damn die, damn and words, he would do it. Being asked by the Court, if Faulconer did any thing upon him? He answered, No, he was able to deal with as good a man as he.

Mr. Hagley hath often heard Faulconer swear, damn him and find him, and such wicked expressions.

Mr. Burdell did testify, that he heard Faulconer say, our Saviour Christ was a Deaf, and a Corrupter of the Law, and carried a bag of Tails after his Father.

After being produced, did declare, that Faulconer confided to him, that he had got money of a man, by procuring one to prosecute Captain Bishop; it was thus (as Faulconer told him): I was a Citizen, as he remembered Faulconer said, did desire Faulconer to get Captain Bishop to do a business for him, which Citizen did promise him twenty pound, ten in hand, and ten afterwards: whereupon Faulconer said he got one to prosecute Captain Bishop, and to go along with him to the Common: which man so prosecuting Captain Bishop, promised the Citizen, upon the account of Major Faulconer's good services for the publick, to afford him his best assistance in the effecting of what was desired in his Petition, which story Faulconer himself told. And Faulconer further said, that Captain Bishop had said him ill, in keeping him so low in money; that he had it one time in his thoughts, as Captain Bishop came from the Committee-chamber, through the Guard-chamber, down the stairs, to have cut his throat. Being asked by the Court, what money Faulconer had of Captain Bishop? He answered, he paid to Faulconer with his own hands, by Captain Bishop's direction, twenty pound at one time, and about thirty pound more at other times, in several portions; that Faulconer confided to him he had twenty pound afterwards. Being demanded what it was for he gave that money? He said, I will set first to that, I cannot find it that.

Captain Baldwin being produced, did testify, that about three or four years ago, he came to Faulconer's lodging, and saw him write a letter in his chamber, and that he went to it as it had come to him: John Bargy from Jersey, and for Bargy's name to it, and Faulconer would have had him, the said Bargy, to carry this letter to one Capt. Bishop, who belonged to the Council at State, and to say he had the letter from one of Bryde, and got some money of Bryde for that intelligence mentioned in the letter, of which the said Baldwin was to have half; but he, the said Baldwin, refused to go with the same, knowing it to be unjust.

Mr. Powell, a Justice of Peace of the County of Midshire, did testify, that the said Faulconer, the 20th of March 1645, was committed to Midshire Gaol, by Thomas Widdridge, Mr. Baldwin, and Mr. John Julius, of the Peace, upon suspicion of Felony, Robbery and Murder, and tendered a Certificate thereof in writing unto the Court.

The Defence made on the behalf of Faulconer.

THE evidence being given on the behalf of the Commonwealth, Mr. Widdridge, Mr. Lewis, Mr. Lubner, and Mr. Hagley, of Council for Faulconer, did offer something to the consideration of the Court, before they did produce their Witnesses; viz. that although it concerns every man that Perjury should be punished; for every man's life, liberty, fortune and estate depends upon an Oath, and is these times it is somewhat dangerous if they should be forewarned so on the other side, if Faulconer be not forewarned, it is but just he should be acquitted. That the Council for the Commonwealth have endeavored to prove that there was a Petition, and that there was the sixth words in the Petition as are suggested, and have endeavored to impeach the credit of Faulconer: that they have produced a copy of Faulconer's Oath, which ought not to be admitted; because it is but a Transcript of a Transcript, a Copy of a Copy, brought from Heidelberg to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and there the Copy is entered in the Journal-book. And the Witnesses that have been produced, do not swear positively to the Oath as it is in writing, and one particle may turn the whole faith of an Oath; and though their words barbarous and blasphemous words were in it, yet how it is applied, and how the sense of it falls, it cannot be judged, but by the original writing itself, and it concerns the Council for the Keepers to produce it. How it should come into Faulconer's hands, there is no account given, but by one Knight, who faith Faulconer threw him a string, which Faulconer had was his [original] deposition against the Lord Craven, but the credit of Knight's testimony is left to the Jury. It is found, that that copy produced in Court was examined; but Mr. Widdridge does not positively say it was examined by the original, when in their custody.

That as to the Witnesses produced against the credit of Faulconer, they did hope to counterpoise his life now, as of a man that might be credited; that in the Petition delivered at Brake there is something of these words, though there be not barbarous and blasphemous words, which was but a nominal thing yet the producing of themselves to prosecute the cause, is desired, may be offered, though the words be not there, yet the sense doth bear it. That the rule is for a man to stand with Faulconer, who was employed at the Court as Brake as an advocate, as a spy; and at last return in giving an account of it. After which at Brake, let something fall concerning the Lord Craven, who was a spy in him; and that what Faulconer delivered in his deposition was with qualifications, as he did believe, to his best remembrance, and the like.

Henceupon Captain Bishop was produced on the behalf of Faulconer, as a Witness, whose discourse was long, and consisted of three parts.

1. It took some how the Council of State sent for him from his habitation at Bryde, to be employed in matters of great trust; and afterwards what trust was reposed in him and Mr. Law, in order to the safety of the Nation.

2. By way of argument on behalf of Faulconer, he did declare what services Faulconer had done for the Commonwealth, and that Faulconer was one by whom this Commonwealth was kept safe at this hour, and by whom he enjoyed his life: and what an ill request this was to be thus proceeded against.

3. He third part of his discourse was, to declare what particular designs the State formerly had in hand, and what designs the enemy had against the State; and what service he did to countermease the enemy in their designs: the fall of the three being not (as was conceived) so wisely spoken in publick, and which would be more unfit to be in print, shall therefore here be put over in silence, as also what Captain Bishop said at large concerning the two first particulars, in respect they are so poorly pertinent to be applied, as to the perjury in question.

An account only shall be therefore given what Captain Bishop properly spoke at Winche.

As Winche, Captain Bishop said, he had never seen Faulconer in drink, or misbehaved him; but ever observed him as a sober man; that he saw Faulconer's information [which Faulconer did deliver as the substance] and that he must say, that the words [as in the effect] should have been put in, and that it was his fault they were not so; and he could not tell but that they were in; that the Commissioners at Heidelberg had been desired to come to Winche to administer an Oath to the said Faulconer privately, lest danger should befall the Witnesses if they were not so.

That Heijde was formerly an Agent for the Prince, and was to receive orders from Van Gool in the Tower, and was ordered to be sent by the High Court of Justice: that Colonel Drury was a Papist in arms, and being brought before him to be examined, still had the Lord Craven in his mouth, before he was asked a question.

The like of Bryde. He said, that before Drury and Bryde came from beyond seas, his Agent gave him notice of their coming, and thereupon he had wait for them, and caught them; that Drury said, when he was examined, that he had not a penny of money; that he did not commit him to prison, but took his people, and in consideration gave him two Shillings and six-pence for his supper. He said further, that Drury did contradict himself as what he had formerly informed the Council of State, and to that end produced in Court the copy of Drury's information; which being read in Court, agreed with the testimony which Drury then gave to the Jury.

[By way of signification sheweth, That Drury's and Baldwin's Informations, which Captain Bishop had taken about twelve months since, and which tended to clear the Lord Craven, he received till this hour that he produced the same in Court, and never transmitted this into Mr. Widdridge's to the Parliament, although before the Bill of State did pass, he did transmit Baldwin's and Knight's Informations to the Parliament, and which he apprehended made enough for the Lord Craven.]

Captain Bishop further said, that whereas it was objected that Faulconer had money, he answered, that it is great reason he should have money, for there was a real effect of the safety of the Commonwealth by his services; that notwithstanding any thing hath been sworn against Faulconer, as before.

Captain Bishop speaking again of Faulconer's deposition, that the words [as in the effect] should have been added, the Court asked him, whether Faulconer gave any directions to express these words in his Examination? To which Captain Bishop made answer, That the deposition he made, was the substance of things, and he put it in words, and that [as in the effect] if they were not in, should have been so. The Court again asked him, if Faulconer did direct him to put in these words [as in the effect]? He replied again, he did deliver the whole, as the effect of it.

Captain Bishop being further asked by the Court, if he were present when the Commissioners gave the Oath, and took what Faulconer had in way of information? He answered, That he prepared it before the Commissioners were first so, and then they had only the administering the Oath; and said again, I prepared the Information which he made Oath of, thereupon Mr. Widdridge desired leave to inform the Court, that when he and the rest of the Commissioners came to Winche to administer this Oath, being first for to that end, the information was ready prepared by Captain Bishop, and having no Regular with them, they made use of Captain Bishop, being well skilled in the use of his pen, to write over the deposition: for though he had prepared the deposition, the Commissioners did see occasion to alter much of it; and it was writ over again, and then read to Faulconer, and attested by him, and subscribed unto by the hands of all the Commissioners then present; and the Oath which we gave him was this, Whether the deposition thus drawn, and that which he

C. Queen Kanching having produced, did signify, that a Petition was drawn by Wido, and signed by him, Fooden, and others, to be presented to the King of Soto; that it was to portance of paying money to discharge some quarrels, and to enable them to serve the King, but known not by whom it was delivered, that Somay and Wido were there, and money was given, but that neither Wido nor Somay were the persons who delivered it; that there was another Petition drawn, but by whom delivered he knew not, only he saw a paper in the Queen of Sakote's hand, which was told him was the Petition; and after a Queen of an hour's discourse with the King, he delivered it to the King, but they never received any money upon that, and he never saw any more of the Queen of Soto at all, nor heard it said, that it was the full Petition which he signed.

Colonel Dew was produced in Court on the behalf of Faulmer, who said, he knew nothing of his birth, he only knew his Father and Mother, that they lived in good fashion and credit, but how the Faulmer had been brought up, and where he had inhabited for their ten or twelve years, he knew not; and that this was as much as he could say.

Minibel, an Alcoholic-keeper, was then produced, who said he knew nothing of Faulstich, but that he was a very honest man, Faulstich having lived in his house a year and three quarters; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he was a good Scholar, an honest man, and brought up at the University.

[illegible]

Mr. Carg did testify something to this purpose, in reference to Briggs's leading men to Plantations, who said further, he had no more to say against Briggs, but that he was a man would drink, and sometimes swear, as well as other men that are accustomed to it; that he knows nothing to the contrary, but that he came to Briggs to wait for employment: in the mean time, until he was there, he did another man did, drive to look for relief.

After this, the Court had with much patience heard Captain Byler, and the rest of the Witnesses on the behalf of Faulkner, (the Counsel for Faulkner form'd up the Evidence, and left it to the Jury, with some further observations, viz.

That though the words in honour and obedience Relief were used in the Petition, yet there were words of condemnation of force, as the King should command and prosecute his cause, which was the substance of the thing asserted. Faulstich that Captain Rogers, and Minister-Colonel Tyrer, who have testified of Faulstich a servant, were Witnesses to be preferred before any testimonies produced against Faulstich; that the endeavour is not only to convict this man, but by conviction and doubling of his credit, to determine that which hath been acted by the Parliament, upon his testimony, and other concurrent testimonies, not only in petting Votes, but in affirming an Act of Parliament to be in a State.

There was nothing objected against the credit of the Witnesses, so long as there was any other face to turn, tho' there were other endeavours used in Parliament to prevent the sale of the Lord Grenville's Estate; so that where all other remedies fail'd, they then make use of this last resort of Perjury, and so hope to undermine the Act of Parliament. Two Reasons might have been enforc'd, yet you see what his part was to do, to defend him that he was not what he was, and it may be, when he was amongst the God-damns, and such kind of men, it was his part to be what small conscience he has (Absurdities!) / For a man, or a woman, who professes himself a Christian, and who will drink a health, yet afterwards say he is no Devil, that they acknowledge the charge in part, and would fly it as words, not in substance, and therefore not finally in the latter true.

Thus it was proved that the Earl Petre was to serve the King, as they formerly had served his Father, and they served his Father against the Par-lament: in their offer must needs be, to be entertained to serve the King against the Parliament.

That it is a fiduciary, that this man for so many services performed by him to the Commonwealth, and feelings grounded upon his information, must be blamed here by an artificial distinction, a great while after. And if he shall, after all this, be convicted or Perjury, it will be a discovery to all men to undertake the like employment for the future.

And lastly, the Council for Fardlow disavows, but if there be a mistake in what he hath sworn, yet it appears not to be maliciously or corruptly done, and that therefore the Jury ought to find for Fardlow.

The Reply by the Council, on the behalf of the Commissioners, against Paulson's was in the terms following:

[illegible][illegible]

They objected, on a Widney with the same article as Dray. The objection was Widney had had his common law for twelve years a-day: that information had no other foundation, than the saying of a Dutchman, that said so, or of an Englishman in a Dutch barge; and what was testified, was what was said, and not what was known of Dray. They objected, that Dray's word honor is not as another, that Dray is a Widney and not a Widney; and that Dray is a Widney, Widney, Widney, when they have produced it. He hath Dray is Dray, in effect with Dray, which you will not forget: be Dray, that when the first Dray was drawing, it was moved by Dray, that the words Dray and Dray Dray should be put in, but it was rejected by them that there is a Dray Dray: so their own Widney speaks with Dray.

As for the deposition on record at Hakeadryers hall, which being filed here, it is proof of itself, which no man may aver against, when it is recorded; we have thence it there, traced it here, brought a copy of it endorsed with the Lord Abbot's hand; and it is believed that a man shall be confuted and lose his chair, and not so much as an Oath taken against him! It is apparent there was an Oath, and it is hoped you will believe that which the Parliament hath recorded, and expressly proved by the Gentlemen of Hakeadryers-hall here prefixing, which you will believe before any insinuation that can be made on the other side.

They have been so long at this friendly touching conversation of this man, to uphold his credit, that, Gentlemen of the Jury, you are to consider of the man, who doubtless Mayhew had come out of his mouth, you have heard it. If a man will go so high, as to travel down to Jerusalem to the Devil, I hope there is no man for that, his good services must not plead for him to comply with God-damner, that will not justify him, he was not first to do any such thing. But we have not relied there; have we not proved him a perjuror of other men, a deceiver, and things that a man should be ashamed to name: the two-and-twenty fables which he took out, and what half wild words he spoke, not fit to be repeated? That will not be palliated by any service whatsoever. And for that which Mr. Mayhew hath said, nothing shall be laid against him, but what appears to you; that Mr. Mayhew hath gone beyond a Witch: for when he hath done his testimony, he stands and maverghs the Witch, and in that is not equal to others that do not. For his expiation, that Endeavour is one of them by which a man may be saved, and England his life at this hour, it is God we fear for by, and not by him. I assure him not for his service, but when we are upon a question of truth, I lay truth and righteousness beyond all service in the world.

They first heard Lord Crove furnished the Petition, and promised to forward it. Gendeme, you must distinguish that which my Lord Crove knew, and that which you knew not; there is not an affray from deception to ending, that any man took notice of; but my Lord Crove read the de-fact Petition was. In the Petition was the expression of de-fact Lord Crove, which was three weeks before the latter, which was finally to drive them might have money for their quarters. The left Petition had former expressions relating to their former service, and these expressions of their readiness for the future; but that Petition my Lord Crove never saw, but was delivered to one Long three weeks before, and Drayd put it down in his deposition, when he was examined by Mr. Solby, which agrees with that which was read in Court.

But the particular time when the latter Petition, or Memorial, was delivered, with which the Lord Greaves is charged, was the evening before the King went from Brede.

They say that here is no corruption proved, and a man cannot be guilty without corruption; but certainly he that fears a thing that is false, is still of necessity corrupt.

Faulconer answers, that these Officers did subscribe the Petition: Doubt he brings any one to confirm his testimony, or the least colour of evidence to what he hath sworn?

It was further offered by the Council for the Commonwealth, that the Jury would distinguish their verdicts, between the Petition framed and dictated by Drury, and sent by Faulconer; and that either Petition delivered the night before the King went from Brede; the first is produced, and proved to be Faulconer's own hand: that Peterson was three weeks before, which begs for maintenance, and profits forever, the copy of which was brought forth before any evidence was given by them; for Drury upon his examination before the Council of State made the facts known, and which agrees verbatim with that sent in Court. So the dictating of that Petition was by Drury, the writing by Faulconer, the delivery was to Secretary Lang, and that was the thing whereof they did accuse an account; but that was not the Petition to which the testimony of Faulconer at all goes. That Petition of which that Oath is spoken, and to which it is applied, is the Petition which was drawn the evening before the King went from Brede; and that the Peterson talked of in the depositions, that is the Petition upon which we push, and therefore if in that Peterson there be more of these words, that which he hath sworn unto is false. For in that Petition we say there was no such words as barbarous and inhuman Rabbi; nor such words of profusion or magnificence, but a mere desire of supper; and they have not offered the best proof to the contrary. And finally, that it was not promoted by the Lord Greaves, nor the Petition was delivered by them to the King, before that time as the Lord Greaves came into the room, so that my Lord Greaves was no promoter of the Petition; and had he been a promoter of it, there was nothing in it, as might give offence, nor, not the least mention of the Parliament, nor any thing that might offend. And whereas they object, that this Oath was not corrupt, the very words of his apostrophe are very considerable, for he doth remarkably for the words in his deposition, Thy fight against the Commonwealth of England by the name of barbarous and inhuman Rabbi: Why would he do such an apostrophe upon it as that was? It could not be a bare mistake; nor the words of this effect, as Mr. Boley would have had in, could never have served the turn, for to say he would fight against the barbarous and inhuman Rabbi, or to that effect, there is no such effect in the said Petition nor in the other. Then a second thing is, that this Faulconer being, as he deposes, the contriver of the Petition, it could not be a mere oversight and mistake in him; and then when he could not have his desire beyond fear to get money, he said, He would own here, and do not as if he had.

The Council urged further: Gentlemen of the Jury, what is become of the original depositions taken in this country; it lies upon them that are for the Oath to make it out. It cannot be pretended that the Parliament would condone a Nobleman's estate, and order it to be sold: would they send it into the Journal-book, and make it a record, should it come and be transcribed from Holdenburgh-Hall (the proper Judiciary for that business) to the Council of State, and from the Council of State to the Parliament, and then not to be a true Oath, or false copy? That is not to be denied, that a false Copy should fill a Gentleman's Estate, that a false Copy should be recorded to stand to all Eternity.

After the reply was made; every Judge as Court spoke what they in their judgment thought fit, for the better direction of the Jury; whereupon the Jury withdrew, and the next day brought in their Verdict, That they found the said Faulconer guilty of the Perjury mentioned in the Indictment. The Oath following was thereupon made, viz.

By the Court:

*The Defendant sent this Day brought into Court, under the Custody of the Marshal of the Court, upon an Indictment for Perjury, whereunto he had formerly pleaded Not Guilty; and the Jury thereupon being sworn, and sworn, found him Guilty of the Perjury in the Indictment mentioned; and thereupon the said Faulconer is committed to the Custody of the said Marshal, where to remain until, &c.*

XXVI. The Trial of Mr. JOHN LILBURN, at the Sessions of the Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailey, upon Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday, the 13th, 14th, 15th, and 16th Days of July, 1653, for returning into England, being banished by Act of Parliament.

[Written (the chief Part) by the said John Lilburn.]

I Was Counsel or Proctor for my Uncle, George Lilburn, Esq. and one Mr. Jephth Primate, &c. about a Colliery taken from them in the County of Durham, by force and violence, by Sir Arthur Heslop; which by his cruelities computes to be worth five thousand pounds Sterling for annum. About which Colliery the said Mr. Primate preferred a Petition to the Parliament, upon the 23d of December, 1651, in the delivery and management of which I appeared, as by the declared Law of England I might justifiably do.

Which Petition being by the Parliament referred to a Committee to examine it, who spent twelve or thirteen large hearings thereupon; and upon the 19th of January, 1652, now file, the Chairman thereof, Mr. Abb, made his report to the House: but what it was, we never were permitted to see nor to hear read. And as some Members of Parliament have since told me, he made his report quite contrary to, or short of the evidence which was given in: whereupon the Parliament, the said 19th day of January, voted the said Mr. Primate's Petition to be false, malicious, and scandalous; and that Sir Arthur Heslop is not guilty either of Oppression or Tyranny, in the Charge and Execution of this business; and that all the Copies of the said Petition (which relating only to Primate, as he here intimated) should be burnt by the hands of the Common-Hangman. And voted Mr. Primate to pay seven thousand pounds, or to be imprisoned till he pay it; which is all his punishment. And then the same day they passed certain Votes against me, which as they themselves, by special order of the 17th of January, have printed them, verbatim thus follow:

Resolved,

That the Fine of three thousand pounds be imposed upon Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburn, to be paid to the use of the Commonwealth.

That he be fined two thousand pounds more, to be paid to Sir Arthur Heslop, for his damages; and two thousand pounds more, to be paid to Sir Robert Bagley, Edward Widdow, William Abbott, and Arthur Speck, Esqrs. four of the Commissioners for compensating; that is to say, to each of them five hundred pounds for their damages.

Vot. VII.

Resolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn be banished out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Islands and Territories thereto belonging; and not to return into any of them, upon pain of being proceeded against as a Felon, and in case of such return, shall suffer death accordingly.

Resolved, &c.

That Lieut. Col. John Lilburn do depart out of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the Islands and Territories thereof, within thirty days now next coming; and in case the said John Lilburn shall, after the said thirty days, be found within England, Scotland, or Ireland, or the Islands and Territories thereto belonging, or any of them, the said Lieut. Col. John Lilburn shall be proceeded against as a Felon, and shall suffer the pains of death accordingly.

Resolved, &c.

That the Sergeant at Arms attending the Parliament, do apprehend the said Lieut. Col. John Lilburn, and bring him to the bar of the House, upon Tuesday morning next, to receive the judgment of Parliament aforesaid; and that Mr. Speaker do direct a warrant to the Sergeant at Arms accordingly.

But being myself at the Parliament-door when these Votes pass, and understanding what they had done, although they fine to my reimbursement a good while after candle-light, I had, and when the Sergeant at Arms came forth with his mace, and the Speaker, I spoke to him in these words, or to this effect: Mr. Speaker, I understand the House hath this day passed some Votes against me, in which regard I stand on purpose, to see if you have any thing to say to me. Upon which he replied, No, Sir, I have no warrant yet to meddle with you, and therefore

therefore you may go whether you please. Well, Sir, if you have none to-night, I will permit you, to wait upon you to-morrow morning, to see whether then you will have any or no. And being as good as my word, the next day being Friday, January the 16th, he came into the custody of his Deputy, Mr. Payne, where I remained till Tuesday morning next (as it was ordered at the last Vote) which was Tuesday the 18th; and coming to the Parliament-door, I was ushered into the Bar by the Sergeant at Arms, having his hand upon his shoulder, where Mr. Speaker, as the member of the House, expelled himself in their words, or to this effect:

Lieutenant-Colonel Lilburn, you are commanded by this House to kneel; unto which I assented in their words, or to this effect; Sir, with all Submission to this honorable House, I desire still a little liberty to speak. No, Sir, Lieutenant, you are permitted to speak at all, but I am commanded to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, with all submission, I beseech your sentence, that you have already put upon me, but I cannot kneel.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lilburn, said he, the House commands you to kneel. Well then, Sir, said I, as be forth with you, I neither can kneel, nor will I kneel. Withdraw then, said he, which I did accordingly, making them two or three together as my going out, the which also I did as I came in. Whereupon, as I was informed, being that I would not kneel at their Bar to receive my sentence, they voted to draw up an Act of Parliament to punish me; and passed another Vote by way of punishment, to take off ten days of the time they had formerly given me to spend the house in. Altho upon the Friday at night before, I with my Keeper went to the Sergeant's House, and spoke to him to this purpose. Sir, Sergeant, I understand the Parliament this to-morrow, to censure the Commissioners for regulating the Law, and I know it is their usual manner to command all men that come to their Bar (that they look upon as delinquents or offenders) to receive their sentence at their Bar kneeling.

And truly, Sir, I have no desire at all to offend them, or to see them more than they are, for I believe they are wiser enough already at me. And therefore I beseech you, oblige me for as far as you, as to tell the Speaker and some other Members, whom you please, from me, That when upon Tuesday I shall come to their Bar, to receive their sentence, I shall not kneel, although they should order you with your power to cause him to kneel; my brain out said, Sir, if you please to give me leave, I will oblige you my motion, and to this I know what my knowledge at your Bar to receive sentence, the Parliament looks upon it as an action or posture of kneeling, as a demonstration of a man's own acknowledgment in his own conscience that he is guilty, and thereby does deserve such a punishment as by that sentence is laid upon him; the which if I should do, I were in my own understanding the worst creature in the world, because my conscience and soul tells me, that I have done no evil, nor broken none of the Parliament's Laws, but followed (as by the Laws of England I may justifiably do) an honestly just and righteous business, in a just and honest way, without using any base or wicked sordidly means to effect my design in it. And whatever Mr. Hill hath reported to the House, I am sure of it, I have fully proved every clause and circumstance contained in our Petition, have only that clause in Mr. Arthur Hylborne's private correspondence with some of the Commissioners of Holborn denied. But if we had not proved the Petition, there is no Law extant in England to enable the Parliament in the least to put such a sentence upon me; and therefore for me in words, actions, or gestures, to do the least circumstance, to make the Parliament believe that I am in mine own conscience was convinced that they had passed a just sentence upon me; I had rather, Mr. Sergeant, be cut in ten thousand pieces, than be such a rogue and traitor to mine own liberties and the nation's; and therefore I beg of you beforehand to tell them as much from me, that if they may avoid, if they please, their forcing me on Tuesday next to offend them. And he afterwards assured me, that the next day, being Tuesday, he told twenty or thirty of the Members of Parliament of it, so that they put the affront upon themselves, and not I. But upon the said Tuesday, after that I was withdrawn out of the House, and in a liberty to be gone as soon as I pleased, then being great numbers of Citizens, my very good friends, at the door (who were persons that had always faithfully adhered to the Parliament's cause), were persons that had always faithfully adhered to the Parliament's cause, called for a Petition for the revoking of my banishment; the Petition being called for, was read and debated, but laid aside, without giving any answer to the Petitioners. The Copy of which Petition, as since it is printed in England, thus followeth:

To the supreme Authority, the Parliament of the Commonwealth of England,

The humble Petition of many well-afflicted People, inhabiting the City of London, Westminster, Southwark, and parts adjacent, in behalf of the just Liberties of the free People of England, highly concerned in the journey against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn.

HUMBLY SHEWETH,

THAT if the manifold services, and extreme sufferings of Lieutenant-Col. John Lilburn, in opposition to tyranny and oppression, and how instrumental he hath been in the removal of dozens of oppressors, his wonderful deliverance, and clear acquittal by legal trials, from all former accusations, without the least stain to his reputation; if all these could be forgotten, and that he stood in our thoughts, but as a man of well-affected persons (and such at the least we must allow him, his rights as a citizen as Parliament), yet in your late proceedings against him, and heavy sentence upon him, we approached our native rights as much concerned, that we never conceived a greater cause of just application to you for redress, than upon this sad occasion.

For certainly it cannot be denied, but that he is really an offender, he is such by the breach of some Law, made and published before the fact, and caught by four pieces of Law, and verdict of twelve men, to be thereof convicted, and found guilty of such crime; unto which the Law also hath prescribed such a punishment agreeable to that fundamental Liberty, which Englishmen that no Freeman of England should be deprived of life, limb, liberty, or estate, but by Justice; a freedom where Parliament in all ages extended to preserve from violence, as the burning and chief inheritance of the people, as may appear most remark in the Petition of Rights, which you have thither, that most excellent Law.

And therefore we trust upon record thence (though the Parliament of England) you will be so far from being angry, as even have never set, nor our right of this our native right, and way of trials by Justice (for what is due unto any one, may be done unto everyone). But you will preserve them entire to us, and to posterity, from those persons interested in that would innovate upon them. And if the argument of the unhappy difference between Mr. Arthur Hylborne and Mr. Lilburn be any way divided (being as you are informed), it will appear, that Mr. Lilburn's is upon a more due to Mr. Lilburn, without any process, was the best occasion thereof.

And it is believed, that Mr. Prosser's cause (wherein Mr. Arthur Hylborne and Mr. Lilburn have been engaged) had at any time either at law or last been admitted to a trial at Law, and had passed away by verdict of twelve sworn men, all the troubles and inconveniences arising thereupon had been prevented: the way of due resolution by major votes of Commissioners, being neither to contain one to satisfaction in any case, as by way of Justice, the benefit of challenges and exceptions, and unanimous consent, being all essential privileges in the trial; with new Commissioners are not so to be considered, but are at liberty to be put out of countenance. Besides Justice, being brought in, and the other last new and temporary men do not, nor [as we humbly conceive] ever will acquiesce in the one as in the other; from whence it is not altogether so much to be wondered at, if upon difficulties, there have been such frequent granting of men's case, and dealings of Commissioners, as it hath been; and such harsh and insolent heats and expedients between justly unsatisfied, such sudden and importunate appeals to your authority, being made of all sides out of the true English mind, and kind, into nothing but trouble and perplexity, breeding hatred and enmities between worthy families, affronts and disgust between persons of the same publick affection and interest, and to the rejecting of true but publick advice. All which, and many more inconveniences, can only be avoided by referring all such cases to the usual trials and usual determinations of Law.

And whereas you have certain Mr. Lilburn break through the said grounds first, and perpetual banishment, and to do as he pleaseth in this, we are exceedingly afflicted in our spirits thereby, not only because he hath not in the usual way of trial by Jury, which yet again we much with us; nor for that we believe he hath followed Mr. Prosser's cause, out of strong persuasion of the justice thereof (the cause in itself, as we have been informed, being very intricate and hard to be understood, and to do not wilfully or intentionally carry it out against his conscience, face of the Commissioners willing to God it had therefore never come before them), nor for that we believe him innocent of any wilful breach of Parliament privilege, in delinquency printed Petitions, before the original was presented unto you (that being first by a private published, as he himself) the right all things add to our grief, yet the more of our affliction which from the difficulty, not of the best way in being therein contrary to that other our fundamental native right, which upon the contrary should have regard to the qualities of the person, a punishment being his wages, and a merchant his merchandise. Whereas this, if relating to his estate, we believe, is so far from preserving him in his quality, as that it leaves himself, his wife, and children, without subsistence; if in relation to his person, his affection to Parliament, and zeal to publick freedom, renders all foreign Nations to unsafe to him, as that in effect he is banished into a wilderness, and exposed naked to the fury of bears and lions.

The premises fully weighed, and for that (as you are informed) the parties accused and concerned have had no means for what report hath been made by the honorable Committee, nor have had the liberty of expressing themselves, in like cases granted, and in that many well-afflicted people that heard the debates, and evidences on both sides, are unsatisfied, both in point of position, and title to the colliery in question; that the house of Parliament may stand immaculate, our native fundamental rights inviolable, and all these gentlemen concerned in this cause left without any the least grudging, or just complaint;

We have desired ourselves bound in conscience in most humble manner to

- I. That you will be pleased to read your fore-mentioned grievous sentence upon Lieutenant-Col. John Lilburn, and the rest concerned therein.
- II. To give free Liberty to Mr. Prosser to prosecute his cause, both for title and possession at the Common Law, and therein to make use of what Counsel he shall think fit.
- III. That Sir Arthur Hylborne be released to take his course at Law, for whatsoever injuries committed to be done with him by Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburn, or any others, as was granted in Mr. Hylborne's case with the said Sir Arthur, and that Mr. Lilburn may any other way have the same liberty against Sir Arthur, if they conceive any cause.

After which, the said friends of mine drew up another, as they hoped, much more effectual than that last; and upon the Tuesday after, being Tuesday the 16th and 17th, next up with it to the Parliament-house, but could not a third day I told. Upon which I thought appropriate with that is handled at the same, as some believe in England in London, and the same evening, was a true Speaker of the Parliament, and told him, that on the morning, being Tuesday, I intended, by God's assistance, to take my journey to St. Sepulchre's, and therefore intended him to give me his Pass, but he told me, he did not see fit his journey gave me a Pass. Unto which I replied; Sir, that is very strange, that your House will command me, upon a day of death, to leave England by such a day, (which I am willing to do) and yet you will not give me by your Pass to begone. For unto which, it is very probable, when I come at the said day, your Officers of the Custom-house will stop me; and yet, because I am not gone out of England before this day, I must be hanged. What is this else, but to lay a curse for my life? For you

* This Petition showing the effects and necessities Lilburn was in among the People, and the sentiments these times had of his Cause, and the value they set on Truth by Justice, as the birthright of Englishmen, is the reason 'tis here inserted.

Mr. Recorder replied, Mr. Lilburne, we know of no such thing, the Records of the Acts of Parliament are at Windsor, in the Clerk of the Parliament's hands, and there you may have them.

Mr. Lilburne, Good Mr. Recorder, interrupt me not, but let me go on; I say, my Counsel tells me, I ought, as my right by Law, to have demanded Oyer of the said Act, Judgment and Crimes, and after I had been there under the Broad Seal of England, and heard them read in open Court, I ought, as my right by Law, to have demanded copies of them all three, and they ought not to have been denied me; that I might have been fully enabled all at once to have returned Exceptions as large as the Indictment, the Act upon which it is grounded, the Judgment upon which the Indictment, the Crimes, and the Crimes, which is the original of all. And if no legal Act can be produced, they tell me the Indictment, and all proceedings upon it, are void and null. And they also say, if no legal Judgment can be produced, they tell me the Act for the execution of it is null, and falls to the ground. And they also say, if no Crimes in Law can be produced upon which the Judgment is legally founded, all is at an end, because what is not good law found in its original in Law, can never be made by way of time; and what is not found and substantial in its foundations, can never be made to in its fabric or buildings. But yet, my Lord, they say it is not too late for me to say to still upon my right by Law: I confess, my Lord, there time would not permit other than to fly in the Tower, and draw me up the formal draught of such a claim, much less would it permit them to fly in Town till it was executed in parliament, that they might let these hands loose. But, my Lord, according to those legal instructions that I have lately received from my Counsel, I have got such a Paper formally in Law drawn up, and it is here attested in Parchment, and signed with my own hand. And, my Lord, I here tender it unto the Court, with two Billings as the Clerk's fee, to enter it upon Record at his peril. The Copy of which Parchment shall follow:

At the Sessions of Peace held for the City of London, at Justice-Hall in the Old-Bailly, now sitting this present 10th day of July, 1653.

The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by Authority of Parliament, against John Lilburne, now Prisoner at the Bar.

THE said John Lilburne, Gent. the now Prisoner at the Bar, supposed to be indicted by that name, brought to the Bar, and now appearing in person, having heard the said Indictment read in these words, to wit: Lilburne J. The Keepers of the Liberties of England, by authority of Parliament upon their oaths do protest, that in and by a Statute made in the Parliament of this Commonwealth of England, holden at Windsor in the County of Windsor, the 30th day of January, in the year of our Lord 1651, entitled, An Act for the Execution of a Judgment given in Parliament against Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburne, and it was enacted by the said Parliament, and by the authority of the same, That the said John Lilburne should (within twenty days, to be accounted from the 15th day of January, 1651), depart out of England, Scotland, Ireland, and the Islands, Territories, and Dominions thereof. And in case the said John Lilburne, at any time after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted as aforesaid, should be found, or should be remaining within England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, the said John Lilburne should be, and was thereby adjudged a Felon, and should be executed as a Felon, without benefit of Clergy.

And it was also enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all and every person and persons, who should, after the expiration of the said twenty days, knowingly receive, harbour, or conceal the said John Lilburne, he being in England, Scotland, Ireland, or within any of the Islands, Territories, or Dominions thereof, should be thereby adjudged accessory of Felony after the fact. And all Judges, Justices, Mayors, Bailiffs, Sheriffs, and all other Officers, as well military as civil, in their respective places, are thereby required to be aiding and assisting in apprehending the said John Lilburne, and in putting the said Act in due execution, as in and by the said Act of Parliament appears. And that the said John Lilburne, late of London, Gentleman, the Statute aforesaid due weighing, nor the punishments therein contained any way fearing, after the expiration of the said twenty days, to be accounted from the said 15th day of January, 1651, as aforesaid, so wit, the 15th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1653, was found, and was feloniously remaining within England aforesaid; that is to say, at London, to wit, in the Parish of St. Giles without Cripplegate, the Ward of Cripplegate, London aforesaid, against the form of the Statute aforesaid, and against the public Peace, &c.

SADLER.

Which being heard and read, be faith, that it appears by the said Indictment, that he stands indicted by the name of John Lilburne of London, Gentleman, by virtue of an Act of Parliament made the 30th day of January, 1651, grounded upon a supposed Judgment given in Parliament against him the said John, or one Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburne, for several crimes and misdemeanors therein contained. And therefore he the now Prisoner at the Bar, doth humbly pray Oyer, or hearing of the said Act, Judgment, and supposed Crimes mentioned in the said Act, according to Law, and under the Great Seal of England, to enable him to plead thereto. And he will ever pray for your Honours and Bench.

JOHN LILBURNE.

Which being handed into the Court, Mr. Recorder looked upon it, and said, Mr. Lilburne, this is not signed under your Counsel's hand; the thing that we expect, your Exceptions sign'd by your Counsel: what call you this Parchment?

Mr. Lilburne. I know not, Sir, what more properly to call it, than my legal demand of Oyer, or hearing in open Court the Act of Parliament upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the Crimes which is the foundation of all. And, Sir, let me tell you, my Counsel commands me to insist, and dwell upon the demand of Oyer as my right, and as the chiefest shield and buckler I have to defend my life. For they say, if no legal crimes can be produced upon which the Judgment was grounded, all is at an end, and there can be no more proceedings against me. And I am sure, there can be no felonious crimes in Law produced against me, for I never committed any in all my days, never was any legally so much as pretended to be laid upon my charge: therefore, my Lord, as my Birthright, and Inheritance, I demand the benefit of the Law, which is Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes. But the Recorder, the Lord Mayor, and several others endeavoured to interrupt him.

Whereupon he cried out again and again, My Lord, Rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, but let me have Oyer; which again and again I demand as my right, and inheritance. But four or five in the Court again interrupting him, was the Lord-Mayor, Mr. Recorder, the Attorney-General Produce, and mauling Mr. Hall, My Lord, Rob me not of my Birthright, the benefit of the Law, nor interrupt me not, but give me free liberty to speak for my life. And, my Lord, if you will be so audacious and unjust in the face of this great auditory of People, to deny me and rob me of all the relief of Justice and Right, and will forcibly stop my mouth, and not suffer me freely to speak for my life according to Law, I will cry out and appeal to the People and do cry out, and appeal to all the People that hear me this day, how that my Lord-Mayor, and the Court, by violence rob me of my Birthright by Law, and will not suffer me to speak for my life. At which the Court began with a great heat and rage. Mr. Recorder sent the Prisoner his parchment, and money out of the Court again; but he would have none of it, he commanded the Clerk again to restore it, and enter it upon Record at his Peril.

Mr. Attorney-General Produce being very busy to hold the Prisoner to questions to satisfy himself, as whether he was that John Lilburne meant, and intended in the Indictment and Act, or no, and to drive him off from passing his full demand of Oyer, which the Prisoner perceiving falls upon the said Mr. Produce to this effect:

My Lord,

I had thought the other day I had full enough to have silenced that Gentleman at this place; but, my Lord, being he will seek to deny, and speaking, I beseech you, my Lord, let me desire to be listened, and to know in what capacity that Gentleman is here at this place; for I am sure, my Lord, he is no Judge of the Law, nor no Counsel, and therefore cannot, as a Justice of Peace, sit upon the Bench as one of my Judges. And, my Lord, if he be my professor, as he is Attorney-General, he can be no more; and if so, my Lord, it is an amazement to me, that your Lordship and the Court will so disavow yourselves, as to suffer a bare Professor to sit amongst you upon the Bench, as one of the chiefest of you, with his hat on his head. My Lord, do what becomes you, and thrust him down to the Bar, and there let him (as I do) stand with his hat in his hands, and know his office and duty, and grace there. But, my Lord, whether he be as my Judge, or my Professor, he is as competent a man to be in either place, because, my Lord, he is legally an impeached Traitor, by one Esquire Elliot, now Prisoner in Newgate, who, my Lord, avows to me, that he hath great force, before the Lord Chief-Justice Rail, and the rest of the Judges of the Upper-Bench, legally and formally in Law exhibited a charge of High-Treason against him, which he avows the Court hath accepted of, and recorded as formal in Law, and required of him to enter into great bonds to prosecute it, and make it good: and, my Lord, here is a duplicate of the said charge of High-Treason, which the Esquire's own hand gave unto me as true copy. And besides, my Lord, he further vows to me, that the Attorney-General, by reason of his late power and grounds in Parliament, the said Attorney-General stands out in contempt, and from the law, and neither will, nor does answer his said charge of High-Treason; in which regard of his contempt of the Law of England, through his own acknowledged guilt thereby, he hath himself brought him at Law to be outlawed as a Traitor: which he avows, as soon as it is perished, whenever he can meet the said Attorney-General, and apprehend him, he will without any more ado execute him as a Traitor.

In all which regards, my Lord, I do avow Mr. Attorney-General, in Law, to be altogether incompetent, either for my Judge, or Professor, or any man's clerk whatsoever; or so much as to be at liberty, to converse with the honest and antient People of England till he hath yielded conformity to the Law, and answered to his said charge of High-Treason. Unto which Mr. Recorder seemed to make some answer in the Attorney-General's behalf (which the peasant before sat well hearing, cannot let down).

Mr. Recorder fell upon the Prisoner, and told him how he had trifled away the time of that Court, and had had more favour than any Prisoner ever had.

Mr. Lilburne endeavouring to reply, the Court rose and over again and again interrupted him; but he would go on, and crying out, said to this effect: Mr. Recorder, I wonder you are not ashamed to tax me with trifling away time, when it is only yourself and the Court that are truly guilty of it, in making me spend my lungs and my spirits for two or three days together, to plead and contend with you, before you would grant me that which is so absolutely my right by Law, as a Copy of my Indictment is: so that, Sir, with your favour, it is you that trifle away time, and not I. And whereas you say, I have had more favour than ever Prisoner had, I wonder, Mr. Recorder, you are not ashamed to say: for what favour at all have I had, when I have not yet enjoyed so much as the Law allows me? Sir, let me tell you, the learned men of the Law, the Lord Chief-Justice Rail, and the Judges of the King's or Upper-Bench, allowed the Lord Allegance, that arch bloody Irish Rebel and Traitor, who was indicted before them for his life, a thousand times more favour than you do me. For although his crimes were notoriously wicked, even in the eye of the common or known Law of England, and obvious and pernicious enough to the sight of every eye; yet when he made, as my information hath often told me, but one single exception in a parchment, or formally about his Personage, against his Indictment, the Judges allowed him to plead Counsel in the Law to plead it, and time enough for him and them to study and frame their Arguments in Law upon it.

Mr. Recorder. And, Mr. Lilburne, you tell us much of the advice your Counsel has given you about the Oyer, can you shew us their advice under their hands?—Lilburne. Yes, Sir, that I can.

Recorder

Recorder. Well, produce it.
Lilburn. Sir, do ye mean to the point of the Oyer?
Recorder. Yes.
Lilburn. Well then, Sir, it may be as to the pendillo of a word I have misheard you; but I am sure I have it under one of their hands, and two Witnesses at the Bar to depose it upon Oath, that the other expressly advised it, as the main official thing to my life and well-being.
Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, for all your pretence of integrity, the auditors may take notice, that you aver a falsehood in the open Court that you are not able to make good.

Mr. Lilburn. In the midst of those many and eager interruptions that I meet with from three or four of you at a time, it is easy for a stranger to mishear; so mine, to let a slip fall in the pendillo of a word, be Sir, to the utmost of my disparagement, and to advantage, make the worst of it you can; and for what it can amount unto. For in the first place, I do avow with my life, that I saw Mr. Nickery, with his own hand, write these very words upon the back of the Copy of the Indictment, which is here in my hands, and are as followeth:

Mr. Lilburn ought to see the Counters, and the Return of the Counters; and if the Act be certified without the Judgment, which is recited therein, as is recited for the Counters.

Mr. Stirk was pleased to spend some time upon cavilling at Mr. Lilburn's mispronouncing the word Counters, although he had formerly told the Recorder, he neither understood Latin, nor French, nor could will read either of them. And then he told them, that most Lawyers hands were very ill of to read by persons that were not well acquainted with them; but Sir, faith he, here is Mr. Nickery's own hand, and I do avow it upon my life for a truth, that my eyes saw it with mine hand and pen write it.

Finally, if my memory mislike not, I have Mr. Alford's hand to the same thing also. In those rudeness that Mr. Alford under his hand sent me, by my father and brother that day, both of whom are here present in Court, upon their Oaths to justify, that if it be not plainly expressed under his hand, that by word of mouth, it was the principal instruction he gave unto them, to give unto me to fulfill upon, as my right, to demand the Oyer, &c. But Sir, as for the paper itself, there it is, read it; which paper followeth in these words:

In fact, that John Lilburn the 15th of June 1653, was seized, and was feloniously remaining in England. This is sufficient, for it is not said that he was feloniously seized; felon the brief found in England is not said to be the felonious fact. Secondly, And was feloniously remaining; it should be said, was seized and there feloniously remaining. So there is no Felony charged by the brief found. There is no time charged of that which is said as a Felony. John Maynard, the 15th of July 1653.

And by way of postscript in the same hand, which are these words, That the Prisoner at the Bar is to be sure, that he may have Counsel to plead his Exceptions. And in the same paper, in somewhat a different hand, there are these very words, I pray the Oyer of the Act of Parliament the Indictment is grounded upon; pray read it upon Record, except of no Copy but the sight of the Record under the Great Seal. Which paper the Recorder reading, and seriously viewing, said, Mr. Lilburn, this paper will not reach your purpose; for those lines that seem to be Mr. Alford's, are not home to the thing in hand, and these lines that are for your purpose are in a quite different hand.

Mr. Lilburn. Well, Mr. Recorder, it matters not much, for I am sure the paper is not in the back of my writing; for I had it as it is from my brother, that I sent to Mr. Alford with my father about my business, and I am sure it either all is Mr. Alford's hand, or my brother's, who went down from the words of Mr. Alford's own mouth, these instructions that he gave unto him and my father for me to dwell and fulfill upon, and to venture and call my life upon. There they both are, I can administer unto them both their Oaths, that they may freely speak before the Court, what Mr. Alford laid unto them in this particular part about the Oyer, &c.

Whereupon all Mr. Richard Lilburn, the Prisoner's father, with his five or six in-law Mr. Thomas Gore, began to speak, and to justify what the Prisoner had alleged; that the Court interrupted them, and commanded them to be silent, and would not let them go on. But Mr. Recorder, taking liberty to speak as long and as often as he pleased, took the liberty several times to Cumulate, and reader address the Prisoner at the Bar, for availing a falsehood in the open Court; and so sometimes did the Lord Mayor also, although his Honor was pleased to show Mr. Lilburn a printed Petition a day or two before, and did solemnly in the face of all the Court avow, that the Woman, pointing to Mrs. Diermer, then a Prisoner at the Bar, had avowed that she had the said printed Petition, and address of the long kind, from Mr. Lilburn. Upon which the said Diermer openly cried out, That's false, my Lord, I never said any such thing in my life.

Upon this it was a curious barley-bush, that happened betwixt the Lord Mayor, Mr. Recorder, the Attorney-General, and summing Mr. Hall the Attorney of the Duchy, and Mr. Lilburn Prisoner at the Bar; Mr. Lilburn's father, and his brother-in-law Mr. Gore, and one Mr. Thomas Gore, but especially Mr. Thomas Priour, pressed to speak; but could not be permitted, but were again and again interrupted and silenced.

But Mr. Priour persisted hard on, and told the Lord Mayor to this purpose. That it was the known Law of England, that any by slander a husband might speak for the Prisoner's benefit at the Bar, especially when they apprehended the Prisoner was like to be wronged, and desired his vindication, the benefit of the Law; and this privilege, my Lord, by request of the Court, you have granted me, and other of Mr. Lilburn's friends, to come right to the Bar to speak in his behalf, when we find things wronged him against error and right; and therefore, my Lord, the thing that Mr. Lilburn demands about his Oyer, or hearing read the Act of Parliament, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and the Judgment upon which the Act is grounded, and the crimes that ought to be the original of all, is so essentially his right, that it is an encroachment to me to be denied; and also it is a wonder to me, that any man that pretends to know the very best Rudiments, or the very first footsteps of the Law, as Mr. Recorder doth, should endeavour to deny such a thing to the people, grounded in every ordinary Court of Justice, in the scale of every ordinary Bench and Hall that a suit is commenced upon.

The Court with violence and fury interrupting him, and silencing him; and Mr. Recorder commanding the Prisoner at the Bar to his peril to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late to receive them, and Mr. Hall mumbly proceeding again and again to gain favours of commendation upon him; and the Attorney-General upon the Bench, closely pressing to lead him to the point, and set the Prisoner have any elbow-room to go from it; and Mr. Law the Clerk of the Court, (like a most despicable Tyrant) pressing to gage the Prisoner at the Bar, that he should speak no more, and immediately put sentence of condemnation upon him, and take him away: the Prisoner clearly perceiving the violence and fury of the Court, with an exclamation, earnest, ardent and fierce, and shrill, loud voice, cried out,

My Lord, will you murder me without right of Law, by robbing me of my birthright, and denying out of Oyer, which is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins? My Lord, are you afraid, and shamed to produce that Act of Parliament upon which you pretend to ground your Indictment, upon which you would take away my life? My Lord, if you thus proceed, you will give me and the people cause to believe, that there never was such an Act of Parliament as you pretend, nor such a Judgment as it pretends to be the executor of; nor no such crime ever committed or acted, as any Judgment of Felony can be imagined to be grounded upon; but that rather all your proceedings against me, from first to last, is a malicious pack'd conspiracy against me to murder me, and without ground or cause to take away my life. For whose life have I feloniously taken away, or endangered? And if none of all these things in the Hall can be laid unto my charge, or never were, where is the act of Felony that I have committed, upon which I am endeavouring to be hanged?

But the Officers crying out, Hear the Court; and the said mumbly Mr. Hall flung his pitiful ill-timed song of praising for Judgment against the Prisoner; and so many of the Court fell upon him at once, to deliver in his Exceptions before it was too late, as made the proceedings of the Court full of confusion.

Mr. Lilburn. My Lord, I may not part with my Exception till my demand of Oyer be read. My Lord, mayest and honest Council, both of them, in both of whom I have found a great deal of faithfulness and truth to me, have commanded me to dwell upon my demand of Oyer, as upon my life, and as upon a thing that is my undoubted right by Law, that cannot, nor ought not to be denied me. My Lord, the security of my life lies in it; and it is to be assured me, I am for ever out of all danger of death, because it is possible you cannot produce one line of a legal Act of Parliament, nor one syllable of a legal Judgment, nor, I am sure of it, so much as any shadow of pretence of a legal crime of Felony to be the foundation of all; and of so, they tell me absolutely all your proceedings against me are at an end, and I am safe and secure. Therefore, my Lord, I again and again press, to leave the Court without excuse, and do demand before all their people Oyer, or hearing of the Act, Judgment and Crimes, upon which your Indictment is grounded, as a thing that is as much my right by Law, as the blood that runs in my veins; therefore, my Lord, deny it me not.

Mr. Lilburn, with the Recorder, it is late, and we cannot spend much more time about your business; and the Court had already told you, they neither will nor can receive in your petition for Oyer, without your Counsel's aid.

Mr. Lilburn. Alas, Sir, I have dealt faithfully and truly with you, and told you, that it is drawn up by their instructions; but really and truly they were both gone out of London, before pen could be put to paper to draw the rough draught of it; and therefore it was impossible to get their hands to the legged copy. Wherefore I beseech the Court to give me time but till Monday morning, and I will send after them for their hands; and engage not only to get their hands to the parchment, but to bring one or both of them to this Bar, to justify their instructions to me, and that their instructions are Law. Therefore, my Lord, be pleased to grant me but till Monday morning, and I will have them here, although I have not a hundred Conches with six horses a-piece to fetch them hence.

Lord Mayor. No, the Court breaks up to-night, and therefore we cannot give you till Monday.

Recorder. Mr. Lilburn, being you insist so strongly upon it for your Oyer, I will tell you what we will do with you: put in your Exceptions to-night, which you have under your Counsel's hands, and the Court will allow you that in such your Counsel at our next meeting about your business, will avow that your petition for the demand of Oyer is Law, and will grant it you; and your putting in your Exceptions now, shall be as prejudicial to you as any kind.

Mr. Lilburn understanding to speak, to close with him, several of his honest and true friends that stood by him, cried out, there was a leave laid out for him, and bid him rather die than go as inch from his Council's hands, just as he had taken instructions. At which the Court grew very angry, and judgment again began to be pressed against the Prisoner at the Bar; and the Court required the Exceptions, without any more ado, to be delivered in.

Mr. Lilburn. Well then, my Lord, seeing I have done my utmost to obtain my right by Law, which is to have the Oyer of the Act, Judgment, and Crimes, upon which the Indictment is grounded, and it will not be granted me, but the Court hath over-ruled me; therefore, my Lord, to let all the world know that I am no better, nor procreatorator of time, nor have any thing of gain, fear, or dread within me, although it be never so much to my wrong, and tend never so much to my apparent dishonour or ruin, I will close with Mr. Recorder, and immediately deliver in the Exceptions that I have as yet but already signed by my Council, as a part of my Exceptions, provided he will duly repeat over the promise of the Court, and enter it upon record in the Court's Books, and order the Clerk immediately to draw up an order upon it, as large as it is in itself, and give it me legally signed before I stir from the Bar.

Yes, faith Mr. Recorder Steele, Mr. Lilburn, the doing of what you require, would take up too much time, and therefore the Court doth not do it: but they will make read what I have said unto you.

Whereupon, Mr. Lilburn repeated what Mr. Recorder (in the name of the Court) had promised, and said, Sir, it is not this that the Court will stand to? Yes, faith the Recorder. Then, Sir, I believe you, in the audience of all these people, (that they may hear witness) against it over again yourself.

are several persons known and distinguished by the name of John Lilburne, of London, Gentleman. And for that the said John Lilburne, Prisoner at the Bar, does not acknowledge that he now is, or at the making of the said Act, or calling the said supposed Judgment, was a Lieutenant-Colonel; or that he could be entitled and distinguished by that title; let, the said John Lilburne, Prisoner at the Bar, cannot join any certain affidavit with the Keepers of the Liberties of England upon the said Indictment. For the said Indictment not asserting the said John Lilburne, now Prisoner at the Bar, to be the same Person, and not other, or diversify from that John Lilburne, intended and meant in the said Act, and distinguished from all others of the same name, by the title of a Lieutenant-Colonel; if the Prisoner at the Bar should plead the general issue of Not guilty, he should entitle himself to be the same John Lilburne, intended by the said Act, else he is not concerned to plead to the said Indictment. And by consequence, if the Prisoner at the Bar should plead Not guilty to the said Indictment, the only issue to be tried in point of fact between the Keepers of the Liberties of England and the Prisoner would be, whether John Lilburne, Prisoner at the Bar, was found in England, upon the 15th day of June, 1653; and by consequence, the Prisoner at the Bar, though he be not the person intended by the said Act, might be entailed and condemned as a Felon, only because his name is John Lilburne; and if any other John Lilburne should in like manner plead to the said Indictment, he should suffer, because he is called John Lilburne.

For all which errors and insufficiencies in the Law, in the said Indictment, Act, and supposed Judgment, appearing, the said John Lilburne, Prisoner at the Bar, humbly prays, that the said Indictment may be quashed, and in case the honorable Court be not fully satisfied in the said errors and insufficiencies of the said Indictment, he prays that Counsel learned in the Law may be assigned him, and a competent time given for him to advise with them, and for them to prepare their arguments upon all the said matters of Law. And that the case being of very great difficulty, and much concernment to the liberty of all the people of England, and being a case without any precedent; and the facting or spurning of innocent blood, depending upon a resolution thereof; he humbly prays, that the said difficult points of Law, arising upon the case, may be argued before the renowned Judges of the Law, so hath been accustomed in such cases, that their opinion may be had thereupon.

Signed John Newbury, John Maynard; and presented to, and accepted by the Lord-Mayor, and the honorable Bench, July 16, 1653.

JOHN LILBURNE.

But the Court being eager to see the Exceptions, the Cryer commanded silence, and to hear the Court, who had commanded their Clerk with a low voice to read them the title of the Exceptions amongst themselves. Whereupon, as soon as the Prisoner at the Bar perceived the Court had heard the title, he desired them to read them all over with an audible voice. But without, my Lord, said he, I beseech you and the Court to take notice, that they are but part of my Exceptions, which the Court hath forced, and compelled me to deliver in.

At which the Lord-Mayor was very angry, and said, Mr. Lilburne, you are very much to blame, thus to abuse and scandalize the Court, so saying we have compelled you; you may take your Exceptions again, if you are not free to deliver them in. Give him them again.

Lilburne, No, my Lord, I will have none of them; for being they are in, they are in; and I will stand to them, and maintain them with my life. And I hope, and doubt not but my hazell and learned Counsel will back them with strong and unrefutable arguments of Law. But, my Lord, hereafter I shall endeavour to keep the Court close to their points, made unto me by their mouth, Mr. Recorder, about the Oyer: for, my Lord, here are witnifles enough of it. But, my Lord, whereas you say I have abused the Court, in declaring that they forced and compelled me to deliver in my Exceptions; my Lord, I absolutely deny it, that that statement is any abuse at all to the Court. You know, my Lord, you have over-ruled me in point of reading my Exceptions about the Oyer, and you have compelled me to deliver in my Exceptions to the Indictment, which you know I have asserted by Law, I ought not to be compelled to, till I have received the Oyer: so that, my Lord, I must yet aver, that in the eye of the Law you have committed a force and compulsion upon me. But, my Lord, I have done with it.

They then came on in reading the beginning of the Exceptions; which (an observant man might easily see) did very much trouble both the Lord-Mayor and the Recorder. But the Prisoner withdrew; and by several of those that sat nigh the Lord-Mayor and Recorder then he stood, he was certainly informed that the Attorney-General Procurator, who sat upon the Bench, although he would not speak much openly and publicly, yet he constantly, in a whispering or clandestine way, gave the Court in keep the Prisoner at the Bar to the question, Whether do you say John Lilburne was in the Act or not? and to give him so elbow-room to let him get off it: And that Mr. Alderman Arden was in a private right condition, when the Prisoner appealed to the people against their injustice. And that the pious Alderman most lamentably cried out to Counsel Oyer, precisely to find for some troops of berles, to secure his worshipful person. And that Mr. Lee, the Clerk, was extremely fearful to have the Prisoner gaged at the Bar, that he should speak no more; and privately perswaded every ad, immediately to have him condemned and taken away. And that the Lord-Mayor, at the reading of the title, in which the Act is called, A pretended Act of Parliament, said unto the Recorder, We are undone, if we receive in this, for we shall be assigned betrayers of our craft. And at the reading the first Exception, the Recorder was moved, and said, he wondered how Mr. Lilburne could get learned men in the Law to sign such Exceptions. And the Lord-Mayor asking him, what that Mr. Newbury was, whose hand was first to the Exceptions; the Recorder told him, he had lately been a Judge in Wales. My Lord, I do not so much wonder at his setting his hand to the Exceptions (for I have known him for many years to be a man of principles something in affinity to Mr. Lilburne); but for Mr. John Maynard, one of the greatest Lawyers of England, and one of the greatest practitioners of the Nation, for him to set his hand to such Exceptions, is that (my Lord) amaze me.

VOL. VII.

For if this very fifth Exception of Mr. Lilburne be good in Law, then all the late Acts of Parliament are totally invalidated, as well as that which he speaks against.

Then the Court broke up.

Notwithstanding the stiffest enquiry, we can't find that Lilburne, or his friends, at any one, else, ever published the remainder of his Trial. Mr. Winckler, in his Memorials of the English affairs, p. 560, says no more than this:

July 13, 1653, Lieut. Col. Lilburne was arraigned at the Sessions in the Old-Bailie, upon the late Act for his Banishment.

July 14, Locut. Col. Lilburne was brought again to his Trial, but he could for further time in regard the Council assigned him refused to appear for him; only Serjeant Maynard, who was sick; and he had an order for a Copy of his Indictment.

July 17, 1653 Lilburne was brought to his Trial, but nothing done in his behalf; and page 563, says, Aug. 11. Lilburne's Trial proceeded at the Sessions-house.

26. Mr. Lilburne's Trial at the Sessions-house proceeded.

30. The Jury found Lilburne not guilty; he pleaded long for himself.

Nothing of their three last days Proceedings are printed.

In a Book, entitled Lieut. Col. John Lilburne's Trial and Capt. or his Capt and Craft discovered, 4to, 1653, is recited some of his speeches at his Trial, and Answered thereon; which shows that the Colonel made a notable Defence. His Speeches, as mentioned in that Book, page 125, &c. are as follow.

Concerning the Act whereupon he was indicted, this he said; It was a bye and a sidelong: an Act that hath no reason in it, no Law for it; it was done at Pleasch ad, resolved upon the question, that all the male children should be murdered. That if he died upon this Act, he died upon the same force that Abel died, being murdered by Cain. That the Act was a void Act, a ground thing, their being no one possible or elastic in it, grounded on the Law of England, and that it was an unjust, unrighteous, and treacherous Act, and that he doubted not to shatter that Act in pieces. That they could not make an Act of Parliament, since the King's Head was cut off.

By the same Law they voted him to death, they might vote his banishment twice for ever.

He said, The Parliament before the King's Head was cut off, and the Members taken out, were, in their purity, a perfect Parliament, who were tender of the liberties and welfare of the Nation, and walked in the steps of their ancestors and fore-fathers, then were the days of their vigourity, they made good and righteous Laws, and then they had no force upon them. But here 1640, and 1641, there have been no good Laws made.

He affirms, that it was no lawful Parliament, that made that Act. Again, the Parliament that made this Act of Banishment was no Parliament, I will prove it: And the Parliament was rather nascent than a Parliament, as the Parliament legal, they had no power to bind for me. If there was any Judiciary in Parliament, it was the Lords House, not the Commons.

As for all Parliaments in general, he said Parliaments were a delegated Power, and ought to give a shakin of all they do; and that it was not in their power, (as he had proved in his Plea at large, before the Lord Chief Justice Robt and Mr. Justice Bass, May 11, 1653, I use but they the least jurisdiction, to sentence him, or any of the least free-born Englishmen, unless it be their own Members. That all crimes whatever were to be heard, determined, and judged at the Common-Law, and so where else. Acts of Assembly were not lawful.

Speaking to the Lord-Mayor; This is the strangest thing (saith he) that ever I saw, that a man must be charged of his life. Good my Lord-Mayor, you have made yourself a party in my case, and taken a wrong John Lilburne; and if you do not make me hang, you are at risk of yourself. You make the said John under your brethren and oppressors; I desire you not to deny me any right, that I may not lose my life in the relief of a question. That John Lilburne shall be hanged, which in time may come to murder your posterity, and the posterity of those that hate me this day.

He said the Lord Justice, that he had nothing to do to judge him, being a party, and had a salary of a thousand pounds for service from the State.

To Mr. Procurator, Attorney-General, he said, You are a blood-thirsty man, and you come here to justify your unrighteous Act; and I hope the Jury will take notice of all your violence. It is the administration of my soul, that he should be a Judge in his own case; to have a Man sit as my Judge that thirsteth after my blood.

He said, that the army (many of them) have been very good instruments for the good of the Nation, to deliver us from Tyranny: I wish there was not greater thank they delivered us from.

For the Jury, he called them his honorable Jury, and said they were the Keepers of the Liberties of England; and will make it appear that the Jury are the Judges of the Law, as well as of the Fact.

Moreover, he charged them to consider, whether it is die on the Affinity, the Parliament on Tuesday stay not pass such a sentence against every one of you Twelve; and upon your wives and children, and all your relations; and then upon the neck of this City, and then upon the whole County of Middlesex, and then upon Hertfordshire, and so by degrees there be no people to inhabit England, but themselves!

I call Yehovah to witness (saith he), and do here protest before God, Angels and Men, I am not the person intended to be banished by that Act, because of the Act, whereupon he was indicted.

The Jury having acquitted him, were summoned before the Council of State, on the 23d of August, 1653, in pursuance of an order of Parliament, of the 21th, to answer for their conduct.

The examination of which Jury is printed in State-Trial, Vol. I, page 81, &c. Ad. 1770, after his Trial at Grindall in 1649, for High-Treason, to which the Reader is referred. But for what regard the examination of his Jury in 1653 is there inserted (having no relation to that Trial) would be difficult to tell.

XXV.

XXVII. The Trial of MILES SINDERCOME, alias FISH, at the Upper-Bench, Westminster, Feb. 9, 1656. for High-Treason.

Before the Lord Chief-Justice Glynne, and Mr. Justice Warburton.

JANUARY 1656. Miles Sindercome was committed close Prisoner to the Tower in London, for a High-Treason; and Sir John Barkland, Knight, Lieutenant of the Tower, gave order to Mr. David Sore, one of the Wardens of the Tower, to be his Keeper, with strict orders from the Lieutenant to be most careful of him. But Mr. Sore perceiving the deportments of an indignation, by many violent and threatening speeches, which he often used, acquainted Sir John Barkland therewith, and desired more assistance, as well for the security of his own Person, as of the said Prisoner. Wherefore, from that time forth, a guard of a Captain Officer and Soldiers, were ordered to assist the said Keeper, and secure the Prisoner. So that Sindercome finding no means possible for him to make an escape by his hands, endeavored afterwards to corrupt his Keeper, offering him two hundred pounds, or as much as his place should be worth, to assist him in making his escape; and desired him, if he would undertake the matter, to furnish him with a black suit of clothes, a pike, and a sword dagger, to pass him through the Water-gate, within the Tower, and said, that then he would trouble him no further, but kill any man that should oppose him in going. But his Keeper faithfully discharging his trust, not only refused this proffer, but acquainted the Lieutenant therewith, who was therefore more vigilant and careful for his security. His Officers and Soldiers that daily attended in his chamber with him, would often advise him to make his peace with God, and to look after the eternal comfort of his Soul; which discourse he would always divert by the laughing or by an insolent and scornful, and how many he had slain while he was a Soldier, boasting greatly thereof, and of his knowledge in the Law of this Nation: And would often say, That he doubted not to make a very good divorce, if he might be tried by a Jury, according to the ancient Law of England, and to come off as well as John Lambert.

February 6, 1656. Miles Sindercome had notice of his Trial to be the next Monday following, and had liberty given to prepare himself for it; and for that purpose to send for, and converse with, what persons he would; and to have the use of pen, ink, and paper, and to write as he pleased; which he had, and did use accordingly.

February 9, 1656. Sindercome was brought to his Trial at the Upper-Bench Bar in Westminster-hall, the particulars whereof are as follow.

The Indictment was for High-Treason, to this effect, viz.

THAT Miles Sindercome, alias Fish, and one William Boyes, with divers other Rebels and Treitors, against the Lord Protector, and Government of the Commonwealth, not having the fear of God in their hearts, but moved and incited by the instigation of the Devil, as the 17th of September, 1655, and divers other days and times, as well before as after, at Westminster, and divers other places in the County of Middlesex, falsely, maliciously and traitorously did conspire, compass, and imagine the death of the said Lord Protector; and to subvert and alter the Government of the Commonwealth, and to raise War within the same.

For effecting whereof,

1. They took a crew in the House of one Edward Hilton, and divers crews in the House of one James Middlemore, in Westminster; whereby they brought Guns, Hand-bullets and Pistols, charged with leaden Bullets, and iron Sights, as shot, Rills and powder him.
2. January 1, 1656. They provided Horsemanship and Weapons of War, and,
3. Took a house and banqueting-house at Hammanmith, of one Henry Budy, for the same purpose.
4. January 9, 1656. They conspired to have Whitehall, where his Highness was in his own person; and that they brought a loaded Wind with Musk, Arquebuses, Gascoignes, and other considerable Stuff and Materials, and set the same on fire in the Chapel there, to the great danger and discomfiture of his Highness, and of example of others, in contempt of the Laws, against their due obedience to his Highness and Government, against the Peace, and form of the Statute, &c.

Thus far the Indictment.

Whereupon being serjeanted, he pleaded Not Guilty, and for his Trial put himself upon his Country; and the issue being joined, there was immediately impanelled a Jury of Gentlemen of worth and quality to pass upon his Life and Death; he challenged several of them; and twelve being sworn (with his own consent), his Highness's Attorney-General (the Indictment being opened) proceeded to the Evidence, which was very full and clear, and two Witnesses at the last to all the points of the Indictment, with many aggravating circumstances: the particulars whereof are herein after mentioned.

The Evidence to prove the Indictment

THERE was one Tyege of his Highness's Life-guard, who was drawn into the business, and he proved fully, 1. What person Sindercome is; how he invited him, the said Tyege, was drawn in house, and received of money, and great preferment, to join with him to murder his Highness; saying, Spain could never obtain a peace with us, till he were taken out of the way. 2. The circumstances of time, place, means and manner designed for this murder. 3. That he, the said Tyege, was to give notice when his Highness went forth; and at what end of the Church he sat. 4. Their buying and keeping of best horses. 5. Their intent to fire Whitehall, the fire-work placed in the Chapel, and other circumstances. 6. Sindercome's resolution, if the fire did not take, to kill the Protector, whatever came of it.

Also one John Gird proved the whole design of Sindercome and Boyes, how long it was in hand; that Sindercome engaged him, the said Gird, in it; what words were said, how it should be done; what the consequence of the murder would be; the money provided, and that when it should have been done, he, the said Gird, was designed to go to Lord Saye, and to share with Sindercome in his honour and profit. That the first thing agreed on, was to provide good horses. What money was paid by Sindercome; Sindercome's resolution to assassinate his Highness when he went abroad; and the manner how. That they were upon the road five or six times on purpose; and in Hyde-park with swords, and pistols charged, and had notice given them by Tyege of his Highness's coming. That the hinges of Hyde-park Gate were filed off, in order to their escape. That they took an house with a banqueting-house at Hammanmith, to entertain him with Guns, made on purpose to carry ten or twelve bullets at a time. That Tyege was to give notice of his Highness's passing that way, and as he rode out of the Church he sat. That he, the said Gird, saw one of the Guns provided, which would carry twelve carbine bullets and a flag. He spoke fully to the design of firing Whitehall, described the fire-work prepared, and the nature and intention it, and other circumstances. Moreover, that Boyes said to them, that when the Protector should be dispatched, forces would come from Spain and Flanders, and a great part of the Fleet would fall off. And that he believed Saye to be the main agent herein at Bristol &c. He proved also the discourse Boyes had about leaving Parliament, or some other part in the West, and of a great fear for that purpose. That thirty or forty are engaged in this design to kill the Protector, and it was ordered, that not above two should know each other, until the matter should be ripe for execution; and that Boyes knew the whole sumbar.

He spoke fully to that design to kill his Highness the full day of the Parliament, and then taking horse for that purpose at Westminster; and bringing arms thither, and other circumstances.

That Boyes goes by several names, and in several habits; sometimes as a poor Priest in ragged clothes, sometimes well clad as a Gentleman.

It was further proved by the said John Gird, and Col. James Middlemore, that in order to the destroying of his Highness, he, the said Gird, Sindercome, and Boyes, took the said Middlemore's house near the Abbey at Westminster; and when they took it, Sindercome called himself John Fish, Clerk to one Mr. Hewson, a pretended Gentleman of Norfolk; and Gird went by the name of Mr. Hewson's Coachman.

It was proved likewise, that the last day of the Parliament, after they had taken Middlemore's house, by being there, Sindercome and Gird went thither to him, from one Edward Hilton, a Scotchman's house in King-street Westminster, where they left a great trunk full of arms, brought from Flanders; and carried with them in a viol-case, one arquebuse, and some pistols, charged with leaden bullets, and flints, about German-time, to Middlemore's house; which they found very convenient for their purpose, and refused to buy it, and to build a room in the yard next the street; there being several back-yards and doers; and refused also to secure Middlemore, or otherwise to deal with him that he might not discover them, nor hinder their design.

It was proved, moreover, by Cecil and Middlemore, that Sermon being ended, all three of them, viz. he, the said Gird, Sindercome, and Boyes, went into the yard of the house next the Abbey, to thrust his Highness, as he pulled from the Abbey to meet the Parliament in the painted Chamber; (the

* The principal Person employed in the treasonable design, for the destruction of his Highness's Person, was a notable desperate Fellow, named Trevelyan, one who before there had been a Quarter-Master either under Sir John Reynolds in the Army, and was about two years ago called off by General Monk, among others in London. He attempted to murder one Gird, and many others were engaged in the Design. For the carrying on their work, they had correspondence with James Sindercome, received directions thence from him. In June, and in the month of July, 1655, he came into London, and lived in the house of one Mr. Hewson, with which they were acquainted to proceed. See a Brief Relation of the late dangerous Plot. Printed in a further Narrative of the Plot of the late Times in the Commonwealth of England, pag. 7.

† In Col. Richard Jones's Narrative, which he delivered to Sir John Barkland, Lieutenant of the Tower, Oct. 20, 1657, printed in a further Narrative of the Plot of the late Times in the Commonwealth of England, pag. 21. he says, "Sir John, I beg to tell you, that I am partly of the whole business of Sindercome, as to the design of killing the Lord Protector, &c. and to that purpose I brought Sindercome with about good. In money, and also with Arms, and told him so. Expectation, that he should not retract the design." And further he said, "The Letters they bore of mine, they could not prove them to be mine, but by my own Conscience, which I now confess, and acknowledge that they are mine. And that I was with Sindercome, and acquainted him, that I was an enemy to the Lord Protector; and I also declare that I received a large sum of money from the Sindercome to carry on my said design, and to make what Confession I could in England, by endeavouring the killing of the Lord Protector, and by so on said for that in design; and to the said letter to effect it, I came into England on a disguised Habit, and as a free provided as positive on others as the said design." And again he says, "That he was the only man, that said to Sindercome to kill the Lord Protector; and that Sindercome, called King as Lord, did, he proved, and to do he was full of that judgment; yet still, he was both faithfully and knavishly close in that Book to charge the Lieutenant of the Tower teaching Sindercome's Death." The Col. sends also a Prisoner in the Tower, Feb. 23, 1657.

‡ This Sindercome had received, his Friends sent in Sweden, and would have engaged the said Mr. Gird thence also.

§ Miles desired fully concerning the Viol-case and Trunk of Arms.

and to that end, he, the said Crail stood on the wall with his pistol charged, and Sindwene walked in the yard, but other company coming in thicker, they were prevented, and Byss went out of the yard into the throng of people.

It was further proved by Crail, that this enterprise not succeeding, they resolved to murder his Highness's men on their way, to wit, to furnish themselves with their horses, to kill him as he rode forth. That Sindwene engaged Topsy, who constantly gave him notice of the Lads going along ahead, or of the fiddling of the Pal Nags.

That the first time they rode forth to kill him, was the latter end of September last (viz.) the Saturday after he had left going to Hammer-smith.

That the second time was when he rode to Kingsgate, and thence, the back way to London.

The third time, when he went to Hyde-park in his Coach.

The fourth time, when he went to Trafalgar-Green, and so by Abbe home; at which time they rode forth to kill him, and resolved to break through all difficulties to effect it.

The fifth time, when he rode into Hyde-park, where his Highness's alighting, after him, the said Crail, whole horse that was he rode on, Sindwene being then on the out-side of the Parl, and then Crail was ready to have done it, but doubted his horse, having at that time got a cold.

That Sindwene rode forth once himself to kill his Highness, and told Crail of it.

That all proving ineffectual, they resolved to defile till the Spring, and in the mean time to live Whithall.

That the said Crail put on a new holland shirt, and thin clothes, for his better escape, when he rode forth to kill his Highness, and prepared his horse as if he had been to run a race.

To prove the taking of the house and banqueting-house at Hammer-smith, of Henry Byss, Coachman to the Earl of Salisbury, there was before Crail, the testimony of Henry Byss himself, William Page, and William Nash, Sindwene's servants.

To prove the burial of Byss for firing the Chapel, there was the testimony of Crail and Topsy, and others who were persons of quality.

To prove the buying and keeping of the horses, there was the testimony of Henry Byss, who told them one horse for fourscore pounds; also William Page, and William Nash, Sindwene's servants.

To prove the kinging of Hyde-park gate being filed off, and the gates cut, there was the testimony of John Crail, and Thomas Skill.

The Prisoner being the Evidence to clear himself, had nothing material to say for himself by way of defence, yet carried himself very insolent at the bar, and when the Court asked him touching any of the matters proved against him, he would confidently deny what was laid to his charge. And after all the Evidence given, and the Prisoner heard what he had to say for himself, the Court summed up the whole to the Jury of Life and Death, and declared, that by the Common Law, to conspire or imagine the death of the chief Magistrate of the Land, by what name soever he was called, whether Lord-Provost or otherwise, is High-Treason; he being the chief Magistrate, and the Spring of Justice, in whose name all Writs run, all Commissions and Grants are made; and that the Statute of Treason made 25 Ed. III. as to this, did only declare what the Common Law was before the making of that Statute, and was not interdictive of a new Law; and more to that effect; and then proceeded to Judgment against the Prisoner in this manner.

THE SENTENCE.

IT is considered by the Court, that the said Miles Sindwene, alias Pith, is first from hence to the Prison in the Tower of London, from whence he came, and from thence to die upon a scaffold before the Jews of London in Tyburn; where to be hanged on the Gallows until he be dead, and then to be cut down, and his entrails and bowels taken out, and burnt in his own sight, and his body divided into four quarters, and be disposed of as his Highness the Lord-Provost shall think fit.

The same day, after he was brought back again to the Tower, he was much changed, and in a great passion, his Keeper, and Edmund Herriot, one of his Sisters, being in the chamber with him, he did swear, That they should never know his life; and then desired his Keeper to help him to force poison, that he might make away himself, which he refusing, Sindwene then desired his Sister to buy him some for the same purpose. But the crying at this point, gave him no answer; but taking her opportunity (when the Keeper did not so much mind them) had some private discourse with him (which cannot be known what it was about). Presently after, his said Sister left him, and before her going, spoke to his Keeper, saying, Lord, what shall I do? Did you hear what my Brother said of the Poison? Thereupon, the Keeper charged her not to bring him any, telling her, if his Brother were poisoned in his house, he would accuse her for afflicting him in it.

The Lieutenant of the Tower then being fully acquainted with the desperation of Sindwene, commanded a file of Soldiers to watch in the room below his chamber, and a Guard of Officers to be with him in his chamber, that all means for the making his escape might be prevented.

Sindwene the same day endeavoured to corrupt his Keeper, as formerly, and with much somewhat prettily him to be helpful to him in his greatest distress; and asked, if it were not possible for him to make an escape, telling him, if he would assist him in it, he would make good to him two hundred pounds that night; and if he would go along with him, he would make three hundred pounds, seven hundred pounds, or what more he should desire, further recompensing him to furnish him with a black suit, peruke, and dagger, for that purpose. But by reason that the Officers were then in the chamber with him, he had not liberty to freely to discourse with his Keeper about this business as he desired, and therefore earnestly desired the said Guard of Officers, and all in the chamber with him, to withdraw; in which time he wrote and delivered privately to his Keeper a note, whereof the next following words is a copy:

Mr. Steer,

YOU for my condition, it is no time to dally with it; I have already provided two hundred pounds for you; and if you will let me make my escape, and that you will go with me, or for me, I will give you, were it five hundred pounds more, I do not care. If you will do any thing, let me know your mind; I hope God will work my deliverance by your means; let me have your pardon; that we may conclude for if you and I conclude, I will have other clothes brought into the room below, with a torse, and I will take up a board (meaning, as it is conceived, one of the boards of his chamber, to go down into the room below it, where his black clothes should lie; though thence he would have been frustrated, by reason of the file of Soldiers, which the Lieutenant had commanded to watch there; and I do judge that must be the way. For God's sake do what you can, and do not distrust my not performing to give you the money; for I can this night order you two hundred pounds to any body that you shall appoint: but if you should—

You may observe, that the reason of his breaking off so abruptly, was, that the Guard of Officers, whom he had for that time desired to withdraw, finding that he made them stay somewhat longer than ordinary, prettily upon him, so that he had not time to write further. His Keeper for answer, endeavored to take him off from these thoughts, telling him the impossibility of it, and desired him to consider his present condition, and prepare himself for another world; whereupon Sindwene finding he could no ways prevail, made these things no more afterwards.

From which time, several pious and able Divines, some of which were appointed by his Highness, and others that were desired by the Lieutenant of the Tower, daily came to him; as Mr. George Griffith, Mr. Thomas Brooks, Mr. John Hodge, Mr. Sizer, Mr. Barker, and others. But before they or any others entered into discourse with him, he would were all questioning of him about the business for which he was condemned: they laboured much with him for his soul's good, but with no satisfaction to the greatest part, and with very little to others of them; he having before declared his judgment, or rather opinion, by reason of his inconsistency and unbeliefness in them, sometimes owning the universal pain of redemption; at other times, that the devil did with the body, or spirit with the body till the Resurrection, and then it was it should rise; that is, the great Hell was now, with several other desirable ones. And indeed there is scarce any erroneous opinion known in our times, that he had not a general notion of, and would pretend unto. In several of his discourses with those Ministers, he would not hear but that Judas was in as good a condition as Peter; and of that in the words of John, v. 12. where Christ saith, While I was with them in the world, I kept them in my name, that they should not die; and now of them is left but the Son of Perdition, that the Son of man might be glorified: he would say, it was meant to all men, who as they were sinners, were Sons of destruction and perdition. And as to that Text, speaking of the disciples, which faith, one of them was a Devil; he would baffle and say, it was a rugged and harsh saying. He would often put it as a case to them, whether for any person to contrive the death of another, and not to let it, were punishable by man? And being as often refused, and told of the Laws made in that case; he would answer, that which they alleged was his Law of man, and that Thoughts were not to be punished by man, but God who alone knew them.

Friday 13th of February.

Afterwards he had notice given him, that the next day was appointed for his Execution; and about eight o'clock that night, the Guard of Officers in his chamber, were Captain Henry Sharp, Captain-Lieutenant William Pither, Ensign Philip Brown, Sergeant Nicolaus, and his said Keeper. And presently after they came into the chamber, three Women came to him, two whereof were Sindwene's Sisters, and the other most of all to be his Sweetheart, who expelled trouble and sorrow, lamenting his condition. And one of his said Sisters, named Elizabeth Herriot, told him, She had rather go home to her father's house, than that he should be so long as a death as was intended him, or so that effect; whereupon the Officers minding her expressions, took what care they could to prevent her in giving him any thing, and as soon as the said Women were gone carefully searched the room. Then Sindwene desired the Officers and his Keeper to withdraw, that he might be private; in which privacy, he continued about a quarter of an hour, then came to the chamber-door, saying to the said Officers that stood without, They might come in, for he had now done; which words being not usual with him, were observed by most of them. The first that went in, found him rubbing his hands with his handkerchief, and wiping his nose and moistening his mouth, and he walked a pace or two about the room, and then took the Bible, and sat down reading therein. A while after he stood up suddenly, saying, He would go to bed; and thereabout he walked himself, and went into his bed. The said Guard of Officers in his chamber, being then discoursing together, Sindwene (a quarter of an hour after he had lain full) discoursed very freely with them of what they were talking. About which instant of time, orders were sent from Sir John Berkeley, to the said Officers, to be careful that he should not make away himself by poison, in regard it was the last night he was to be there; and they should diligently search all places of his chamber, and about his bed to prevent it. But presently after, Sindwene fell asleep (as was thought), and snoring somewhat unusually, one of the Officers desired his Keeper to take a candle and look upon him, whether he did, and found him almost dead there, which proved their further terror. Whereupon a Surgeon was immediately sent for, who applied medicines to him; notwithstanding which, after he had continued in that condition speechless about two hours, he died.

February

* Mr. Herriot, in his Memorials, Page 64. Feb. 9. 1646. Sindwene was tried at the Upper-Bench Bar, found guilty, and condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered. The Court decreed, That the Lieutenant Lord in camp, as was the Duke of the Chief Magistrate, by what means he was so called, whether Lord-Provost, or otherwise, is a High-Treason, and that the Statute at Edw. III. was only declaratory of the Common Law.

† Sindwene had been an Apprentice to a Churchman, near St. Caroline's at the Tower, and it is probable had more than ordinary knowledge of Protestant.
‡ Lord Caroline, in his History of the Revolution, Vol. III. Part 2. (viz. Edmund Page 447, 448, says, Sindwene was a very stout Man, and was who had been much in his (Common) law's office, and who had been an attorney, he was wonderful and unaccountable. Accordingly, being disappointed in the manner he made him to kill him, and that Crail was so called him to be apprehended; his behaviour was so strange in his Examination and Trial, as if he thought he should still be able to do it; and it was minded that he had

February 14, 1636.

The Court being assembled, consisting of Merchants, and other substantial Householders of the Parish of St. Martin in the Liberties, were in charge to inquire of the manner of Sindercome's death, which they diligently attended; and all such witnesses as could speak materially thereunto were examined by the Court. And although there were then very strong presumptions that he had poisoned himself, yet in regard the Surgeons, who had then only opened his body, and having no usual symptoms accompanying the taking of that poison, could not positively deliver their opinion, otherwise than hereunto in expresse, the Jury deferred the giving up their verdict till the next following.

The next day afterwards, at the desire of the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir Richard Nepeur, Doctor of Physick, and Doctor Fries, Reader of Anatomy at Gresham College, opened Sindercome's head, and gave their opinion thereof also. Which was likewise afterward viewed by Mr. Charles Stamford, Mr. Nicholas Brewhar, Wardens to the Company of Surgeons, and Mr. Lawrence Lee; all able and knowing persons in their profession, which remain with the said Coroner under their hands.

February 14, 1636.

Being then desired by Sir John Brouncker, Knt. Lieutenant of the Tower, to (in the head of Miles Sindercome) opened, his body having been opened before our coming by the Surgeons, and to give him our observation and sense thereof.

WE found the Brain much inflamed, red, and distended with blood, as full as full as the skull could well hold; besides much greenish and bloody blood out of the Ventricle, which was the effect of some very violent and preternatural cause. Yet we are not able positively to determine what that is, or whether it did poison, the matter being much more subtle and of a subtler sort than of Apoplexy, and after longer dissection of the Brain, except some confusedly, and other the like can ordinary venous.

Richard Napier,
Christopher Fenn.

WE, whose names are here subscribed, being desired to open the body of Miles Sindercome, Prisoner in the Tower of London, do hereby declare, according to the best of our judgments and experience, that we could not find out or discover any, the usual or common symptoms or effects, accompanying the taking of poison and those poisons causing sudden death, but by the distension and swelling of the Brain, and Puffs in the Head, with much coagulated blood which we found there, more than is ordinary effects, nor opinions are, that the said Prisoner hath enjoyed the same by some extraordinary means, for the heightening of his death.

February 15, 1636.

Being Sabbath-day, Sindercome's Keeper, with others, having removed the body out of the chamber where he lived, into a more airy place, and taken several things out of that chamber, removed the Cloth-dress, and under it was found a Paper subscribed with his own hand as following:

GOD knoweth my heart, I do take this curse, because I would not have all the open shame of the World executed upon my body: I desire all good people not to judge any of me; for I do not fear for my Life, but do only Grieve with my Soul. I feel this curse, the penalty of my sins in the world: I am before God and the world, clear my Keeper, my Sisters, Mother, or Brother, or any other of my Relations, but it was done alone by myself. I say by me.

The 13th day, 1636.

Miles Sindercome.

February 16, 1636.

The Jury fate again according to adjournment, so when the aforesaid testimonies of the Physicians and Surgeons, and also Sindercome's own were apparent; so that they did then unanimously resolve and agree, that he, by some extraordinary means, had caused his own death, and that they verily believed the same to be by poison. But for their further direction, as to the formal part of their verdict, they at that time deferred the giving of it, and adjourned till seven o'clock the next morning, at the Lord Chief-Justice's house, where they accordingly met; and having received his Lordship's direction touching matter of fact, did all unanimously agree on, and give up their verdict, to the effect following:

February 17, 1636.

Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk, late of the Parish of Peter in Breda, in the County of Middlesex, God not having helped his eyes, but by the instigation of the Devil being moved and seduced, at the Tower of London, in the Parish and County aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his own towards himself aforethought, as a Felon against himself, then and there feloniously upon himself did make an assault. And that the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk, then and there, certain poisoned powder, through the use of him the said Miles, into the head of him the said Miles, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a Felon of himself, feloniously did thrust and draw, by reason of which loading and drawing of the poison aforesaid, by an assault, into the head of him the said Miles Sindercome; he the said Miles Sindercome, by the strength and operation of the poison aforesaid, himself did mortally poison; of which said mortal poisoning, he the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk, within three hours after died. And so we find him some Afflictions, which were undeciphered and as subtle as himself; and though he (Crawford) had got him condemned to die, the Fellow's carriage and words were such, as if he knew well how to avoid our Judgment; which made Gurneall believe that a Party in the Army would attempt his rescue. Whomsoever he gave Fisk charge that he should be carefully looked to in the Tower, and three or four of the Guard always with him day and night. At the day appointed for his Execution, that night Gurneall was much surprised, how placed upon the Scaffold, where they found him dead in his bed, which gave more suspicion to Gurneall; for he believed that he hoped that, at his Death, to avoid the usual manner of it, he would have desired many of his Company to stay; he saw found himself under the right speech of having come to be poisoned, as not daring to live any longer; he saw that he could not be brought that night. It appeared upon Examination, that the night before, when he was going to bed in the presence of his Lord, his brother came to take him to his bed, and again lay down with him in his bed, and kept him in bed, and (as he said) this was the last bed he should ever go to. His body was washed by a society of gentlemen where he should have been brought, and buried under it, with a stake driven through him, as if it was the case of his death; yet this account perplexed Gurneall very much, and though he was without the particular discovery which he expected, he made a general discovery of it, that he himself was more curious in his own than he believed he had been.

that the aforesaid Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk, the said 13th day of February, in the year aforesaid, at the Tower of London aforesaid, in the Parish and County aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, feloniously, wilfully, and of his malice towards himself aforethought, as a Felon against himself, feloniously himself did kill and murder. We find no Goods or Chattels, that the said Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk had, at the time of the felony and murder aforesaid, in manner and form aforesaid, upon himself, floss and consumed. In witness whereof, we have hereunto set our hand, this 17th day of February, 1636, 16.

And thereupon the said Coroner issued forth his Warrant for the burial of Sindercome, the Copy whereof followeth:

Middlesex J. W. HERRIS the Jury impanelled and sworn to inquire of the death of Miles Sindercome, otherwise Fisk, did produce upon their Oaths, that the said Miles, the 13th of this instant February, did feloniously poison himself: There are therefore in the name of his Highness, the Lord Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland, so request you to bury the corpse of the said Miles Sindercome, according to Law, in the next common highway. Hereof you are not to fail, as you will answer the contrary at your perils, under the 17th day of February, 1636.

Thomas Evans, Coroner.

To the Constable and Headborough within the Liberty of the Tower of London.

On the last day, February 17, Miles Sindercome aforesaid, being found to have murdered himself, his body was according to Law drawn to the open place upon Tower-hill, at a half's tail, with his head forward, and there under the Scaffold of common execution a hole being digged, he was turned in stark naked, and a stake spiked with Iron, was driven through him into the earth; that part of the Stake which remained above ground being all plaited with iron.

The Execution of Elizabeth Herring, the Wife of William Herring, of the Parish of St. Katharine's, Alderbury, taken upon Oath, the 14th of February, 1636.

SHE saith, that Miles Sindercome now dead was her brother, and that he was a Prisoner in the Tower of London the space of three weeks last past, or thereabouts, to her knowledge; and that for the space of a fortnight he was at the Tower several times to see the said Miles, and could be admitted but once to see him, under the 4th day of February, the said Informant was sent for to come to the said Miles. When she came to the said Miles, she found two Gentlemen in the room with him; who, as soon as this Informant came in, did say unto the said Miles, that he was not to speak any thing in private to this Informant; then this Informant came away. And that the same several times after to the said Miles; that on Monday the 9th of this instant February, she came to the said Miles after he had received sentence to die; and investigating his condition, the said, that he would bring his Mother's grey hairs with sorrow to the grave, and what an open flame it would be to him and all his friends. The said Miles Sindercome then did answer, saying, that before they should have his life to be forfeited (meaning his Highness the Lord Protector, as this Informant believeth) he would poison himself first, and desired her, this Informant, to buy him some poison, which she refused. And that at times when this Informant hath been with the said Miles, she did for some strange faces which she did not know, and that she came every day since Monday, once a day or more to the said Miles; and saith, that he the said Miles did not speak any more words to her of any poison, or any other words of discontent, as if he intended to destroy himself; and that he never did complain to this Informant of any sickness or diseases that he was troubled withal. And that on Friday, the 13th of this instant February, he being alone with the said Miles Sindercome, did persuade him to confess with her a hand with him in the plot against his Highness the Lord Protector; that if he would confess, his Highness would grant him his life, and wished him to trust to God and man; and the said Miles answered, he would have it under black and white, and that he would trust no man. And that about eight of the clock at night he parted from the said Miles, and left him in good health, being prepared to die, as she thought; and that he found in his own conscience he had made his peace with the Lord, and this Informant desired that he over brought him any poison, or did buy any other thing to destroy him; yet confesseth that on Friday night the day for the death of the said Miles, that the desired with all his heart, to see him die a natural death at that chamber. And further saith not.

The Information of Martha Wickham, Spinster, taken upon Oath, at aforesaid.

SHE saith, that she hath known Miles Sindercome for the space of four years last past, and that she lodged at the house of Daniel Stinchard, Haberdasher of Hats on London-Bridge, where this Informant lived; and that the night before he was taken into custody, and imprisoned, he lay at his lodging in the said house. And this Informant desired, and saith, that the both not know any of the company that used to come to the said Miles, while he lodged there; and saith, that she hath been several times to see the said Miles at the Tower of London, while he remained there; and saith, that she doth not know of any poison, or any other violent thing, which was brought or sent to the said Miles Sindercome, to destroy himself; and further saith not.

Mortis IPIDEM.

The Information of Anne Pierce, Wife of Stephen Pierce, of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Mariner, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

SHE faith, That she was several Times to see Miss Sinderome, the time was in the Tower of South, That she doth not know of any Poison, or any other violent Thing that was brought to the said Miss to destroy himself, and she did never hear the said Miss speak any Words, as if he intended to destroy himself by Poison, or any other way: And further faith not.

Middlesex II. The Information of William Foster, taken upon Oath, the 14th Day of February, 1656, before Thomas Evans, Gent. one of the Clerks of the County of Middlesex.

HE faith, That on Friday, the 13th of February, about nine of the Clock at Night, he was in the Chamber where Miss Sinderome, otherwise Fy, lodged, within the Tower of London; faith, That the said Miss Sinderome did desire this Informant, and four more that were with him, that they would withdraw out of the Chamber whilst he went to Prayers; and within less than a Quarter of an Hour after, he called as the Informant, and those that were with him, into the Chamber again; and a Quarter of an Hour after that, the said Miss did take a Book into his Hands to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last Night he should go into a Bed, and the last Bed he should go into. And then he lay down in his Bed, and, to this Informant's thinking, fell asleep, and died. And this Informant desired Daniel Storr, Miss Sinderome's Keeper, to take a Candle, and to see how the said Miss did lie in his Bed; and the said Daniel Storr did tell the Informant, that the said Miss Sinderome, alias Fy, was almost dead as he lay in the Bed; but the said Miss Sinderome did lie in that Condition spaceless the Space of two Hours, and then died.

The Information of Philip Brown, taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

HE faith, That on Friday, the 13th Day of February, about ten of the Clock in the Forenoon, he was with Miss Sinderome, otherwise Fy, in his Chamber, and fled there at Dinner, and in the same hour, while that they were at Dinner, the said Miss Sinderome did say these Words, That this was the last Night that ever he should see, as he thought. And after, two of the said Miss's Sisters, a Cousin, and another Gentlewoman with them, came to see the said Miss, and did then persuade him, the said Miss, to confide to them, and to declare where they were, who had brought him into these Troubles and Sorrows that he was like to undergo. And he answered them, saying, To whom should he confide? He could not expect Mercy from him, who was resolved to give him none; saying, that Cromwell had to him, when he was taken and brought before him, Sinderome, have I caught you! you that have fought many Ways to take away my Life, I will have no Consideration at all of thy Life. And when he had uttered these Words, he was in a great Passion, and said, That he might go and declare against the Lord Parnell, the Lord Leveson, Sir John Berkeley, Sir Thomas Pride, or any other Member of the Army, if he were minded to destroy innocent Blood. And about seven of the Clock that Day, Orders were brought to this Informant from the Major, that the said Miss Sinderome might have some time allowed him apart, to prepare himself, if he desired it. And this Informant went out of the Chamber, and left the said Miss alone; and a Quarter of an Hour after, this Informant standing at the Chamber-door, did see the said Miss kneeling on his Knees on the Ground by the Bed-side, and presently after one of the Gentlemen that stood at his Chamber-door, did tell this Informant, that the said Miss did cough and choke, as if he was vomiting; and this Informant opened the Chamber-door, and went in, and found the said Miss walking about the Chamber. And Capt. Fyger, and Capt. Storr, who were ordered to be there that Night, then came into the Room; and about nine of the Clock at Night, the said Miss did desire this Informant, and the other Company that were there, to withdraw out of the Room, and about a Quarter of an Hour after, he called them in again; and the said Miss did then take a Book into his Hand to read, and said, that he would go to bed, and that that was the last Night he should ever go to bed, and the last Bed he should lie in; and then laid him down in his Bed. And then Capt. Storr did desire Daniel Storr, the said Miss's Keeper, to see how he did lie in his Bed; and the said Daniel Storr looking upon the said Miss, did by words to this Informant, and the rest there, that the said Miss was almost dead: And yet the said Miss Sinderome did lie in that Condition the Space of two Hours, and then died.

Middlesex II. The Information of Daniel Storr, Gent. taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

SAITH, That about the End of January, Miss Sinderome, alias Fy, being a Prisoner in the Tower of London, under the Custody of Sir John Berkeley, Knight, having come Discourte with this Informant, who was his Keeper, did then say unto this Informant, that if he would be faithful to him, the said Miss, he would give him the Value of his Place, what it was worth, were it a hundred or two of Pounds, and desired him, this Informant, if he would undertake the Business, and secure of his Profit, to provide him the said Miss a black Suit of Clothes, a Peruke, and also a short Dagger, and to pass him out of the Water-gate, and he would kill any Man that should oppose him, and the same Day that he was at his Trial, being the 9th of this instant February, after he came back again to the Tower, the said Miss was in a great Passion, his Sister Elizabeth Herring being then in his Company, he said Miss then did swear, that they should not have their Lives (meaning, as this Informant believeth, that the Sentence pronounced against him that Day should not be executed). And then the said Miss Sinderome did desire this Informant to help him to give Poison, that he might make away with himself, and this Informant refusing to do any of these Things which he desired, the said Miss then did speak to the said Elizabeth Herring, his Sister, who was there, to bring him some Poison; but the said Elizabeth crying, gave him no Answer. And afterwards the said Miss, and the said Elizabeth, had some private Discourse together in the Room, which this Informant did not hear. And the said Elizabeth parting from the said Miss, came down Stairs, and did speak to this Informant, saying, Lord, what shall I do, did you hear him what he said of the Poison? And this Informant answered, That he did hear what he said, and wished but not to bring him any; and further said to the said Elizabeth Herring, that if the said Miss was poisoned while he continued in this Informant's House, that he this Informant answered, he would charge her the said Elizabeth with helping the said Miss to Poison. And then the said Elizabeth was away from this Informant; and this Informant went up into the Chamber so the said Miss Sinderome, who asked this Informant, if it was not possible for him to help the said Miss to make an Escape now in his great Distress; and further said, that if this Informant would do it, he would make good to him 200 l. this Night. And then said, that if he this Informant would go along with the said Miss, when he escaped, he would make that 200 l. good, or what more he should desire; further requiring earnestly, this Informant to help him to a black Suit, and a Peruke. This Informant then said to the said Miss Sinderome, that it was impossible for him to make an Escape, there being such strict Guard kept about him; and had so further Discourse at that time. And that on Friday, the 13th Day of February, about one of the Clock at Night, this Informant then was with the said Miss in his Chamber, together with Captain Henry Storr, Captain-Lieutenant William Fyger, Edging Philip Brown, Sergeant Nathaniel Storr, and the said Miss did desire this Informant, and the rest of the Company, to withdraw out of the Room, which they did; and about a Quarter of an Hour after, he the said Miss did desire them to come again into his Chamber, he walking a Turn or two about the Room, did take into his Hand a Bed to read in, and a while after, he flared up suddenly from the Place where he sat, saying, He would go to bed, that that was the last Time he should go to bed, and the last Bed he should lie in. And when the said Miss had lain a while in his Bed, he fell asleep, and sooted, and after that he had a rattling in his Throat; and this Informant was bid to take a Candle, and see the said Miss as he lay in his Bed; and when this Informant had looked upon the said Miss, he found him almost dead as he lay in his Bed. And this Informant being further asked, if he knew of any Poison, or any other Means, with which the said Miss did use to take away his Life, faith, That he did not know any, neither could he know any more touching the said Miss's Death, but what he hath already declared in this Information.

Daniel Storr.

The Information of Henry Sharp, Gent. taken upon Oath, as aforesaid.

SAITH, That between seven and eight of the Clock on Friday Night, being the 13th Day of February, being in the Chamber with Miss Sinderome, otherwise Fy, these Women, whose Names this Informant doth not know, came crying into the Chamber to the said Miss, lamenting his Condition; the said Sinderome then reaching as a Bed, did he continued reading about that in Bed, while the said three Women were there. One of the said Women said to him, the said Miss, that he would be glad to see him dead in the Room before he went from thence, rather than to have him die such a barbarous Death as was appointed for him to die. And after they were gone out of the Room, this Informant called Daniel Storr, the said Miss's Keeper, to search the Bed and the Room, lest any thing might be left there for the said Miss to hurt himself with; and the Room being searched, nothing was found. And also upon Enquiry of the said Storr, this Informant found that all Instruments were taken from him; only the said Storr brought him up a Knife to cut his Meat withal, and carried it away when he had done. And that about Half an Hour after, he the said Miss desired this Informant, and the rest of the Company that were with him, to withdraw out of the Room; and about a Quarter of an Hour after, he called them into the Chamber again, and took a Book into his Hand to read in, and after a little Time, he said he would go to bed, and he down as in his Bed; and he hearing this Informant and Capt. Fyger talking together, the said Miss talked very freely with him; and in the Time of their Discourse together, there came a Messenger to this Informant from Sir John Berkeley, requesting this Informant to have a special Care of the said Miss Sinderome, otherwise Fy, that he did not poison himself. This Informant did declare unto the other that were there, what Order he had received for the said Miss; and about a Quarter of an Hour after, this Informant bearing him the said Miss away, desired Daniel Storr, the said Miss's Keeper, to see how the said Miss did lie in his Bed. And the said Miss taking a Candle to look on the said Miss Sinderome, did tell this Informant that he was almost dead; yet the said Miss did lie in that Condition, speechless, the Space of two Hours after, and then died.

The Information of Elizabeth Sinderome, of Deptford, in the County of Kent, Widow, taken upon Oath, the 14th of February, 1656.

SHE faith, That she was three several Times to see Miss Sinderome, her Son, while he was Prisoner in the Tower of London; and faith, she doth not know of any Poison, or any other Means, or Ways used by the said Miss Sinderome, or any other, to hasten his Death; neither did she ever hear him speak any Words to that purpose. And that the last time she was with the said Miss, he did then tell her, this Informant, that he was prepared to die, and that two Ministers being then in the Chamber with him, he had no further Discourse with him, or did see him any more, until on Friday Night, about twelve of the Clock, he did hear the Sea sent for; and did hear that he was very sick and weak, of which Stokens he did greatly after, and further faith not.

XXVIII. Proceedings against ARCHIBALD, Marquis of Argyle, 13 Car. II. 1661, for High-Treason.

The Grand Indictment * of High-Treason, exhibited against the Marquis of Argyle, by his Majesty's Advocate, to the Parliament of Scotland.

A RCHIBALD, Marquis of Argyle, you are indicted and accused, and are to answer at the instance of Sir John Fisher, Knight, his Majesty's Advocate for his Majesty's Honour, That whereas by the Laws of God, expressed in holy Writ, by the Laws of Nations, by the Common Law, and by the Statute Laws and Practice of this Kingdom, especially by the third Act of the fifth Parliament of King James I. and by the first Act of King James VI. of blessed memory, and by several other Acts of Parliament, all good and loyal Subjects of this Kingdom are bound and obliged perpetually to acknowledge, obey, maintain, defend and advance the Life, Honour, Safety, Dignity, Sovereign Authority, and Prerogative Royal of their Sovereign Lord and King, their Heirs and Successors, and Privilege of their Crown, with their lives, lands and goods, to the utmost of their power, constantly and faithfully to withstand all, and whatsoever persons or estates, who shall presume, profess, or intend any ways to impugn, prejudice, or impair the same, and shall no way intend, attempt, engage, sell or do any thing to the violation, hurt, denigration, impairing or prejudice of his Highness's sovereignty, prerogative, and privilege of his Crown, or any part or part thereof, and whatsoever both the contrary, so be punishable as Traitors, and to forfeit their lives, lands and goods. Likewise by the 15th Act of the 6th Parliament of King James II. and by the 75th Act of the 9th Parliament of Queen Mary I. all rising in fear of war against the King's Person or Majesty, all attempting to raise any band of men of war, horse or foot, in warlike posture, without special licence of the King's Majesty, and all furnishing of them, in help, refresh or counsel, are punishable as Traitors. Likewise by the 43d Act of the 3d Parliament of King James I. and by the 13th Act of the 11th Parliament, and by the 14th of the 12th Parliament, and by the 205th Act of the 14th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that no Subject, or whatsoever condition, degree or quality, shall presume to take upon him publicly or privately to decide, speak or write any purpose of reproach, slander, defame or contempt of his Majesty's Person, Estate or Government, or tending to the dishonour, hurt or prejudice of his Highness, his Person or Prerogative; or to meddle in the affairs of his Highness, and his Estate present, by-gone, or in time coming; not to deprive his Laws and Acts of Parliament, nor misadvise his proceedings, whereby any mischief may be moved between the King's Majesty, his Nobility and loving Subjects, under the pain of losing their lives, lands and goods, and others then contained. As also all hevers of any such leaguings, confederations, degrees or qualities, shall be punishable as Traitors, and their speeches or words, and counsels thereof, without apprehending of the Author (if it be in their power), and reveal not the same to his Majesty, or some of his Judges or Officers, and are mentioned in the said Acts, are liable to the like punishment, as the principal offenders.

Likewise by the 15th Act of the 11th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that none of his Majesty's Lieges and Subjects do presume or take upon him to impugn the Dignity and Authority of the Estates of Parliament; or to speak or procure the innovation or diminution of the power and authority of the same, under the pain of Treason.

Likewise by the last Act of the 3d Parliament of King James V. and by the 33d Act of the 6th Parliament of King James VI. all burning of houses or corn, and willful fire-raising, is declared Treason, and the commensures thereof are to be punished.

Likewise by the 5th Act of the 11th Parliament of King James VI. it is statute and ordained, that the murder and slaughter of whatsoever his Majesty's Lieges, where the party slain is under the trust, credit, assurance and power of the flaps, all such murder and slaughter shall be Treason, and the persons found culpable shall forfeit life, lands and goods.

Likewise by the 37th Act of the 3d Parliament of King James I. and by the 144th Act of the 12th Parliament of King James VI. all receivers, suppliers, or in-commensures with any Traitors, are punishable by forfeiture, as the Traitors themselves.

Likewise by Common Law and Practice of this Kingdom, all counsellers and aid-receivers of any malicious purpose, of putting any violent hands on the sacred person of your dread Sovereign the King's Majesty, or purpose of killing or putting him to death, and all advisers, counsellers, helpers, shelterers or helpers of any such treason, are punishable as Traitors.

Nevertheless, Vis of Argyll, that you the said Marquis of Argyle, having laid aside all fear of God, loyalty to his Majesty, and to his royal Father, of ever blessed memory, natural duty and affection to your native Country and Countrymen, and respect and obedience to the Laws of all well-governed Kingdoms, the Common Law, and the Laws, Statutes, Acts of Parliament, and Practice of this Kingdom, and having traitorously intended and executed the execution and subverting the fundamental Government of this Kingdom, the Sovereign Authority, royal Prerogative of his Majesty, and Privilege of the Crown: You, for carrying on of your said wicked purpose, having gathered and convoked together, in a hostile manner, a great many of your Friends, Servants, Vassals, Followers and other of his Majesty's Lieges, without any warrant, licence or command from his Majesty, and therewith, under pretence of opposing such as by you were then nick-named Anti-Covenanters, and opposing the work of Reformation (that you indeed were faithful adherents of his Majesty's lawful Authority), having marched to the ford of Lorn in Argyll, in the month of June, 1644, there did, in your town, and in presence of a great many Gentlemen and others publicly declare, That it was the opinion and judgment of many Doctors and Lawyers, that a King may be deposed for deformity, weakness and impotence: And that howbeit that your words were as abominable from any King, yet that the sense and meaning thereof might appear to be of the then King's Majesty, your dread Sovereign, you did halcyon and cry to the late Mr. John Stewart, of Leith, And, Mr. John, you understand Latin.

Likewise considering the condition of the Kingdom, and the oppositions that a great many of the people were in to his Majesty, particularly you the said Marquis, and your three Councillors and Followers; it is clear that the said words did not only traitorously reflect upon Kingly Government, as being subject to the people, who might in the case aforesaid depose a King, but also it is clear, that your meaning also and intention thereby was, that the King's Majesty, your dread Sovereign, might be so deposed: And the said treasonable speeches were so moved by you, of design to offer in your many treasonable actions and practices done by you unto his sacred Person, Dignity, and Authority; which, doubtless, did occasion, and was mainly instrumental both in his deposition and cruel murder: Which wicked and treasonable speeches the said Mr. John having thereafter repeated, you most cruelly and tyrannously did persecute him to death, as a Leisling-maker between the King's Majesty and his good Subjects, howbeit you could not but be conscious of the truth of what he had reported.

In prosecution of your aforesaid wicked and treasonable purposes, you have marched with the said force to the house of Arden, belonging to his Majesty's right truly and well beloved Cousin and chief Councillor John Earl of Arden, which was then kept for his Majesty's service and authority, after you had forced the mansion of the said house, and destroyed the woods and plantings of the same, and worried and destroyed the said Earl's friends and tenants, his Majesty's good Subjects, you did fight and demolish the said house; and to execute your hatred to the said Earl, merely for his loyalty to his Majesty, did force, or by force under you did force upon the house of Arden in Glasgow belonging also to the said Earl, and without any colour or pretence of offence did wilfully, most traitorously, and contrary to the sacred Acts of Parliament, raise fire in the said house, and thereby burnt and destroyed the same, and all furniture therein.

Thirdly, In further prosecution of your treasonable plots and machinations against his Majesty's Person and Authority, contrary to the aforesaid Laws and Acts of Parliament as aforesaid; you, as an hostile manner, did most traitorously lay siege to his Majesty's Fort and Castle of Dunbar, then fortified and kept for his Majesty's service by Col. Henderson, having his Majesty's command and commission for that effect, and forced the said Colonel to render the said Castle to you; out of which most traitorously you caused to be transported and carried away a great many of his Majesty's cannon and other armaments, appointed for defence and security of the said Castle.

Fourthly, Nevertheless, considering that his then Majesty had in June 1641 come himself in person to this Kingdom, and most graciously condescended to such Acts as were required of him (how unjust soever) for security and pleasing the people, and settling a peace; and that he had put on an Act of Oblivion, to remission all such as had formerly been in opposition to his Majesty within this Kingdom, and that he had conferred upon you the title and dignity of Marquis, as a mark of his royal favour, and set you in places of greatest trust in the Kingdom; and that you had taken and promised, in the Abbey of Holyrood, that in case any trouble or commotion should happen to be raised in England, by any of his discontented Subjects against him, you would aid and defend him against all such, on the hazard of your life and fortune; and that his Majesty had parted from this his ancient Kingdom, as was said and acknowledged by all, a contented Prince from a creature of People; yet nevertheless his Majesty being forced and necessitated in June 1642, to leave his Parliament in England then sitting at Westminster, and his royal Palace of Whitehall, and take himself to defensive arms, for maintenance of his royal person, dignity and authority, and to protect the same against an army of Seceders, who maliciously, traitorously, cruelly and traitorously did invade the same, you, contrary to your allegiance, obligations and recent Promise aforesaid, did by yourself and complices, to tempt and strengthen the said Rebels and Seceders, and in direct opposition to his Majesty's person and dignity, call, or cause to be called a pretended convention of Estates in June 1642, without any shadow or colour of lawful authority; and you and they so convoked did take upon you the supreme authority of the Kingdom, enter in league with his Majesty's enemies, impose subsidies and taxes upon the people, and raise an army of his Majesty's own subjects, and therewith entered his Majesty's Kingdom of England, seized upon his Majesty's Towns and Forts there; and killed, murdered, plundered and destroyed his good Subjects, and in open and pitched battles fought for, with and in behalf of the aid Rebels, against his Majesty's forces, which in effect was the life and soul of all our subsequent troubles and disasters that befall his Majesty or his loyal and good Subjects thereafter.

* This is called The Grand Indictment of High-Treason, because there was neither Charge exhibited against the Marquis, at the instance of Sir James Lindsay; and there were no protest nor answer made by the Marquis to the Grand Indictment, which indictment Proceedings are referred to in the following, Vol. II. page 427. to page 431, and page 434, and page 435, is inserted Bishop Burnet's Account of his Trial, which is a mean of this Trial being inserted; not of that Indictment against the Marquis at the instance of Sir John Lindsay. And in page 435, is inserted the Marquis's speech on the scaffold, for which reason it is here omitted.

Fifthly, In June 1645, after your return from England, to these your implacable malice and hatred to all such as had any dependence upon, or affection to his Majesty, you by yourself, and others under your command, or at your direction, did most treacherously raise wild fire, and burn the house of Millicent Egmont, inhabited by the Countess of Derby, and in her possession, and all the moveables and furniture, they extending to a great value; notwithstanding that the said Countess was an honorable aged woman; and who, and her dear husband, the Earl of Derby, by all observances and dutiful respects obliged you, so far as in them lay, thereby adding to the said Act of Treason, the height of oppression and ingratitude. Lastly, In the year 1646, you by yourself, or those under your command, or for whom you were accountable, or whom you might have helped or impeded, did take in the house of Yeward, belonging to the Laird of Salmond, and the house of Ogle, belonging to the Laird of Ogle, and after articles of capitulation drawn and submitted by the Laird of Abingdon, and other Officers under your command, did most treacherously, in manner aforesaid, under trust and assurance, as it is said, burn the said house of Ogle, cruelly hang, kill and murder a great many of the said Lairds of Salmond and Ogle's friends and followers; as is more fully exprest in the Summons read at their infiance and moine, for his Majesty's interest against you, and which is repeated in a part of this article.

Secondly, You having cruelly intended the utter ruin and extirpation of all loyal and loyal Subjects, who had given testimony of their faithfulness to his Majesty's dear Father, of ever-blessed memory, and having with an army of your complices, allies, ruffians, servants, tenants and followers in June 1646, marched to Kenilworth, where a great many of his Majesty's well-affected Subjects of the name of Mac-Daniel, Mac-Cru, and others, whose names are not particularly known, to the number of 400, had fortified themselves for their security, and against your oppression and violence, in the house of Lambard and Denmarke: And you with the said forces having marched to the said house of Lambard, the Gentlemen and others therein, without making the least opposition, and declaring that they had refused themselves to the said place for shelter and protection, did reader up the said house and themselves, upon assurance, that they might rest and quietly return and live at their own houses, according thereto, they were surprised and sent home, where they remained in peaceable manner by the space of days. Notwithstanding, thereafter, you and the forces of malice having besieged the Castle of Denmarke, during the said siege, there were several messengers appointed for the said Gentlemen to make their appearance, (which frequently they did, and were still dismissed, until) such time as those who were within the said house of Denmarke had rendered up the said house and themselves, to be disposed of at the mercy of the Kingdom, or pretended Committee of Estates. And that notwithstanding thereof, you and your said complices who most perfidiously, treacherously and treasonably (and for which also you are here indicted) hanged and murdered, or caused to be hanged and murdered, the number of 260 of them or 300, they being under your trust, assurance, credit, or power; and did divide the rest of them at your own hand, without any lawful war, sent to Capitain Wilson Hay, and Archibald Campbell, to force in the French war. Then and thereafter you caused, and appointed a new rendezvous of the said Gentlemen, who were in the house of Lambard, and their followers, who having appeared in frequent manner, you caused to be sought out fifteen or sixteen of the said Gentlemen, who were that night first to the said house of Lambard, and the next morning brought forth by you, or such as were under your command, and most perfidiously, cruelly and inhumanly, without any order of Law, or form of Process civil or military, hanged and murdered. And to aggravate the said cruel and barbarous crime, 'tis of verity, That one of the said Persons being an old man, and having one son, of age not above fifteen or seventeen years; the father immediately before his death did depose, that his said son had never done any crime offensive to his life-time, but that he had still been at Schools; and that some few days before, he had come from Glasgow, the place of his education, to visit his Parents; and therefore did earnestly supplicate, in regard of his innocency, his life might be spared: Notwithstanding you, and the bloody orders of your purples, were so unmerciful, so set to hearken to the said son, that the said young old man, but forthwith the said young innocent boy was cruelly also hanged to death. Likewise not content with the above said unheard-of brutal Acts of cruelty, you in the month of August, or one or other of the months thereof, by yourself and followers, or such whom you might have sought or left, caused to be transported from the Isle of Isle, to the Isle of Isle, to the number of two hundred persons of all ages and ages; where at present of your school and education house withdrawn from them, they in a most miserable manner were pined and starved to death by famine, except some very few, who had out-lived the rest, and were relieved and carried out of the said Isle by boats accidentally coming by: Likewise the person of Mac-Daniel, alias Gordon Galtiey, or Conchittie, being in disce ordered by the Parliament, or Committee of Estates thereof, to have been brought from prison out of the house of where he then was, and there had been kept by you and others in your time, many years before, to Edinburgh, that the cause for which he had been kept, and so detained in prison, might have been known, and he having for that end been brought in a ship the length of the road of Lamb, you, for preventing such information of your cruelty and oppression exercised towards him, and many of his friends and followers, which he was able to have given and made out, you, in manifest contempt and scorn of that Committee of Parliament, under which you yourself acted, caused to take the person of the said Gordon Galtiey forth of the said ship, and after you had carried him to your own lands and bounds, cruelly caused to hang him to death.

Eighthly, Notwithstanding of the manifold acts of mercy and favour, dignity, honour and trust conferred upon you by your then dread Sovereign, for reclaiming you from your disloyal and treasonable practices, plots and machinations, against his sacred person, dignity and authority; he being fore-pressed and reduced to great straits and extremities by that army of Sedaries before-mentioned, with whom you had formerly joined, as in said, and having in that mixture and difficulty rather chosen, from an innate principle of affection to his Countrymen, to call himself over in the hands of the army of his Majesty's Subjects of his ancient Kingdom of Scotland, for shelter and preservation of his Royal Person; nevertheless, you, the said Marquis, being the chief ring-leader of that factious party, who then swayed the reins and affairs both in Council and Armes in the said Kingdom, did so converse and conspire, and by your influence to prevail, that after all your efforts made by his Majesty, and his earnest desire to have come and lived in Scotland, until such time as all differences in both Kingdoms had been settled: That a pretended Act of Parliament was made for abandoning and leaving his Majesty in the disposal and mercy of the inveterate enemies of his Majesty and Government, the said armies of Sedaries. And that you acting as, and according to, the said Act might be the more evident and clear, and to aggravate your content and singular guilt therein, you yourself went to London, where you boldly, under pretext of satisfaction for the arrears of the said army, raised by the pretended authority of the pretended Government of Estates, in June 1643, as it is said, uncharitably and treacherously gave up, at least consigned to the upholding of your dread Sovereign and Father, and that as being unpowdered to go by the Kingdom of Scotland; and thereby did rub an indelible mark of reproach and infamy upon the whole nation to all generations, so far as in you lay. And further, to clear your affected treasonable dealings, seditions to, and correspondence with that infamous party of the said army, who carried on the said abominable and detestable act, you being at the same time in a pretended joint Government of both Kingdoms, whilest the English therein did call in question whether the said army would sincerely consent with them in their said treason and treachery; you, after many arguments used in their favour, earnestly desired them to have patience for a little time, and it would appear by somewhat of the officers of the army, how far they intended to concur and go along with them. Likewise within few days after there was a vindication and declaration emitted in name of the said armies, whereby it was held forth, that in case his Majesty would not condescend to all the desires of both Kingdoms, which was no less than the dwelling himself of all regal power, civil, ecclesiastical, or military in state, church, or armies, they would deliver him up; which immediately after the payment of 300,000. bailey and unreasonably was done by you and them.

Ninthly, In June 1643, his Majesty's Royal Father being contrary to all Laws, divine and human, most unchristianly, barbarously and treasonably detained and kept prisoner within the Castle of Carrick, in the Isle of Wight, by a party of seditions, disloyal and rebellious Sedaries, the Estates of Parliament then convened by his Majesty's authority, having taken the said inhuman, treasonable and cruel siege into serious consideration, they found this Kingdom engaged in honour and duty to resist so bored and unbecomely of cruelty and lifelessness, and obliged to use all such endeavours to relieve him out of the hands of such wicked Usurpers, and to restore him to the exercise of his Royal authority in freedom, honour and safety; for effecting thereof, after all other fair ways essayed, upon mature consultation had, they found that the only probable means was the raising of an army of his Majesty's good Subjects, which was accordingly done and ordered by the Act of the said Parliament. Against the carrying on of which, to full, laudable and necessary duty, you did most violently and uncharitably oppose yourself, not only by arguing, voting against, and using all other means in your power to obstruct the same; but also, after the same was put into an Act of Parliament, you did most contemptuously and treasonably publicly dissent from, and enter a Protestation against the same; and not being therewith content, after the said army in pursuance of their duty and allegiance had marched into the said Kingdom, you shortly after in the month of September in contempt of the affected authority, and against the preservation of his Majesty's person and authority, did most treacherously convocate an army of seditions, factious and rebellious Subjects, in opposition to the said army, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, murders, slaughter, plunder and outrages upon the persons and estates of divers of his Majesty's good Subjects, and therewith invaded several of the cities and castles, seized thereupon, and upon the magazine with arms and ammunition therein: And at that time the said rebellious army of Sedaries of England, being upon the borders, you fearing and apprehending that the force and power raised by you should not be able to withstand his Majesty's good and loyal Subjects who were then risen and ready to rise in arms for affording and vindicating his Majesty's just authority, you did most boldly, treacherously and unreasonably call in to your aid and assistance the said armies of Sedaries. Likewise you yourself went in person to the house of Edinburgh, within a mile of the Edinburgh borders, to the end of Edinburgh; and you did meet with the vile Usurper James, the sixth, commander of the said army, with whom you had several private meetings and consultations, and thereby persuaded, and prevailed with the said Traitor, that he thereafter marched with the said army to Edinburgh and the places thereabout; and which march and coming of the said Usurper you might have undoubtedly hindered, in so far as it can be made appear by clear proof and testimonies of famous persons, That it having been complained upon to him at the said house of Edinburgh, that by reason of his being there with such a great number of Soldiers, the Lord Madrigal's tenants would undoubtedly be ruined; he the said Usurper did answer, That he could not help the same, for his staying and going did depend upon you, and that he was ready, if you desired, to march back to Edinburgh. As lastly, you did converse, advise or consent to the raising and convoking of the said factious, factious, and rebellious armies; at least was one of the number thereof, and with, and assisting to them in arms; at least, did vote, counsel or persuade the re-calling of the said army of Sedaries: And they being brought in, you did countenance, assist, encourage and consult with them, or their Commanders, or some of them, in public or in private at Edinburgh, and in the Countess, in the house called Lord How's Lodgings, and in divers other places. As also, you did most villainously and traitorously counsel, exhort or vote for the drawing up of a Letter directed to the Traitor and abominable Usurper, wherein you and your complices did engage yourselves, in the name of

of the Kingdom of Scotland, to employ your utmost endeavours, that none who have been active in, or contrary to the engagement against the said Scotland, or had been in arms at Stirling, or elsewhere, in maintenance or furtherance of that engagement, should be employed in any public place or trust within this Kingdom whatsoever, without advice or consent of the Kingdom of England, as the said Letter, dated the 6th day of October, 1648, more fully bears. As also, you did draw up, at least did counsel, advise or vote, to the up-drawing of certain Instructions given to Sir John Gifford, who was sent by you and your complices, as Commissioners to the pretended House of Parliament of England, dated October 17, the year aforesaid; wherein you desire, that the noblemen, gentlemen of quality, and considerable officers of the army, that went into England, under the command of Duke Hamilton, and who were then prisoners, might be kept as pledges for the peace of this Kingdom; by which not only have you endeavoured most unreasonably to enslave your fellow-subjects and countrymen to the power of strangers, but most treacherously and treasonably, as an unworthy, ungrateful Patriot, done what in you lay to destroy the life of your own dear Sovereign, and the Royal Authority in him and his succession, and to subject the honour, liberty, power and government of this his Majesty's ancient and free Kingdom, to the command, rule and tyranny of foreign visitors and usurpers. As also, you, upon the 4th day of May thereafter, having taken upon you most reasonably the supreme authority of this Kingdom, gave warrant under your hand for issuing out a Proclamation, declaring that the wives, children and families of James Lord Ogilvy, Lord Kils, Lord Marquis of Huntly, then deceased, Lord Gordon, son to the Marquis of Huntly, John now Lord of Melrose, therein defendant, John Middleton of Huntly, deceased, and General-Major, should be no longer under the protection of this Kingdom, and that each couple should be taken for transporting them out of their country to foreign parts, as the Estates of Parliament, or their Committee, should think fit.

Tenethly, After his Majesty's dear and most loyal father, of eternal and most blessed memory, had been most uncharitably, inhumanly, horribly and barbarously murdered, by the said abominable traitor and usurper Oliver Cromwell, and his wicked complices, the devilish and treasonable counsels, plots, contrivings and doings of yours did not yet terminate: For there being some motions for advice to be made to his Majesty, by some of his good subjects of this his ancient Kingdom, as unto the lawful and rightful Successor to his deceased royal father in the temporal crown thereof, that his Majesty might come to his said ancient Kingdom, for exercising his royal power and authority, the said motion and purpose being so just and lawful, you, notwithstanding of your great impudence and daring, always fearing, that a direct opposing thereof would prove altogether ineffectual; you, in a most indirect way, procured the application made for seeking his Majesty, to be clogged with limitations, restrictions and conditions, to have been conceded to by his Majesty, before his admission to the exercise of his royal Government, as were most detrimental to his Majesty's dignity and authority, and most derogatory to monarchical Government; as are more fully expressed in the several commissions, instructions and advices sent and made to his Majesty in this effect, and public proclamation of his Majesty at the Mercat-cross at Edinburgh, by you and your complices, commissioners at Scots, all which are here repeated as a part of the Libel, brevevis capite. And his Majesty, upon consideration, that the said unreasonable, unlawful and treasonable conditions were exacted of his Majesty by you, and a few number of infamous subjects, who had, by the assistance of the usurper and tyrant Oliver Cromwell, thrust yourself into the government of his Majesty's ancient Kingdom; and trifling to the fidelity, the loyalty and good affections of his other good subjects, having, notwithstanding the said hard and unjust conditions, resolved to call himself upon the loyalty and affections of his other good and faithful subjects; you, to obstruct his Majesty's purpose and resolution, and to lay, as in you lay, to fight and ventur in thereby, did most cruelly and unreasonably exact of the Marquis of Argyll, his Majesty's commissioner, and who represented his person in his said ancient Kingdom; exalted to be most horribly and inhumanly murdered the said Marquis, at the Mercat-cross, upon the 21st day of May, 1650, with all the circumstances of disgrace and dishonour; which so much reflected upon his Majesty's person, dignity and authority, and upon the honour of all true nobility; and is so recent and fresh, with detestation, in the memories of all good subjects and generous spirits, at home and abroad, that it is not fit to be mentioned or repeated here. But his Majesty still continuing in his former purpose and resolution, and after a most tedious and dangerous voyage at sea, having, by the providence of Almighty God, happily and safely arrived in his said ancient Kingdom; shortly thereafter, the most bloody murder of the said usurper Oliver Cromwell, in furtherance of his Majesty, with a powerful army of Soldiers, by sea and land, invaded his said Majesty's ancient Kingdom. For opposing of whom, an army being raised, while both the said armies were in the field, you most treacherously and unreasonably kept correspondence, and had intelligence with the said usurper, by writing in, and receiving letters from him, without his Majesty's private consent or warrant; at least, by sending to, and receiving messages from him by word of mouth. And further, to advance the designs of that abominable Regicide, after you had by your indirect means, plots, advices or contrivances, gotten his Majesty removed from his army at Leith, you by your assistance gave a few number of the Commissioners at the General Assembly, yourself being one of the number then met at St. Colville's church, commonly called the West-Kirk, prevailed so, that by the working of the hands of friends, and by agitating the emotions, there was in a most clandestine and surreptitious manner an Act, as of the said commission of the Kirk, made, passed and published, wherein, besides many reproachful and slanderous expressions of his Majesty and his royal ancestors, more fully expressed in the said pretended Act, bearing date August 13, 1650, it was declared, that you defrauded, and would not own his Majesty's interest, because of his refusal to subscribe and emit a declaration offered to him; and which declaration was contrived and drawn up by you, and contains many scandalous, seditious, impious, reproachful and treasonable expressions, not only against his Majesty's authority and government, but also against his royal father and mother, and others his royal progenitors, as is more at large expressed in the aforesaid Act of the date above-written, an declaration bearing date the same day. The same year; of which declaration there needs no more be said, than that the circumstances by which his Majesty was enforced to sign the same, are enough known to the world; and that the worst and greatest part of his Majesty's ancient Kingdom did even detest and abhor the evil usage of his Majesty in that particular, when the same tyranny was exercised there by the power of you and a few evil men your complices, which at that time had spread itself over his Majesty's Kingdom of England; at least you and your complices did ratify and approve the said Act of the West-Kirk, and confirm therein; and at least you did deal with, and press and force his Majesty to sign and subscribe the declaration aforesaid; at least you were author or contriver, adviser or counsellor, persuader or voter, or adviser, adviser, aider or abettor of the aforesaid rebellions, limitations and conditions, and of the aforesaid murder of his said Majesty's Commissioner, and manner thereof, and of the keeping of the said correspondence with the said invader and usurper, and of the said Act and Declaration, or any or other of them, or all or part thereof, or any or other of them.

Eleventhly, After it had pleased God to suffer that monster of men and cruel Regicide, Oliver Cromwell, to rise to prevail against all his Majesty's endeavours for recovering his just right and interest in this and in his other Kingdoms, and over all the armies and forces raised by him for that end, so that he was necessitated to relinquish himself with his sons, Princes and Estates; however, at his Majesty's coronation, you, in the presence of God, and a great many of the Nobility of this Kingdom, and others his then convened at Scots, the 11th of January, 1651, did swear to be faithful to the Crown, and true liege-men to his Majesty; yet nevertheless, contrary to the said oath, and notwithstanding the many favours, honours, benefits and Acts of indemnity conferred upon you, and contrary to the Laws and Acts of Parliament, as is expressed, you did most perfidiously, ungratefully and treasonably, in some 1653, or 1654, not only according to your bounden duty, not rite in arms, and you with the Earls of Glencairn and Middleton, who were commissioned from his Majesty for hindering the further progress of the usurper, and expelling them forth of this Kingdom; but did in open hostility join with the said usurper, against his Majesty, especially with the Colonels Juxon, Gellie and Tynnesley, at least with the Colonels Collier and Tynnesley, at least with Colonel Tynnesley, when he was in the Highlands in opposition to the said Earl of Glencairn; at least joined with one or other of them as counsel; did take and relieve prisoners, did furnish several pieces of great cannon, to the number of fourteen, in some 1653, or 1654, to Colonel David, then governor of Argyll, which cannon, or a great many of them, were taken out by you of his Majesty's castle of Dunbarton, at the time and in the manner above expressed. And likewise you did take pay from the said usurper for a company of foot under them and in their service, thereby openly and clearly making it appear what you did intend by all your more covert and private machinations, plottings and treasonable designs against his Majesty's dear father and himself. Likewise to make it appear what intemperance and power you had with the usurper, you not only did term and call the soldiers of his Majesty's forces against you and the usurper, rebellious, but also you in some 1654, did take upon you power to bring off such as were in that service, and to give remissions therefore under your own hand; particularly to John Mac-Douglass of Dunblair, as the same under your hand, the said Year, will verify.

Twelfthly, I beseech Oliver Cromwell, that monster of men, vilest of traitors, most cruel murderer, bloody tyrant and usurper, having reached, as he thought, the end of all his devilish plots and treasonable machinations, by usurping the common and authority of his Majesty's three Kingdoms, and setting the same, so far as in him lay, upon him and his family; you concerning the same so fast and reviled, that in human probability it was not likely to be removed or altered; that you might avow and reap the fruits of your former more covert, vile and damnable plots, tricks, contrivings and doings for the said arch-tyrant and traitor, you then pulled off and laid aside the mask of pretended loyalty and religion, under which you had all along falsely looked, thereby having deceived and cheated a great many of his Majesty's good subjects from their due allegiance and loyalty under hypocritical false pretences of your affection and zeal for Religion, Prince, and Country, to the utter ruin (if not of souls) of many of their bodies, estates and fortunes; and did openly, in face of the world, discover yourself in your own colours, appearing in a thing professedly and publicly in behalf of the said usurper against his Majesty's person and authority, in so far as in the month of May, after the decease of the said usurper, the famous good usurper, his son, being most reasonably and tyrannically proclaimed King of Scots, and sole Pretender of his said Majesty's dominions and territories therein belonging, at the Mercat-cross of his Majesty's cities of Edinburgh and Dunbarton, you having apparently, for such like services done or to be done, received from the said usurper Oliver some precepts due unto the Exchequer of Scotland, for payment to you of 12,000 sterling, or thereabout, did with your personal presence countenance the said tyrannical and treasonable proclamation; thereby, so far as in you lay, disavowing his Majesty's just and royal interest and right, and establishing the same on the persons and families of the said usurper. Likewise not long after the said usurper, the more to establish himself in his usurped government, having called a pretended Parliament, consisting of a few seditious, ill-reputed House of Burs, and certain persons of his Majesty's three Kingdoms as a House of Commons, to be called the Right-mayor; you did procure yourself elected Commissioner for the shire of Argyll, at least did accept of a commission from them; albeit both by the ability of your birth, and your non-residence within the said shire, you was in law incapable to be so elected; at least ought and might have refused to accept any commission. Nevertheless having voluntarily, and of your own accord, embraced the said charge and employment, you thereupon took journey, and went to London, and most boldly, perfidiously and treasonably, false, voted, and otherwise acted in the said usurper's pretended Parliament, by whom his Majesty's right and interest was defrauded and abused, and the same owned only in the usurper's Uffers's Person as a Member of the said parliament House of Commons, to the high Indignity and Contumacy of his Majesty's sacred Person and Authority, the utter Destruction of monarchical Government, the Disfranchisement of this Kingdom, and the great Opprobrium of your own Family and Potency.

Whereunto, You the said Marquis, to make it further appear to the World, that it was always your Purpose and Intention to destroy his Majesty's Authority and Government, and to oppose his Reformation to his just Rights and Laws, to his three Kingdoms, at a provincial Assembly held at January a little after the Death of his Majesty's Army at Wexford, the Marquis praying for his Majesty upon the accustomed Manner, you did most villanously and treacherously exhibit them, saying, That they were but Words to pray for a malignant and wicked King, whom God had rejected, and would never restore him again; or some to-like Words to that Purpose. And also, you being at London, in the Time of the Uffers's Oath, you said in Presence of divers Persons of Quality, That you wondered how People could be so mad, as to set a Family whom God had rejected, or such Words to that Purpose. Likewise after your home-coming to Scotland, you, openly in a publick Meeting at James Macgillivray's, in Ridley's Widow, in Presence of several Noblemen and Gentlemen, you boasted, That you would soon say any thing you had done in their things by-gone; and that if it were to be so, you would do it again; thereby you did evince that all that said, would be done again. Thereby you expressly taking upon you, by outward Speech, to give Judgment upon the hidden and secret Counsels and Determinations of Almighty God, and thereby to alienate the Affections, Duties, and Allegiances of his Majesty's good Subjects, and to breed and confirm enmities, such as are otherwise dispensed in their wicked Courses towards his Majesty's Person and Authority.

Lastly, That your nobleness and execrable Treason may appear to all the World, it is of Vexat, that in the Year 1648, at a private Conference between you, Oliver Cromwell, and Col. Braden, the said Oliver complaining of the many Difficulties, that attended their Affairs, by reason of the divers Designs which his Majesty had as Foot men came to time against them; you the said Marquis made Answer, That their Danger was great indeed, in regard that if any of their Design should take effect, they were all ruined. And thereupon gave your private Advice, that they should proceed to the questioning of the King for his Life; assuring them, that they could never be safe until they had taken away his Majesty's Life. At which, you did know of the horrible and treacherous Design of murdering his Majesty; and did most treacherously conceal, and not reveal the same till after the said horrid Deed was committed, and so past Prevention or Remedy. At which time, it was 1649, publicly in the Face of the pretended Parliament then sitting, you said, that the Uffers's Council had told you, That England and Scotland would never be at Peace, until the King were put to Death. By all which Particulars respectively, above rehearsed, it is clearly evinced, that you were, and are Author, Contriver, Deviler, Counsellor, Adviser, of all or Part of all the aforesaid Crimes of Treason, and other above related, or other of them, in Manner above declared. And thereby has incurred the Punts and Punishment of High-Treason, and others contained in the Laws and Acts of Parliament above-written; which must and should be inflicted upon you with all Rigour, in Example to others in all time coming.

His Majesty's, To Fletcher.

31 January, 1661.

Ordered, That the above-written Discy be given to the Marquis of Argyle, by a Herald or Parliament, and be to answer thereto, upon the 13th Day of February next to come.

The Marquis of Argyle's Petition to the Parliament of Scotland, craving a Recognition of his Case, containing many weighty Reasons urging the Necessity thereof. Presented to the Parliament, February 12, 1661.

To my Lord Commissioner his Grace, and Honourable Estates of Parliament,

The humble Petition of Archibald Marquis of Argyle,

humbly sheweth,

THAT for as much as the Petitioner can with a safe Conscience affirm, and solemnly protest, That whenever his Allegiance or Accession has been in relation to publick Business since the Beginning of the Troubles, till his Majesty's Departure hence in the Year 1657, though he will not purge himself of Errors, Failings, and Mistakes, both in Judgment and Practice, incident to human Frailty, and common to him, if not with the whole, at least with the greatest Part of the Nation; yet in one thing, though he were to die, he would still avouch, and retain his Innocency, that he never intended any thing treacherously, out of any malicious Design against his Majesty's late Royal Father or Government; or that he present Majesty (whom God may long preserve), their Persons or Government; but endeavoured always to his utmost for settling the Difference between their Majesties and the People. And as to any Accusings before the Year 1649, or from the said Year, till his Majesty being in the Parliament at Perth and Sterling, your Petitioner did with a full Assurance rely upon his gracious Majesty, and his Royal Father, their Trust, Approbation, Oblivion, and Indemnity, for what was past, and most freely believed that the same should never have risen in Judgment, or that the Petitioner should have been drawn in question thereunto. And during his Majesty's Absence, and being forced from the Exercise of his Royal Government by the late Uffers's, and long after that the Nation, by their Depots, had accepted of their Authority and Government, and they in Possession, the Petitioner was forced to Capitulation with them, being in their Hands, and under Sickness, and the same was, after all Endeavours used, according to the Duty of a good Subject; and upon the Petitioner's Part, is innocent and necessary for Self-preservation, without the least Intention, Addition, or Effect to his Majesty's Persecution: That albeit upon Misinformation (as the Petitioner humbly conceives) his Allegiance and Compliance both in their Designs and Quality have been mis-represented, as particularly singular and personal, staining the Petitioner as a degree of guilt beyond others, and incapable of pardon; the same base is far prevailed upon his Majesty, as to cloud and damp the propitious and comfortable rays of his Royal Grace and Favour, and have stained his gracious inclination beyond an natural disposition of clemency express'd to his other Subjects, to commit the Petitioner's person, and give way to the trial of his enmities and afflings: Yet to firmly rooted is the Petitioner's persuasion of his Majesty's Justice and Clemency, and that he intends the reclaiming, and not the ruin of the menarch of his Subjects, who retain their loyalty, duty, and good affection to his Person and Government; that upon true and right consideration of the Petitioner's carriage and steps, he shall be able to vindicate himself of these aspersions, and shall give his Majesty Satisfaction; at least so far to extricate his guilt, as may render him in all object of that Royal Clemency, which is of that depth, that having swallowed and pass by, not only personal but national guiltiness, of much more a deeper dye than any the Petitioner can be charged with, or made out against him; and so will not strain to pass by and pardon the faults and failings of a person, who never acted but in a publick right way, without any sinister or treacherous design against his Majesty or his Royal Father; and against which he can defend himself either by acts of approbation and obvious in words, principles, which he conceives to be the supreme, sacred, and invaluable security, or which he was forced to, much against his inclination, by an indisputable necessity. And albeit his Majesty's grace and favour is usually tryed to no other rule but his royal will and pleasure; yet his Majesty's is innate, essential, and inseparable a quality of his royal nature, that the Petitioner is persuaded in all human certainty, that the leaving and committing to his Parliament (as is express'd in his Majesty's Declaration of Oath 12th last by-past) the trying and judging of the enmities of his Subjects during the late troubles, as indeed it is in its own nature, and ought to be accepted of all, as an undoubted evidence of his Majesty's affection to, and confidence in his people; so no other trial or judging is therein intended, but a fair, full, legal and usual Trial, without any prejudice, passion, or premeditation, or preception; like as by the said Declaration there was a freedom for all the people interited, to make their application to the Parliament, or in the mean time to the Committee, from whom only his Majesty is pleased to declare he would receive address and information. And being it was the Petitioner's misfortune, during the sitting of the said Committee, to be prisoner in England; whereas if he had been prisoner here in Scotland, he would have made application to them, and would have craved, and in justice expected that preception might have been taken by them, to whom the preparing and ordering of that affair (to wit, against the Trial of the Subjects carriage during the troubles) was recommended, that the Petitioner's absence, which was his misfortune, not his fault, may not be prejudicial, being the Petitioner has lately received two several Dunters, whereas there be many crimes guilty field, with all the aspersions and aggravations imaginable laid to his charge; importing no less than the loss of his life, name, and estate, and the ruin of him and his posterity; which he is confident is not intended by his Majesty. And that by the Law and Practice of this Kingdom, consistent to all reason and equity, the Petitioner ought to have upon his desire a preception, for taking the deposition of certain persons, which being frequently and usually granted in this country, when any person is detained for any crime, and therefore innocence before he was brought to a Trial, at his desire, preception was taken in all business relating thereto; which the Petitioner in all humility conceives, ought much more not to be denied to him, not only by reason of respect to his quality, and of the importance and consequences thereof to all his Majesty's Subjects of all quality in all time coming; but also in regard it has been so granted and intended by his Majesty's Declaration aforesaid; like as the manner of the crimes objected, being always in times of wars and troubles, the guilt thereof was not personal and particular, but rather national and universal, and veiled and covered with a sort of indempnity and oblivion; and so tender and ticklish, that if duly considered, after a hearing allowed to the Petitioner, in prudence and policy, will not be found expedient to be tried in public, or touched with every band, but rather to be precepted upon by some wife, sober, noble, and judicious persons, for their several other labours in the paper before annexed. Nor does the Petitioner desire the same without antecedents, nor needs the same breed any longer delay; nor is it fought among an end of all to his Majesty's power, and vindication of the Parliament's innocency, as to many particulars where-with he is aspersed; and it would be seriously considered, that certum Confessio nullis longis agit equat de vicio hominis, far less can this small delay, which is usual, and to this case most expedient, if not absolutely necessary, be refused, ne agitur sine filium de vicio, sed de fama, and of all worldly concerns that can be dear or of value to any man.

Upon consideration of the premises, it is humbly craved, That your Grace, and the Honourable Estates of Parliament, may grant the Petitioner's desire, and to give Warrant to this purpose to depend before your Grace, and the Estates of Parliament, upon such interrogatories as your Petitioner shall give in, for clearing of several things concerning his intention and loyalty during the troubles. And for such as are out of the Country, and Strangers, residents in England, Committee may be directed to fetch as your Grace and the Parliament shall think fit, to take their depositions upon Oath, and to return the same.

And your Petitioner shall ever pray, &c.

Edinburgh, February 12, 1661.

This Petition being read, was refused:

THE Marquis of Argyle (being accused of High-Treason, at the instance of Sir John Flecker, his Majesty's Advocate for his late Majesty) was brought to the Bar. His Lordship humbly desired but to speak a few words before reading the indictment; assuring to speak nothing in the cause any particular quarrel at one another; that in June 1646, he and I were fully agreed upon Article and Condition, contained in a Treaty published by the Gentleman, in yet also who carried the messages both by word and writing between us; and it was neither his fault nor mine that the business did not go at that time, which (as is known to all) proved very disadvantageous to the Kingdom thereafter.

The fifth calumny is concerning my dealing with the English after Windsor fight. It is well known, my Lord, to many, that myself, and the Gentlemen of Staffordshire, Kent, Wiltshire, and Trent, endeavored to bring all the English about them on all hands against the English (which they did not prevail in), but was most unhappily made known to the English Commanders for the time, which they took so much to be published (as a very notable discovery) in these Newsbooks, which disclosed two sad disadvantages to us. For they not only caused our attempts in the instant, but did determine the latter it to be so, and so, whereby two of my Regiments of Foot, (Lord's and Lord's) and very near the number of one of Horse (and the constant of all the Regiments) were lost to England; and when David was there at place I could not be with a great disorder of sickness (as Dr. Cartwright, and many others who were with me, can witness). So, my Lord, I was so put to, when I was violently in these hands, yet contrary to them, which I did absolutely refuse, upon all the hazard of the interest of that nation, as also what I was so determined to do, is therefore ready to be shown, whereby I will commend their Prudence upon demand.

I shall, my Lord, add one reason more to clear this (which is many other weighty public reasons and considerations, which I shall further mention at this time), it being most natural to bring them in by way of defence afterwards, in my own interest, and of all Noblemen and Superiors in England. It may naturally be presumed, that I had been a very faithful folk, if over I had been for promoting such an Authority and Interest over myself, as I should have, and was so fully determined to in all that difference, myself and other Noblemen, from their own will, which (which may say I was so carried in) yet it being absolutely dangerous to all true Nobility, and my Ancestors and I, as it is said in this history having had to make titles of honor, dignity, and man at place in it, as it is concerned upon by his Majesty's Royal Professors and his Lord's all for our constant Loyalty and Adherence to the Crown on all occasions, as the Records and Histories of this ancient Kingdom have borne, besides the narratives of all our great, and after the just privileges thereof, against all opposition. I did, my Lord, ever (even when the English were at the memorable night of Windsor) declare my true affection to a Commonwealth Government, which was well known to them all. I was not, my Lord, very dissatisfied, when there were reasons (spread abroad of Charles's being made a King (as some have printed can witness)), for I told them it was a most probable way for Charles, and the more it was encouraged, it would tend the more to Charles, and their deformed Commonwealth's Government's ruin, and promote his Majesty's full interest in the state. My Lord, I shall not much blame my Lord's Advocate for doing his endeavor, (as being an officer in part of his function to execute) but I would say, that it is very hard measure, that for a man has taken care in many months, in taking pains to prevent as many enemies as his perfections could possibly invite, to vent out the highest notes of clear mind, and being out of his by then for, and collecting all the bad aspects of reason (to give them their genuine term) I may call them a certain sort of the common clothes of the Country, thereby to advise misinformations to all the public actions of both Parliaments and Committees during the late troubles, and with strange and remote informations to adduce all those in the channel of my particular actions, he himself, I say, my Lord, as many smooth, as I have had days to suffer them, being, as exceeding disadvantage. But, my Lord, that's not all; I am likewise extremely troubled, that he labours in that (which is not to draw an obscure veil of perpetual oblivion over all my good services, and especially my faithful and loyal endeavours in relieving of his sacred Majesty in the Crown of this most ancient Kingdom of England, and the exercise of his Majesty's royal authority therein; with my cordial endeavours for his Majesty's settlement to the rest of his Dominions also: which his Majesty both knows, and has been pleased often to acknowledge it to have been good service. Yet, and many protest in this honorable House know, that I committed both my zeal and affection to the utmost of my power for his Majesty's service in that particular, which I willingly acknowledge nothing, my Lord, but my duty, whereas I was both by nature, civil, and Christian bound to my Sovereign, and especially such a King, of whom I may say well, (as I have often affirmed) That he is a King in whom the Lord has been pleased to take such pleasure, as to perfect his Majesty with to many superlative degrees of excellency, that will certainly exalt his Majesty's fame, both in our age, and to subsequent posterity, above all the Monarchs in the world. So that, my Lord, we may consequently discover a high demonstration of the Lord's singular beneficence and special providence care for us his Majesty's Subjects, in preserving such a rich blessing as his sacred Majesty, (in whom the happiness of these Nations is wrapped up) under the safe wings of his divine Protection. I may say, even when the extravagant malice of men would have been allowed him up.

After my Lord had ended the discourse (being heard by all very attentively, without any interruptions), thus the Lord Advocate spoke to my Lord Chancellor:

My Lord, what can the Marquis of Argyle say to the opposition at Edinburgh, in June 1641?

The Marquis replied, that he found my Lord Advocate endeavored to bring him to debate the particulars, (which he hoped should be cleared at another more convenient time) and was answering the thing itself, but he said thus:

My Lord Chancellor,

I have (informally only) hinted a little at the main things which I am often charged with, my memory cannot fully reach all, neither will time permit to circumscribe their particulars, which I have only touched in the general; nor is it my purpose at present to fall on the debate of any of that Libel (not having yet confuted the protest) by reason these Advocates (my Lordships) have pleased to allow me, have not yet all embraced, and the results of my ordinary Advocacy (in whom I had confidence) being admitted as relevant. And these Gentlemen, that have been pleased (in obedience to your Lordship's command) to come here with me, not being much acquainted with matters of this weight, and not having embraced till within these two or three days, so that they are strangers altogether to my case; I shall, therefore, my Lord, humbly desire, that a convenient time may be allowed me, that I may prepare my defence, and I shall (God willing) abundantly clear every particular in that Libel. And also, my Lord, humbly desire, that these other Advocates, who were ordered by your Lordship to assist me, and also the honorable Lords of Articles, who bear testimony, (as I called them formerly), may be allowed to confer and appear for me.

The Marquis's Advocate entered a protestation, that what should happen to escape them in pleading (either by word or writ) for the life, honor, and estate of the said noble Marquis, their client, might not thereafter be avoided to them as disadvantageous; whereas they took no offence.

The Marquis assured my Lord Chancellor, that he knew not of any such protestation to be presented, and that it flowed simply of themselves. Whereupon the Lord Chancellor desired the Marquis and his Advocates to remove, till the House should consider both of my Lord's desire, and the Advocates protestation.

The Marquis and his Advocates being removed, the House (after some small debate) resolved, as to my Lord Marquis's desires, his Lordship should have till the 25th of February to give in his defenses as writ, and ordered Mr. And to be one of his Advocates.

As to the Advocates protestation, the House resolved, that they could not be allowed to speak in cases of treason either by word or writ, but upon their pet; only allowed them in the general, as such as in such cases was adjudged to any.

The Marquis and his Advocates being called in, my Lord Chancellor intimated the aforesaid refusal of the House, both in reference to my Lord Marquis, and to the Advocates protestation.

When my Lord Chancellor had done, the Marquis spoke as follows:

My Lord Chancellor, There is one thing that has almost engaged me, against that opposition at Edinburgh, that, that my Lord Advocate was speaking of, that it may not stick with any of this honorable Meeting, I shall (most modestly) declare, that after the defeat at Prigby, I was desired to come and meet with the Committee of Estates (meaning those who were in the then Engagement), and being come with some of my friends to Stirling, fearing no harm, and expecting nothing, I was invaded by Sir George Adams, where several of my friends were killed, and myself hardly escaped, which is all that can be said I shall in arms, as may be known.

My Lord, not that I am any ways diffident, but I shall in due time clear every particular of that Libel; yet I am not a little troubled that some who have heard the calumnies therein, may let them have such an impression (being affected with false confidence) as to conceive a possibility, if not a probability of their being true; I shall therefore desire to reach charity from this honorable Meeting, that there be no hard thoughts entertained till I be fully heard.

The Marquis therefore, with the joint concurrence of his Advocates, humbly desired, that the Bill (containing many pungent calumnies) for a prosecution of his process, given to the honorable Lords of Articles, might be read and considered in plain Parliament.

To which my Lord Chancellor replied, that it had been formerly refused at the Articles, and that it would not be granted. So his Lordship was carried back to the Castle.

Edinburgh, March 5, 1661, at the Parliament House.

The Marquis of Argyle being called in, gave in a Bill, containing several weighty Reasons, shewing a continuance till the meeting of Parliament tomorrow. The House being removed, after long debate it was carried against him by six or seven votes; and his Lordship being called in, my Lord Chancellor said that it was refused, and so desired his Lordship to produce his defenses; whereas he spoke as follows:

My Lord, please your Grace,

MY Lord Chancellor, this business is of very great concernment to me, and not small in the preparation of it to the whole Nation; yet, it may concern many of your Lordships who are sitting here, and your posterity; and therefore I desire to have your Grace (my Lord Commissioner) and the remaining Members of this honorable Meeting, your patience to hear me a few words without prejudice or mis-construction, which any other I can say is under obligation to.

I shall, my Lord, begin with the words of that good King Henry (Henry), that good King of France (after he was come back in peace to France) in his instructions to his Judges, he desired them to take heed what they do, for they judge not for men, but for the Lord, who is with them in the judgment.

My Lord, I shall speak another word to many young men, who were either not born, or so young that it is impossible they could know the beginning or such business, which are contained in the Libel against me, (being all that hath been done since the year 1638) so that they might have heard by report what was done, but not why, at upon what grounds; and what some have suffered, but not what they have deserved. Therefore I desire your Lordship's charity, until all the particulars, and several circumstances of every particular be heard, whereby which no man can judge rightly of any action. For as it is well observed by that unaccomplished Grotius, that Argyle affords, That there is more certainty in the mathematics than morals; for as Grotius has it, the mathematics separates forms from matters, as between freight and crested there is no matter; but in morals, even the least circumstances vary the matter, so that they are wont to have something besides them, with such intrudes, that the people is more concerned to this, sometimes to that extreme, so that between that which ought to be done, and that which ought not to be done, is interpreted that which may be done, but is never now so this than to the other extremity, or past, where that the Pannal has contravened by committing the particular deeds libeled, and to leaving him to great uneasiness. Whereas in all Law, Reason, and form of process, the defendant ought to be certified what Edward Lawe he has contravened, by committing such deeds, that are in a multiplicity of crimes. After proving all the Statutes relating to the same crimes, all the deeds individually ought to be libeled, falling under the compass of such Statutes, and thereafter the Acts relating to another indifferent crime ought to be propounded, and the deeds falling under the compass of these Acts individually libeled, and then upon the libel, which is so very done, the heartiness in many different Acts accumulated together, for the propounding, and therein all most different facts accumulated together individually in the falsefession, not considering on the Acts by them contravened, and therefore the libel is waeps, and the defendant ought to be acquitted therefrom.

BEFORE the defender come to his particular answer to the several articles of the defence, to the effect the defender's case, in his answer to the public addressings of this kingdom, during the unhappy troubles till the treaty of Breda, and his Majesty's home-courtesy, may be truly rated; it is humbly craved that the Commissioner's Grace and honourable House of Parliament may be pleased to remember, that the Kirk and whole body of this Kingdom entered at first into the national covenant, for defence of religion and his Majesty's person and authority, and mutual defence one of another in maintaining the same; whereas, and in what followed in profane treachery till the treaty with his late Majesty, and Act of oblivion, for down at length and pushed in the 4th Act of the said Parliament, anno 1643, his late Majesty did so far acknowledge and approve their loyalty, that in the seventh article of the said large treaty his Majesty was pleased to appoint, that at the close of this treaty, these said loyalty should be made known to the face of the world, that being in all places particularly in the said churches, that his Majesty's dominions. And in the said Act of pacification and oblivion, it pleased to declare, that their constant loyalty in their intimation and proceedings should not be hereafter called in question, and that whatsoever fell forth in those tumultuous times, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, to the laws and liberty of the church, or the particular interest of the subject, might be buried in perpetual oblivion; and whatever had ensued thereon, no mention should be made thereof in judgment or without: like as that justice for himself and his successors, promises, verbo Principis, necesse est come in contrary to the said Statute, not any thing therein contained; but to hold the same firm and stable, and to cause it to be truly observed, and their presents to have the full force and strength of a peaceful and true covenant. Like as thereafter as anno 1643, the league and covenant was entered in with the House of Parliament, upon the ground of the large treaty, by the Church and whole body of this Kingdom, for proving the said ends of the said covenant, for maintenance of Religion, Kirk, and Kingdom; which was thereafter approved by the Parliament, 1644, and fifth Act thereof, and proceeded by laws both within and without the fifth Art. 4, by the authority of divers succeeding Parliaments; church and State going unanimously along together, without any apparent public difference till the year 1648. And even then that Parliament, 1648, so highly homely gave to said league and covenant, that they declare the breaches thereof to be the grounds of their resolutions of that war, Act 4, 7 and 8; and their desires for preventing thereof to be the fulfilling of the same, Idem. The necessary qualification required in all with whom they would join either in their armies or committees, is, that they be such who were of known faithfulness to the cause and content in the said Art. 4, and that they would approve, and endeavour to suppress the enemies to the cause and covenant on all hands. And Winding up the whole, that they severed not from the public cause, and content of the national, whole league and covenant, and that they be resolved wholly and conformably to adhere therunto, and to hold the said thereof. So that at that time there was still no difference as to the cause and covenant, any difference being only in the manner, and not in the matter of their proceedings.

Therefore what fears this poor Kingdom was reduced to, by the defeat of that engagement, and how unable it was to make resistance to that English army, who, in prosecution of their victory, came to the borders, and entered the same, it stood out to all; whereas the whole Kingdom being furnished with ammunition, and in great hazard, it was hard to that juncture of affairs to refuse upon any coarse for procuring the same, or further imminent hazard of the Kingdom. The King upon a Shuram of the Council of Estates appointed by his said Majesty, and so forth, was most desirous to take up, when the same matters were brought before him, the conditions of peace, not being able to resist by force the power and strength of the Nation being broken by the said defeat; and to accept the same upon the usual terms that could be had for the time; which as it was considered upon no other intention, or for any other end but that which they were constrained to by inevitable necessity, so at that time it was generally looked upon as good service, and which at that time was most necessary to evade very great, and otherwise inevitable evils, being other necessary to confederate to their demands at that time, or otherwise to have delivered the persons of all that had professed the said engagements, according to the obedience of the late treaty, together with the facts and strength of the Kingdom. The succeeding Parliament for the time, in the year 1649, and succeeding Parliament, and the proceedings in the year 1649, according to the said treaty, which was thereafter ratified by his said Majesty, and his Parliament at Perth and Stirling, and after the royal example of his ever-glorious Father, an act of oblivion was issued, whereby all that might be ground of question was buried in oblivion, and pardoned by a general Act of oblivion, as a most full and ample form.

Thus being the state of public affairs during the time aforesaid, albeit by the full and arduous of the duty, the defender in charged with deeds and public address, coming within the compass of the full approbation and oblivion aforesaid; yet such firm reliance both be of his Majesty's perfidious in his gracious clemency, which does in his royal heart so much abound, that albeit his Majesty by his proclamation, dated the 20th of October last, did command him to be forthwith declared, that he has realized to his Parliament the trial of the earnings of his subjects in Scotland during the late troubles: That the late troubles have only respect to the time during the offender's position, and that trial should be taken during that time of the subject's earnings. The defender in all humility conceiving, that it is no ways to be supposed, that his gracious Majesty did thereby intend to stip up active, or to indicate any new trial of the said offender, except in such manner, as he should be bound to be supported on the basis of his merces, should be submitted to this his ancient Kingdom, to which he has upon all occasions given so many signal and recent testimonials of his sapientissimum know, than they are, and have been to his subjects of his other dominions, to whom, according to his Majesty's declarations, he hath granted a full and free pardon, from which few, and chiefly only the unpardonable murderers of his royal Father, are excepted; for whom, as it is well known, no punishment can be sufficient. And therefore, the defender in all humility conceives the said articles, though libellous, are not to be insisted on.

The solemnity of the oath, both of coronant and league, will be, as the defender hopes, pregnant withproofs to put an end to all controversy, ~~and~~ ^{and} the sincerity of his [as of the Church and Kingdom] their loyal intentions for the maintenance of the person and authority of our dread Sovereign, whereto they were thereby so religiously engaged; and the constant tenor of his acting still by virtue of publick orders and warrants of Parliament, and these Committes, wherein his faithfulness in the execution was also in the like manner approved; and that what he did was for the service of his Majesty, for the publick good, whereto he conceived himself engaged in manner aforesaid. Nor was the defender for committing of these unwarlike civil disorders, as he did witness by his inclination to an accommodation with ~~his~~ ^{his} Majesty, in the year 1645, mentioned after in answer to the tenth article, which albeit fully agreed to between him and the defender, yet he could not obtain the Committee's approbation thereof, which is an evidence, that the defender had not the chief force of Affairs, and was always inclinable to peace, as being secured, like the carrying on an engagement in the year 1648, though he was in difficulties, and in great want of money, the way and manner, upon the grounds and reasons thereafter expressed in answer to the ninth article, doth clearly evince, that he had not the chief force in publick affairs. And what power and success he had in the year 1646, as he did faithfully, according to his best duty, improve the same for removing these differences between his Majesty and his subjects, wherein he was passionately earnest, as shall be made appear in answer to the sixth tenth article. And after his Majesty's coming comming up during his being in the Kingdom, and ever after, all the remedy had in his power, as he did by his Articles of agreement, to remove these differences, he faithfully served his Majesty, and even during his Majesty's absence, did always, and still shall, returne loyal duty and good affection to his person, government, and posterity.

and go wherever there are men, grown up or my judge, who only for the unhappy and accidental events that are the effects of the corruption of men, but have not known the counsels and rules which are the two parts of their things necessary to be known to all who would judge of human actions right, events being for the most part uncertain, and the worst of events of times, through the corruption of agents, or other accidental circumstances following upon the belt of actions, yet had they been intimately acquainted with the grounds, causes, and nature of the actions, and being, the defender is confident that they would not have been and been of the same judgment, and would have reversed the proceedings had no nature of the same judgment, and would have reversed the proceedings had no nature

And now to come to the particular delators to the several points of the subornation, of the delay. And first as to the article of the subornation, among the words alleged, spoken at the ford of Lisse, which are labelled to have been, That it was the opinion and judgment of many lawyers and divines, that a King might be deposed for dejection, vendition, or irreligion; and which is alleged to have been meant by the counsel of the then King's Majesty; and the perjurament adjured for enforcing that to have been the defendant's meaning, are found which were accordingly kept, not without some difficulty, the inhabitants of the town, by reason of prejudice done to them, being highly incensed against the Lad Col and.

As to the part of the said article, anent the transporting of the King's Cannon and Ammunition, not relevant to infer the Conclusion, none of the Acts libelled on concluding against any such fact, the said crime of Treason; and the truth is, the Defendant did never transport any Cannon or Ammunition out of the said Castle, but two Cannons, which the Duke of Richmond, heritable Keeper thereof, gifted to the Defendant, and which he would never have gifted, if they had not been his own, and not the King's. 2. The Defendant ought to be absolved from the said article, and all deeds therein contained, the same having also preceded the said Act of oblivion, in anno 1641.

4. And as to the fourth article of the Dittay, anent the Defendant's calling, or causing to be called a convention of Estates, in anno 1643, entering in league with his Majesty's enemies, employing excise and subsidies on the Kingdom, raising an army, entering England thereunto, fighting for and with the Rebels there; it is answered, That the whole contents of this article of the Dittay are charged personally on the Defendant, to contrary to the notoriety of the matter of the fact known to both Kingdoms, and to his Majesty's Commissioners of Grace, and to the whole Parliament; yea, to the said Parliament, 1644, relating and approving all the Acts that are made prints of this article; that there need no more but propose to the Commons to all, and to repeat out of the said public Law and Act of Parliament, what is therein libelled, to evince that they are not the Defendant's persons; does: but the Commissioners (Commissioners established by his Majesty's) Convention of Estates, and of the whole Church and Kingdoms of Scotland, and approved by Parliament, 1644, in the said 6th Act thereof, Fulleth them in this notoriety, for it is clear by that Act, that the said Convention of Estates was called not by the Defendant, as it is libelled, but by his Majesty's Privy-Council, Commissioners for conferring the Articles of the Treaty therein mentioned, and Commissioners of common burdens, all established by his Majesty's authority in anno 1643, which Commissioners considering that article in the large Treaty, bearing the Kingdom of Scotland therein to be for only the Kingdom, and conformity in Church-Government, as a special means for continuing at peace between the two Kingdoms; in answer thereto his Majesty, with advice of both Houses of Parliament in England, doth declare his approbation of their affection in their desire of having conformity of Church-Government between the Nations; and as the Parliament had already taken to consideration the reformation of Church-Government; so they would proceed therein in due time; and this was one of the main grounds whereupon both Houses entered the said league. (2.) That the calling and entering the League and Covenant, was an Act of that Convention of Estates, not the Defendant's personal act.

(3.) That the League and Covenant was entered in with the two Houses of the Long Parliament, and assistance given to them in fighting with or for their army, or otherwise, which is libelled fighting with Rebels. The point of fact being that charged in opposition to the Dittay, as it is answered, That the said two Members of this article are falsified under none of the Acts of Parliament libelled on in the proposition, there being no Act of Parliament libelled against meetings, bands or leagues in general; or in special betwixt the two Nations or Estates thereof. 3. As to the remaining members of the article, they can no ways be relevant (with all fulmination) except it were qualified, that the two Houses of the Long Parliament, to whom the assistance libelled was given, that they were Enemies and Rebels; but that the Defendant is constant it will not be said, because by his Majesty's Act of Oblivion, 25 April, 1650, his Majesty, after his happy Restoration, declares, that what was acted even against his Majesty, and his Royal Father, by his Subjects in England during these times, therefore shall not be entered in question at all, so much as to the prejudice of their reputation, in manner as length contained in that gracious Act. And how loyal the Long Parliament was, did appear as that the Defender dwelt never attempt anything against his Majesty's person, till they were broken; as also what loyalty the declared Members of that Parliament have (as became them) shewed to his Majesty as his just and glorious Restoration, is known to all Europe, to their eternal commendation and renown: No doubt as from confidence of their oath of duty and allegiance, so of the oath of God wherewith they bound themselves to maintain his Majesty's person, authority and greatness, as well as Religion, in that Covenant. 4. All the fore-said deeds, which are the members of this article, etc. The calling the said Convention of Estates, as being the Act of the fore-said Council and Commissioners, the entering in the League and Covenant, raising of the army for assisting the two Houses of Parliament of England, employing excise, &c. as all being acts of the said Convention of Estates, together with the same Convention of Estates, as all approved by the said 6th Act of Parliament, 1644. In respect whereof the Defendant ought to be absolved from this whole article, and all the crimes contained therein. 5. Not only is the said calling of the said Convention of Estates, and the said Convention entering in the League and Covenant, employing excise, raising of Forces for the Parliament of England, and remaining Acts of the said Convention approved by the said 6th Act of Parliament of 1644; but by his Majesty's Treaty of Bruns, and the Act of Oblivion, in the Parliament holden at St. James's and Stirling, in anno 1650 and 1651, or either of them, all things done during these times contained, concerning between the said Act of Oblivion 1641, and his Majesty's home-coming 1650, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, or to the Laws and Liberties of the Church and Kingdom, or to the particular interest of the subject, are buried in perpetual oblivion. And by the said Treaty and Act of Ratification of the said Parliament, or one or other of them, the said Parliament 1644, and all Acts thereof are ratified; and to amongst the rest, this which is the 5th Act, which approves all the Acts, wherewith the 4th article of the Dittay is founded, and therefore the Defendant ought to be absolved therefrom.

5. As to the 5th Article, anent the burning of the house of Monckton, in anno 1645, the Defendant is to innocent thereof, that if it were libelled relevantly, he needed no other defence but a simple denial; but the truth is, that it had been burnt by ignis of the soldiers, commanded by Major-General

Neill Bain, for the time, upon the greatest provocations that could be by two parties, viz. Monckton and Dulor, having been burnt the night before, and several, both men, women and children, cruelly killed by the concourse of those that were in that house. But it is no way relevantly libelled, in so far as it is libelled, that the Defendant, or others under his command, burnt it: 1. Because there is no Act of Parliament, of all the Acts libelled upon in the proposition, wherewith this can be falsified; especially the Acts anent the raising of an army, upon which (if upon any) it seems it is particularly founded, there is no such old extension of this so high a crime, as to make any guilty of it, by committing it by others, who are under their command. And this was a very unbecoming, terrible circumstance; and in the present case were such dangerous and unjust, that a Commander should be holden to answer for all the illegal deeds done by his soldiers. 2. It is against common justice, the Common Law, by which this therefore is well established, that delicta propriis rebus autibus, et non capitis sequitur; and therefore it is not relevant that the Defendant burnt it by himself, or others by his special direction, or private order for that effect.

4. Though it were made relevant in manner fore-said, yet the Dittay is inapt as to this article, and the Defendant ought yet to be absolved therefrom, because the year of God is only libelled, to-wit, the year 1645; whereas not only the month, as in all criminal libels, per St. Andrew's 3^d de falsificatione, and the Doctors treating thereupon, but the very day ought to be falsified on; for the omission of the day prejudices the Defendant of his defence; specially he adds, which he might and would propose, if the day were falsified on, that being requisite, the day ought to be falsified on, otherwise the libel is inapt. Now Exhibere deum contra omnes homines amicos et inimicos, per St. Andrew's 3^d de falsificatione consecratione suam addit. Dunsdale, cap. 3. num. 4. 5. Defensor Reg. 6. num. 4. Maranta in spec. de del. crim. 3. num. 12. per hoc in L. de parric. reus 3. in fin. de publi. judic. & Testis in L. Unusquisque 3. de parric. reus 3. de re quod Crim. lib. But for it is, that if the day were falsified on of the said burning, the Defendant might, and if need were, would offer to prove, that he was that day, during all the time of the burning, able, at a considerable distance from the same place.

3. Defensor, because Licentiam Generis Baron, at that time when the house was burnt, had the command of the said forces (adjoining to the ways to the former defences against the approach and relevancy of this part of the Dittay, and expending the same that may be delictis ante anno); in respect whereof the Defendant ought to be absolved ab hoc libello, at least there can be no process upon that part of the Dittay, as it is now libelled. 4. Albeit the Defendant had burnt, or given direction only to burn the said house, as he had not; yet by special Act and commission of Lieutenantcy, granted him by the Parliament 1644, he was empowered to pursue the Mercenarii, and their adherents and accomplices, with all kind of hostility, by fire and sword, (with a dispensation) with baggage, mattresses, raffings of fire, affailing of houses, taking of prisoners, and other incircumstances whatsoever, that should fall out in the execution of that Commission in pursuing of them; as the said Act and Commission may at length bear, and which commission is ratified by his Majesty in the Treaty at Bruns, and ratification of that Session of Parliament 1644, anent the other Parliaments and Sessions thereof ratified by his Majesty, all after 1641, and preceding his return. But to it is, that the said Mercenarii were at that time, at the burning of the said house, joined with Monckton; and it was in pursuance of both that the said house was burnt, as is notorious, (and, if need be, the Defendant will prove) and therefore though he had burnt, or given direction for the burning thereof, he ought to be absolved.

3. By Act of Parliament, 30th Act, 22 March, 1657, it is statute and ordered, that all his Majesty's good subjects shall be altogether free, and liberate in all time coming, from being by any ways called, convicted, pursued, troubled or molested in judgment, civil or criminal, or out with the same, for any deed done, or to be done by them, against the persons, lands or goods, of such as have, or shall be in the rebellion; (by which it is notorious, that the force armed opposition, made by the deceased Marquis of Monckton and the said Mercenarii, and others under his command, to the Estates, is understood) during the time of their being in the said rebellion, or have been, or shall be guilty with the rebels in their wicked concert, or of any of them, who came under the 6th or second Clauses of delinquencies, contained in the 5th Act of the 5th Session of that Parliament holden at St. Andrew's in the month of January, 1646. But to it is, the Defendant offers to prove, that he, that is, the said John de Stirling, named Charles de Stirling, who had, as either of them had right to Monckton, had joined with Monckton and those under him; and so came under the second clause of the said 5th Act of the 5th Session of Parliament, 1646: Or at least, went or sent into their league, or without compulsion entered them in the said house; and therefore the Defendant ought not to be pursued, even though he had burnt, or given direction to burn the said house (as he now says), and being pursued, ought to be absolved from this article; like as it is conjectura alleged for the Deiver in falsification of the said Act, That the same is ratified by his Majesty's large Treaty at Bruns, as being one of the Acts of that Session of Parliament, 1644, which amongst the other Sessions of Parliament, and Acts thereof, since the year 1641, and preceding his Majesty's return, is anno 1650, etc. ratified by the said Treaty, as also by the Act of ratification, at St. James's & Stirling, in anno 1650 and 1651. By which ratification (or ratification of his Majesty by the Treaty at Bruns) the said Act of Parliament 50, in anno 1647, comes (as a most solemn remission granted by his Majesty, and whole Estates of Parliament, to the persons therein contained); and so like as if every one of them had got a particular remission in forma, it had been an unconquerable remission for what were therein contained, so must it now be, being in effect of the same nature and virtue, albeit may be included in one.

6. By the Act of Oblivion at St. James's or Stirling, in the year 1650 or 1651, all acts of hostility, whether between the King and his Subjects, or between Subject and Subject, and what things fell out in their time, between the year 1641, and his Majesty's return, whether prejudicial to his Majesty's honour and authority, or to the Laws of the Kingdom,

2. A guile and ruse is no way relevant to infer the commission of the crime; but by direct law, Law of Nations, immemorial practices of the Kingdom, its authorities, a Member of Parliament or other Council, should give advice or support, according to the petition of the good or ill of the subject debated on, and under consideration; wherein if his reason cannot bring him up, nor his conscience admit him the length of others in such public Councils, he ought to have charity for the one, and excuse for the other.

Like as by the 4th Act, Part. 2. K. Charles I. it is expressly Statute, That every Member of Parliament shall faithfully and freely speak, answer and express themselves upon all and every thing which is proposed, as far as they think in their conscience may conduce to the glory of God, the peace of the Church and State, and employ their best endeavours to procure the same. Under which oath, (read in the audience of the late House, and by him approved in the Parliament, 1641) the defender, as a Peer of that Parliament, in June 1642, was solemnly and to the debates of his reason, and prospects of his conscience, and cannot be called in question as a Member, having freedom therein; and conform thereto in such of this present Parliament, bearing, that every Member shall faithfully and freely, according to their best judgment, give their advice and vote in Parliament.

To the second part of the first member of the said Article, against the defender's proceeding and dissenting from the said Act, 1642; it is alleged for the defender, The protestation is not produced as it ought to be, whereby it will appear, that if any was, the same was before the Act of Parliament passed; and that they did only protest and cause their dissent against proceeding to the determination of the question then on hand, which comes the later to have been in force the Act was made. Like as the defender also, a Member of the Members of Parliament then present, That being asked, if they would retract the protestation after the Act, they dissented to do so; the Act being now passed.

3. A protest, (tho' the same was produced) because it is offered to be proved, was therefore read in the fourth Act, Part. 2. Sec. 2. Charles II. which was approved at the treaty at Breda, and confirmed at Perth and Stirling, as a fact. But for the honourable Parliament, their most full clearing, against the defender's carriage in the fact particular, it is offered to be proved, if need be, That the defender (before the Commissioners return from the fact of Perth, in the fact year), when he heard that his Majesty had furnished his people's desires concerning religion, in presence of divers persons of honour, he expressed himself passionately earnest to engage for his Majesty's freedom. Like as the only difference of the opinion about the engagement was in the manner the grounds of those that were dissatisfied; being as they are expressed in the said protestation, now. That the Parliament should not proceed till the commission of the Church were satisfied; and adding also, (which is not therein expressed) till advertisements and three month's warning were given, conform to the large treaty; until all means of peace had been first essayed; and while first the lawfulness and necessity of that was found to be found by the Parliament, conform to the 7th Act thereof. And it is humbly conceived, that many in this present Parliament do remember, how unanimous all were, that his Majesty should be brought out of the hands of the Scotsmen, to some of his houses in or about London; and all they differed in was, that the Church should be consulted about the settling of Religion, all means of peace should first have been essayed, and warning given in manner aforesaid, conform to the large Treaty; the breach whereof was made out of the grounds of that declaration, Act 7. And it cannot be refused, but that at several meetings, the defenders showed the dangerousness of that war (especially if the army should be defeated), from the bad consequences that might thereupon ensue to the King, Kingdom and Religion; as immediately thereafter fell out. Whereas had the Nation been united and whole in their power and force, that army of Scotsmen, in probability, would not have dared to have attempted those matters which afterwards they did. So that the case being truly stated, there will appear no malice against his Majesty's person, authority, and nobility at that time, but an inclination to enter into a war of such danger and hazard, and the respect they had to the security of Religion (as all then professed) according to the Covenant.

To the second member of the sixth Article, whereby it is alleged, That in contempt of the authority of that Parliament, and against the preservation of his Majesty's person and authority, that the defender convoked an army of rebellious Subjects, and therewith committed divers and sundry outrages, slaughters and villainies, upon the persons and estates of his Majesty's Subjects, invaded cities and castles, seized upon magazines, arms and ammunition, and called in an army of Scotsmen to his assistance:

It is answered, first, That the time is not relevantly followed upon any act of the proposition; at least till the Advocate's conclusion upon which said thereof the issue is founded, the defender is not bound to make answer.

Secondly, The defender denies that he did convocate his forces, or gave counsel or command therefore: And as to his doing with them, he will be acquitted.

1. Because by a treaty at Stirling, betwixt the chief Officers of the army then alive, and out of prison, and a Quorum of Members of the Committee by authority of Parliament, 1642, who had power to order the internal Affairs of the Nation, the said meeting, and all acts of hostility, and others thereby committed, are expressly discharged, sub modo, and a mutual oblivion and indemnity thereupon.

2. Any meeting he had with them, was by a call of those of the Committee of Estates, who joined with those forces, and who in the Treaty is acknowledged the Committee of Estates.

3. The said meeting and settling thereof, together with the Treaty and Articles thereof, is ratified and approved by the third Act, a Part. 2. Sec. 2. Charles II.

The third member of the sixth Article, bearing, That apprehending his power was not able to withstand his Majesty's good subjects, the defender called in to his assistance the army of Scotland; and that he went into de re and not with the commander of that army, had private consultations with him, and prevailed with him to come to Stirling with his army, whole coming he might have hindered; because Oliver said, That he could not help his lying upon the terms of Mortification, for that his playing and going depended upon the defender; and that he did condescend and consult with the Scotsmen and their commanders, in Edinburgh, in the Campan, in the house called the Lady Hunt's Lodging.

It is answered, That as to speeches and consultations in general, not relevant except they were conducted on; and as to the words spoken by Granville, if spoken by him, it was a lye, and can infer nothing against the defender; and the occasion of his lye was still he got Barnard and Corbie, which could not be referred till the Treaty of Stirling was closed. And as to his meeting and treating with him, aforesaid, because he and others did the same in warrant of the Committee, and which Treaty was ratified in the fourth Act of Parliament aforesaid.

To the fourth member, That he convoked and tried to the drawing up of a letter, directed to Granville, wherein he and his compliers engaged themselves, in the name of the Kingdom of Scotland, to do their utmost endeavours, that more who had been accessory to the engagement, or in arms at Stirling, in pursuance thereof, should be employed in any place of Trust, without the advice and consent of the Parliament.

It is answered, 1. No such letters produced.

2. Though it were produced, yet containing and voting not relevant; because a vote in the Committee of Estates can infer no crime against the defender, nor any member thereof, nor any Act passed in the said Committee: especially being.

3. The Acts of the said Committee were ratified in the fourth Act of the Parliament aforesaid; all ratified thereby by the Treaty at Breda, and Acts of ratification at Perth and Stirling; and the necessity thereof would be also considered in respect of the large Treaty, both Kingdoms having given their public faith, that the breakers should be considered up to the shivers; and that the English army then upon the borders, required the performance thereof against the offenders, and for farther security, pledges and places of strength. It was at that time counted a great favour (considering their power to have made their own terms) when they might have imposed and forced what they pleased more, yet they did accept this Act.

To the fifth member of this article, bearing, That he did draw up, at least did counsel the drawing of certain instructions, given to Sir John Glyn, purporting, That the Noblemen, Gentlemen of quality, and considerable Officers, who went into England under Duke Hamilton, and were there prisoners, should be kept in pledge for the peace of the Kingdom:

It is answered, 1. Not produced as it ought to be, that it may thereby appear to be false; and 2. Not relevant, (out of the Committee) except they were libelled against, and voted at that time; for non appaet factum.

3. Not relevant, voted quia in finem non tenetur de capite.

4. Opposes the authority of the Committee, Treaty, Acts of Parliament, and Ratifications aforesaid.

To the last member of this Article, bearing, That he gave warrant under his hand for issuing of a proclamation against the families of the Laird of Ree and Fyvie:

It is alleged for the defender, 1. No such warrant produced; if any such warrant were produced under the defender's hand, it will certainly appear to be in contempt of some Committee, and so not his personal deed; nor that it did so can infer any crime against him.

2. No such proclamation issued.

3. Although issued, yet that took no effect, and so was minus tenetur, of course of office non productum.

4. Opposes the Act of the Committee, and Act of Parliament, 1649, aforesaid; which Parliament, and the whole Act thereof, is ratified in the Treaty at Breda, and approved in the Parliament at St. John's and Stirling; wherein was also made an Act of oblivion, afterwards before alleged on: in respect whereof the defender ought to be acquitted from the said sixth Article, and whole member thereof, and all therein contained. And because the defender has in his defence so oft alleged the Act of Parliament, 1649, for his vindication, he desires that it may be observed (which is very observable) that by the printed Treaty at Edinburgh and Stirling, September, 1648, it is agreed and appointed by both of the Committee at Stirling, 1648, that a Parliament should be down before the 10th of January next; conform thereto, they did convene and sit down the fourth of the month of January, as by the said Treaty, and the first and third Acts of the Parliament doth appear: whereby it is clear, that the said Parliament, 1649, was appointed to sit by the Committee of the Parliament, 1648; who had power by the last Act of the said Parliament, to convene the Parliament before the first Thursday in March, 1650, if they thought fit: as also that Session of the Parliament, 1649, by the last Act thereof continues the same to the first Thursday in March, 1650. At which day the convening in the next time, and this ratified the Act of Parliament made in the same Session; and which day was the day on which the Parliament, 1648, continued the same, with power to the Committee of Estates to convene the same sooner, if they thought fit, as is said. Whence it is evident, that the said Parliament, 1649, whether as appointed by the unconvened Committee, 1648, at Stirling, in the first Session, or as it is continued to the first Thursday of March, 1650, in the second Session, (both conforms to the last Act of the Parliament, 1648) may fulfill and obey the said defender his just reason, to found his defence upon the acts thereof. It is also farther considerable, as to the loyalty of that Parliament, that therein the murder of his late Majesty was declared against, his present Majesty proclaimed and brought home, his subjects of this Nation reconciled to him, and taken into favour, as army appointed to expel his enemies, the crown set upon his head, and that Session of Paris, wherein the whole preceding proceedings were approved, was dignified by the presence of his royal person.

And to the sixth Article, and that part thereof where it is libelled, That the defender, in June 1649, not daring to appear in public, or in a direct way, his Majesty's home-coming, he procured the application made, to be cloagued with such limitations and restrictions, as were most derogatory to monarchical Government; as is alleged to be more fully explicated in the Commission, Instructions and addresses, which are repeated as a part of the Libel.

It is alleged for the defender, r. Seeing the said commission, instructions and address are labelled on, and repeated as a part of the duty, in all law and form of process, they ought to be produced with the bill, for the reason adduced in the defence, against the relevancy of the proposition of the duty; and still which be produced, it cannot be consistent with the said limitations and restrictions, and how far they are derogatory to monarchical Government; and therefore till then there can be no proof.

2. It is not considered nor cleared, on which of the acts labelled on in the proposition, this Article and Members thereof are labelled, and therefore it is obvious and insight: as to it incoherence, the defender has full reason to deny, that it can be labelled on any of the said Acts, to wit the crime and pass labelled against the defender, none of the said Statutes making any mention of treating or inserting any pass therefore. Likewise also numerous and address to the King and his subjects, all Lawyers and Politicians do agree, that the best and safest way of removing the same, is by Treaty; and that being concluded on, it is also their opinion, that the same are to be observed, at least so far as to exempt the subjects from punishment, to whom indemnity has been there by provided. And in this, Graviss deprelo de hunc, 1. 3. cap. 10. in such clear; and many others who write on that subject. And therefore the said Treaty being concluded, and after ratified by his Majesty and his Parliament, the defender cannot be called in question for his accession thereto, nor the pain of treason thereupon inferred: For the said Treaty and conditions thereof being accepted and agreed by his Majesty's voluntary consent, cannot be like as a crime, far less be high a crime as treason, against the defender.

3. Apert or from that member of the said Article; because not only after the said Treaty did his Majesty tacitly admit any crime, if any was, in the said Treaty, by admitting the defender to places of trust, by receiving the crown from his hand at the coronation, and by admitting him to take the oath of allegiance, and to be a Member of his Majesty's Privy-Council; but also after the said Treaty was ratified, there was an Act of pardon and oblivion by his Majesty and Estates of Parliament, at times before alleged, and is here repeated.

Though the above-written defences be relevant in law, as to the said member; yet for the defender's further evasion, the honorable Parliament would take notice, that all along the preceding Articles, all the publick addresses from the year of God 1649, to the year 1648, (wherein the Generality and Representatives, both civil and ecclesiastical in the Kingdom, concerned) are charged upon the defender as his particular address, or as if the defender had been the special author; whereas in this article meet the treating with, and bringing home of his Majesty, therein it is known the defender, according to his bounden duty, was most active and zealous; and therein he wrestled with all his might, and by his pains and God's blessing therein, overcame many difficulties, and did discharge the same. The libeller does in fact detract from the defender's faithful discharge of his duty in this so glorious action, and without labelling the least presumption of any conspiracy to make the crime probable, the defender is accused, as if he had in his judgment been against his Majesty's home-coming; which because he did not sove publicly, therefore he breaketh himself to understand dealing, to clog the Treaty with limitations and restrictions, excluding the defender from all accession to the said duty, in so far as it was good, viz. to bring home the King; and making him to be the sole author of all labelled to be evil therein, to wit, of the limitations and restrictions. Whereas the truth is, he was active in the King's home-coming, and was passive in the other; having laboured what he could, that there should be as few conditions, and the same as satisfactory to his Majesty as was possible at that time to obtain, which is known to all that did transact the said affair, and which, if need be, is offered in proof. And for further defence hereof, if this Article shall be further labelled on, my Lord Advocate will be pleased to confound to declare who the Parties were that made the reason for address to his Majesty, of whom the defender should have been afraid, if he had been of a contrary judgment, to have opposed openly. For if the defender had so great fear in affairs, as all along the preceding Articles he is allowed to have had, and also if he had intended, (as is broadly and with foul mouth alleged) in the said Libel all along alleged, to have corrupted and evaded the King's Majesty's authority, government and posterity; and had such correspondence with their abominable Regicides, as all are persuaded by the said Libel to believe, in the said year of God 1649, when the said traitors were frang, and both this land their dominion and otherwise, very low; and when the power was in the defender's and his complex hands, (as my Lord Advocate is pleased to label and even there) who at that time had the managing of affairs; there was the fittest time and best opportunity, if they had any such disloyal thoughts, to have shaken off that Government. But so far did they abhor any such treachery, that they not only proclaimed his Majesty, and according to their duty owned his interest, even with the hazard of their lives and fortunes, there being none to follow, but easily might have seen, that the discharge of the said duty would bring upon themselves and the Nation the power of England, (the only power of arms and arms) being at that time in the abominable Regicides' hands) who did immediately thereafter invade this Kingdom.

As the other member of the tenth article, whereby it is labelled, That the defender, (to obstruct his Majesty's purpose, viz. in so far as in him lay, and to satisfy him therefore; by his and his complices cruelty executed upon the Marquis of Montrose, who as his Majesty's Commissioner did represent his Majesty's person) caused to murder the said Marquis, in some 1650, in manner, &c.

1. It is no way relevantly labelled, that the defender in general caused to murder him, except it were considered, ex male he caused, and if thereby be meant his voting in Parliament, 1649, in the said matter, his rejection, because a Vote, Act, or Sentence of Parliament, is no way relevant to infer a crime against any particular member therein, as back here set before alleged.

Libeller's. 2. The instance of the forfeiture of the life and estate of the said Marquis, was no decree of the Parliament 1649, but of the Parliament 1650, which was homologated by several other Acts of Parliament, excepting the said Marquis amongst other excepted persons, as specially by and by the said Act of the Parliament 1648.

And yet, 3. The Defender did not vote in the business of Montrose, as he can prove, if need be, by the members then present 1649. And as to the aggravations of the said murder, the said Marquis being his Majesty's Commissioner for the time; it is no way a relevant circumstance to aggravate the same, except it had been labelled, that the said commission had been given to the Parliament, which nobody can affirm; but on the contrary, the said Parliament conceived they had just reason to presume that there could be no such commission for his coming against them at that time; because his Majesty, after the murder of his royal Father, very graciously had admitted their gracious applications to him.

Like as before Montrose's coming at that time to Scotland, and always thereafter, his Majesty had a Committee of the said Parliament, under the name and title of the Committee of Estates of his Majesty's Kingdom of Scotland.

As to the Defender, his alleged keeping correspondence with Cromwell in the year 1650, as the same is irrelevantly labelled, no doubt nor acts of correspondence being considered on; for there was never any such thing. And there was one named Hemmels, who vented this untruth, laughed at Sterling, and at his death did declare, That the same was a self unjust calumny, and it is not to be believed that at that time he would have charged his fault with a Lie; and in Law, the words of a dying man are oraciously believed.

As to the Act of the High Kirk, the Defender (noways acknowledging the relevancy of the said article, as is intimated) was so free from having the least accession to the said Act or Declaration, that he loosed in good knowledge thereof, to evidence his fidelity to his Majesty, in so far as to be proved by witnesses (for their loyalty above all exception), that when the said new came, that the Commissioners were about the drawing of the said Act, the Defender gave advice to his Majesty, to draw a full Declaration, and to go such a length, as in freedom he could, that thereby he might prevent the said Act, and obviate the perjury thereof. But as for the other that was prefixed, he was altogether against the same, and dealt with the Minister who came from the Commissioners of the Kirk, to forbear perjury his Majesty therein; which also, if need were, might be proved.

As to the eleventh article, and subsequent articles, because the same are for deeds of compliance after the Usurper had prevailed and were in possession, before the Defender made particular answer, it is assumed, to premise in general, that it being notoriously known to the world (to the eternal honour of this Kingdom) as far that damnable usurpation of Oliver, not only we were not active in establishing the same, but according to our bound allegiance to our Sovereign, were to the utmost possibility of our power in arms under his Majesty; and otherwise active against him, and in opposition thereto, many lost their estates, many their lives, and all of us our liberties; and when we could do no more, being oppressed by the force of the said Usurper, (in a chafe forced Vagabond) we cried to God and Man, sending Heaven and Earth against Usurpers, (even when their hands were raised against us) and his army, amongst many other excellent maxims, were all gaily of this usurpation. We have suffered, and been only passive under that irretrievable force. And as this was the condition of the Kingdom, so specially the Defender, who as he had been most active and instrumental in his Majesty's home-coming, (which was the only ground of the quarrel, and for which he was looked upon by them as one of their capital enemies) even so after it pleased God for our exercise and punishment, to suffer their power to prevail over all his Majesty's forces and over this Kingdom, such assistance had the Defender, even so much as so line under their power; much less to comply actively with them; that after Widdow, the Defender offered to his Majesty, if he could get his company, the company of any other honest Minster, who he would never capitulate with any Englishman, so long as he could submit in any part of Scotland, either in his lands, or his treasuries. It is hardly named that Mr. David Dick may be examined, Member of the Diet of the Diet of the Diet, to have perished those of Abel, Adams, and others, his neighbours in the Highlands to be concerned in him, that they might have jointly made fine probable force, for settling the over-riding power of the Usurper; but all in vain. Likewise, long before that time, the whole forces and strength of the Kingdom were furnished, yet, the whole Kingdom, by their Deputies and Representatives (who met at Dalkeith, with the Commissioners of the Parliament of England, to called) was forced to submit in their power, and accept the tender of the Union of this Nation with England, proffered by them. Neither did he at the said time, in August 1651, voluntarily come in and capitulate with the said English; but was forced. (Several Regiments of their forces, horse and foot, having faithfully come about his house, where he was for the time lying dead) as can be testified by Dr. Casselburgh, who was with him for the time, and is humbly moved to be examined thereon. As also, notwithstanding the said fatal proposal, and the Defender's condition, though they threatened (notwithstanding his sickness) to carry him away prisoner, yet all their threats could not prevail with him, but he did absolutely refuse to subscribe the articles first offered, which contained the ruin of the Union, and an abnegation upon his part to promote the same, and the Government as then established, and to live peacefully, yet, such jealousy had they of the Defender, that by his capitulation he was prisoner upon demand. Neither during all the time of their power over this Kingdom, had he ever any favour of the said English, but was always looked upon by them with a most jealous eye. And for evincing hereof, the Defender humbly craves, that there be a commission granted for examining of Lieutenant-Colonel Lums, (aunt what was deposed by Montrose, and several others) one of the Defender's most affectionate to the English, or any other authority but the King. Likewise, it is assumed how truly he was preferred before the English were for the time, for payment of 40000 Sterling, assigned to be due for bygone sea-duties. This being the Defender's true state, it is beyond that the honourable Court of Parliament will take consideration how the Defender hath lost as long as he could, till he was prisoner, and will have a different consideration of Subjects acting under the lawful Magistrate in exercise of his authority by himself, or others lawfully constituted by him; and of the actions under cruel usurpation and tyranny, the lawful Magistrate being forced, for his own safety, to abandon his Dominions and People to the lust and oppression of the unjust Usurper [who was master not only of their fortunes and persons, but their lives and all that was dear to them]; and had for a long time detained the possession of his unjust usurpation, and devoured the lawful Magistrate. Which case is not only endorsed by all who were on that fajny, but also Case is the third part of the Institutes of the Laws of England, cap. 20. contra Tyrannem, in expounding the Statute of the 25. Edm. III. upon the words of the Statute &c. Rey, puts forth a weight upon the King's living in possession, is, on the contrary, a full and absolute affirmation that the action is not of a King regnant, and in possession of the Crown and Kingdom; as also, that in such cases, a favourable consideration is to be had of the actions of a fajny, who was particularly noticed, and justly looked upon by the Usurper, for his affixion to the lawful Magistrate and his Government. All which being remitted to the Consideration his Grace, and the honourable Parliament their consideration, he now comes to answer to the eleventh article: again, which eleventh article, and all the members thereof, as labelled, it is alleged, the said article is general, not confining only on the day or month, nor on the particular year of God, of the committing of the deeds therein labelled, but only alternative is anno 1653, or 1654, and therefore (as his been oft before alleged) the same is in-apt, and there can be no process thereon. It is not considered that, in the clause, which is the first of Parliament, is labelled, that the petitioners are clearly, and several members thereof, are substantiated, and sufficient it is affirmed and general, and in that inconsiderate the Defender has reason to deny, that it can be substantiated on any of the said Acts to infer the said crime and pain.

crime and gain. The article, which is first libelled in this article, The Defender did not write to inform the Commissioner his Grace, and the Earl of Glendown, not even commissioned by Sir Adolphus, the Defender repeats the two exceptions asserted, against the whole article, being confident this cannot be sustained on none of the Ads libelled on. And further alleges, that it is not relevantly libelled, to assert (vel sine causa notum) against the Defender, he led to high a crime, except it were libelled, that your Lordship's commission had been flawed him, and he required, which was never done. And herein he may refer himself to the Commissioner his Grace's Declaration; and if his Grace does not remember, that the Defender sent him word of his being engaged to him, and with his Grace, and to have done with him about the business but had never the honor to have his Grace's answer or acquiescence.

And for their clearing, that his not joining, except he had been required, is no crime, it is evident from the fourth Act of the fifth Parliament, Year. 1. that those only are punishable, who do not add the King's bell, being required thereunto. And Grege. page 385. says, that because the King has so many Vassals, they are not obliged to be punished, except the particular pain to be inflicted upon the array-day, be particularly expressed in the edict, by which they are commanded to appear. And page 365. he says, that those who come not, being warned by an edict, shall be punished, and page 292. he says, that the Vassals should not be obliged to appear at any such services, except they be desired, which command shall be proved by his Poets. These edicts were particularly required by the fundamental Law, and were called hors l'ame, which is derived by Cujas, to be the calling and citation of the army, and is lib. 3. cap. 20. quart. sec. franc. to be the punishment of him, who comes not to the King's bell, when he is called: and this assertion is clearly proved from Rogier, in his Treuzies de Roy. Reg. cap. 33. Likewise by the last Act of the fifth Parliament of King Jacob 1. it is expressly ordained, that those who disobey to defend the King against notorious Rebels shall be challenged.

2. If they be required by the King, as it is said;
3. And except they have for themselves reasonable excuses. But sure it is, the Defender not only was never required, as has been alleged, but there were even pregnant reasons, as he humbly conceives, the which rendered very probable at that time. Albeit it be the duty of all his Majesty's subjects, to rise for his Majesty's liberty, in opposition to Unlawfulty; yet it was not reasonable, as affairs then stood, till either they had been defeated by sea in the engagement, that they then had with Halifax, (whereby both the forces might have been diverted, and the transportation of Victuals and Ammunition from England, Ireland, and the parts of Scotland under that command, and that army in Scotland, might have been interrupted); or that Spain and France had concluded that peace, whereof there was great fear. In its, and then upon his Majesty's subjects in Scotland, they might have had hopes of some probable assistance in the recovering in his Majesty's service, or that division, and in consequence, confusion, had fallen out in the English army amongst themselves; wherein time seemed to be but little lost, so long as the appearance for his Majesty should meet them as against a common enemy, as it was. Like to it could be thought in Ireland have no other effect; and as in effect the event proved, that that army never divided till they had no common enemy, against whom mutual perversions both accelerated a mutual concourse, but all at unity one with another. And albeit a particular command had not been absolutely necessary, (if his Majesty had been there in person) yet in a juncture like these, wherein such a war was improbable for many false reasons (which induces the Defender to believe, that there was no commission granted at that time), which pretexts might enlarge a debt; and without doubt (as has been said formerly) there can be no crime. And though he had been required, yet could not have been purified for his not obeying, being in effect to do what was impossible to be done.

But this is conceived only to be added as an aggravation of what followed, which it. That he joined in open hostility with the Uppur's forces, especially with the Leath-Cocher and Tindalton, as the last Collet was sent to Tindalton, as the last Tindalton, whose he was in the Highlands, and in opposition to the last Earl.

1: is answered, c. This member is general, not condescending upon the

It is alleged first, that a prisoner should go in company (being commanded) with, and to those whose prisoner he is, is not a soldier's duty.

7. Though that had not been, yet he acknowledges that the number of the alternative, ancient his familiarity of never a power of great cause to abhor, Governor of the, was. That the Defendant said that he was, but, or in his position, being under the absolute power of the United, they might command him to go, or call him where they would, with whom to go along, or to bring whatever he had to them, had it to do on his back, had been he able to carry it, and that cannot be imposed to him for any crime (otherwise who should be innocent) when forbidden to multi they not give to their enemy of their goods, whatever he will have? And he said, that he was not, and that he was not, to bring others, and he was, in effect, did they not take what they pleased? But as for voluntary going, or joining in action with Yankee, or any of the others named in their service, the Defendant absolutely denies the force.

them. For his taking and relieving prisoners, non reboror, except the prisoner was specially confided on: specially relieving of prisoners is not relevant to infer any crime, but on the contrary is a good office to the persons and parsons concerned: it is belied that he, as an Officer under the English service, took and relieve prisoners, which can never be made agree, whenever the same might injure. But to finish, the Defender needed with no such things; and the Defendant shall truly relate the point of fact which he conceives hereby to be intent, which is as follows: The Defendant hearing that his Life and County of Kent was pillaged, and going upon the river Cole, the year wherein he was being followed by another boat and the Defendant being hired what they were if they allowed they did belong to the Earl or Glover, but could know no woman; and thereupon the Defendant having some suspicion that they were rather robbers, than soldiers belonging to the Earl; and fearing that General Atch, whom the Defendants were then going to, and whom he had never seen till that time, might give notice thereof, and make use of the same as a snare, the Defendant advised them to secure their money and arms in the hands of one of his servants, upon assurance that the same should be delivered to them, after he should be certified what they were; and thereafter common said them (feeling to incur the danger of a private pursuit) to the Garrison of Dunbar, and not under the action of soldiers under the Earl's Glover, but as common Delinquents: so that injury done to the Earl, is not his fault, but a few years ago, the said Earl's servant, should have been sent to the common debtors' prison, and their names were never enrolled as prisoners to be exchanged; and according to his promise, he could be re-delivered their money and arms.

As to the following member of that article, viz. That th. Deft do and pay from the Ufficers, for a company of Scots under them, as I go further, &c.

A adhering to the federal exceptions against the discharge of the propositions of the Deafy, and exception against the whole article, is the beginning of the answer thereto, for that it is not considered, under which of the Acts labelled on this member is forbidden, all which is done, the Defender as reason to deny that it falls under one of them. Neither is it secretly labelled, to infer any crime, unless such be labelled, that the Deafy are having connection with the Government on an equal footing with the hearing, and levelled that corruption, or called their names as a learned company, under the English and their Regiments, and engaged them to the Commonwealth and their Province, because they are engaged in a soldier in any service.

1. That he be relator in causa, that is to say, enrolled, for lex ord. 42.
N. de Test. enroll.

2. Unproven Sacramentum, that is, that they gave the oath, ex solis. 11. F. ad. 15 Figer, 2. cap. 6. or that one Defender had employed them in the English military service, or to execution of their orders, all which the Defender absolutely denies; they never having enrolled, given any oath or engagements, or employed in their service, as is said.

But on the contrary, and the truth is, there is to be in the said fire, and all other places in the Highlands in broken towns, watches to keep off depredations, martial reits, and other operations amongst the country people themselves and their neighbours in such run . . . And accordingly in the year of God 1653, or thereabouts, the fire of Argyle not being able to contentize these watches, and pay a shallo, (not being as yet well planted after the burning) General M^r was perswaded with, to help to extend the said watch (like as at the same time, the several other fires building upon the Highlands, at Inverness, Perthshire, Aberdeenshire, Sutherland, Dumfriesshire, all at one had w^{ch} as at the said time, and allowance therefore from General M^r), w^{ch} within two months did withdraw the said allowance from the said w^{ch} of Argyle, because they refused to engage against those that were then in the hills, under the Defender's son and others, whom the G^l General M^r also alleged they favoured; and thereupon withdrew his help and allowance for the said watch, and spoke of the Disorder w^{ch} he. Grace pleased.

And to evince that this was nothing but a watch, the men were not in a formed company, but in civil gentlemen in the flare had the ordering of several members of them at convenient and needful places of the flare, with responsible entertainment, and without labor, and all and many soldiers; all which is necessary, and, if need be, the Duke offers to provide. And the Duke of Somerset is hoped will remember how much offered.

be, is offered to be proved, and that he was most rigorously persecuted for the same, not only threatening to use real execution against his Estate, but also to imprison his person.

For evading whereof, he was obliged to go at that time to London, and could not have his person secured from arrests there, but by going in concealment: And it is known that his Majesty is so gracious, as in not a few, to excuse what they did of that nature, so ever though but their own personal sin, not imputing it to unfaithfulness in them at such a time; according to whose glorious and suitable example, it is with much confidence hoped, that the Commissioners of Grace and honourable Estates of Parliament, will have a favourable construction of what the defender did in that particular, being considered therein both for publick and private interest, without any decent or free, either in the intention or event, there being nothing at that time, while the defender was there, done, for continuing the usurpation, or excluding his Majesty's letters.

Likewise it may appear, that it was only the concourse both of publick and private interests and necessities aforesaid, that moved the defender to go at that time, because, though he was delayed oftentimes before to go, yet he full refused till then. He was one of the last that went to that, being the very last (pretended Parliament under their power) not till long after that commissioners had gone for the Nation for several years, and that all had submitted to their constitutions, and were of necessity made use of as laws for the time.

As for the aggravations of this member, and to the first, That because of the defender's inability, he was incapable to have been elected, at least might have refused.

It is answered, That it is notorious, inability was not then respected at all, nor was any ground of excuse, the meetings to the elections being commanded to all, as heretofore: And so noblemen and others heretofore met promiscuously through all the Nation as is notoriously to all known.

And whereas it is libelled, That he did not his residence within the Shire, it ought to be repelled as irrelevant, because it is true, and was known to the Usurpers, and their Ministers and underlings, that he had lived within the said Shire, and that considerable. So that he could not decline the said employment without prejudice, the will and lust of the Usurper at that time being uncontrollable, and tied to no rules of law or justice.

And whereas it is inferred, That sitting and voting in that pretended Parliament, he acknowledged his Majesty's power and interest to be in the Usurper's person. It is answered,

1. He acknowledged the same no otherwise but as all the kingdom did, to wit, de facto, for de facto the Usurper had taken or possessed himself of the power, as his Majesty is pleased to speak of in his proclamation assent commences with Propterea, in October last, and had obtained the force for a long time: But neither the defender, nor any other lay subject, ever did, or will acknowledge, that de jure the same belonged to him, or that he had any just right or lawful title thereto: as also Legis says in the above-written paper, speaking of them that seek from Usurpers that use of Government; whereunto, he says, they are holden in and obliged, once taking on them the Government, (though finfully and unlawfully) they seek the benefit of it, says he, not absolutely, but under a tacit condition, viz. if the Usurper will take upon them the Government. Potius, says he, sed tamen quoniam credimus, si tunc se per principis gratiam (speaking of the Usurper). And that the Usurper would not give the use of the power he had taken upon him, but in the way he pleased, was his crime, which he continued during his usurpation. In respect of all which, it is justly erred, that the defender may be absolved from the crime of treason, libelled thereupon.

Like as for the defender's further clearing in this particular, it is humbly defined, that certain murders and others above exceptions, whom the defender shall defend on, may be examined, if after his return from England, in anno 1658, he did not express with great joy his hopes, that business in England did tend toward his Majesty's advantage.

Item, That a commission be directed for examining Sir Andrew Ayley Greyer, and several other Englishmen above all exception, who the defender expressed himself in private asent his disaffection to that usurpation, during his being there the time of the said Parliament, even though to his very great hazard at that time.

Item, That certain persons, upon whose names also he shall defend on, may be examined, if the defender to their certain knowledge, at the time of Sir George Burd's rising (which fell out immediately after the defender's return from the said Parliament) did not put himself out of the way, being informed that he was to be secured, and thereupon delay'd his journey to Calcutta, and so be the reader to have had hold of any opportunity that should have offered for his Majesty's service and reformation; that time being the most probable that ever offered after Worcester fight.

As for the precept of twelve thousand pound finding, which is alleged the defender got from the Usurper.

It is answered, The defender should obtain a precept, but not as a reward of any service (which he never did, nor desired to derive from them), but for what they had wrongfully intermitted with, of the half of the estate of wine and strong waters, whereunto the defender had right by Act of Parliament, before they had any power in Scotland.

And as to the thirteenth Article, fifth, for the whole Article, it is not concluded on what Act of Parliament the same, consisting of three different members, is fulfilled; and till it be considered on, there can be no process thereupon.

And as to the first member thereof, assent the words alleged spoken at January.

1. No vote is considered on, and therefore the libel as that part is inept for the reason aforesaid mentioned, for which a criminal duty ought to be specified in the time, at such year and month.

2. Whereas it is libelled, be rebuked the Ministers for praying for the King, in the words libelled, or some such like words; non relevat as to the ministers, except the persons were considered on, whom he rebuked.

3. Non relevat, the such like words; some such like being most general, except the words were particularly libelled, alleged to be such-like whereby the defender might advise his defence, and allege why they were not such-like, as he would, if any words ever he spoke were considered on; for the truth is, he never spoke any such words; and was so far from rebuking any for praying for the King's Majesty, that after the defeat at Worcester (which is the general truth libelled, wherein he should have rebuked the ministers for praying for the King), he himself exhorted continual praying for his Majesty both in his Parish-Church and Family, yea even in presence and audience of the English when they came there, though it was to his great hazard to do so.

As to the second member assent the words libelled and alleged to have been spoken by the defender at London, That he wondered how the people should be so mad as to call home a family whom God had rejected, and would never return; or some such-like words.

First, This is also general; neither time, that is, year nor month, nor particular place, considered on.

Secondly, It is libelled, That it was in the presence of persons of quality, they ought to be considered on.

Thirdly, Insofar as it is libelled the defender said, The people were mad to call home his Majesty; it is general and unapt, not considering what people, and what was the occasion; if there was any motion made of calling home the King, whereupon that should have been spoken, and among whom it was. And Dawson, cap. 30. præc. com. v. 1. and others, say, A criminal duty should be most clear, and contain assent crimini facti. quisque, lib. 30. P. de accus. et Barr. and others, hold, that it should contain all the qualities of crimes alleged to be committed.

Fourthly, Some such-like words are irrelevant, except the words were specially considered on: which if they were, the defender would allege and evince they were no such-like: for the truth is, he never spoke any such words, but on the contrary did all that he could there to make way for his Majesty's happy Reformation, as has been at length cleared before.

And as was a very suspected person, insofar as in the year one thousand five hundred fifty-seven, Oliver was so jealous of the defender, that he commanded him to fly at London, and not to return to Scotland, till his affairs, as he was pleased to express, were settled. So that not without great difficulty, by the mediation of the Lord Brough and Charles Fleetwood, he obtained his liberty. Whereupon the defender defies the said Charles Fleetwood may be examined, which he also desired at London. And not only was fulfilled, as obvious to the English for his known affliction thereunto, as is notorious, and has also before been explicated.

As to the third member of the said article, assent the alleged speech in Manchester:

1. Neither the year nor month considered on, and therefore general as to the time, and inept.

2. As to the first member thereof, That he would own any thing he had done.

First, It is exceedingly general, and not relevant; except what were the things he had owned were specially considered on, and what time, year and month: It is an unparalleled generality, and therefore will make special, no process thereupon.

Secondly, It can import nothing in common sense, wherein to own a thing is to acknowledge it for a man's own; but what he had acknowledged to be his own, whether word or deed, he would yet acknowledge, which is an expression of ingenuity, and no crime: And this being the received sense of owning, the word cannot be strained to any other sense; or if occasion should be taken to do so, and that another sense could be put on that expression, yet being ante interpretatio copiosa of the most usual interpretation it is to be taken, ante pro h. l. i. P. de reg. jur. as being both just and defensible by that line. And in ambiguous speeches, or such both just and defensible two senses, every man is the best interpreter of his own mind, and his interpretation ought to be admitted, pro ex. in assignis P. de reg. jur. and other laws. But the sense aforesaid is so plain, that there is no place for caption.

As to what follows in the said member, That if what he had owned or done were to do, he would do it again, albeit he had known that all that has been would have been.

1. As to what is alleged against the first part of this member, That it is exceedingly general as to the time and month he should have spoken it on.

2. As to what the things are that he would do if they were to be done, and that the time things were done, or owned to be done, or that the saying that he would do if they were to do, is a crime.

3. What were those things in particular that are understood, or may be furnished under the general of all things that have come to pass; whereupon it may be inferred, that that were a crime for the defender to have said, that notwithstanding of them he would do what he had done, if that were to do; and therefore the libel as this part of the member is also general, obscure and inept. And to evince the impudence of this generality, suppose the defender were thus indicted: You are indicted for all that you have done the times by-gone, preceding your being in James Algernon's house, after your coming for London: were not that dirty without all controversy irrelevant? Then is it not also irrelevant to be indicted for continuing in general that he had owned, or saying in general, that he would do, that he had owned during that time, if that were to do again, without any further particular consideration?

Like as, 4. There is a very clear, obvious and benign sense these words may have, (if ever he spoke, as he truly never remembers that he spoke any such words) that if it had been possible that times could have returned, and all on to be done under the same circumstances and representations they had then, it is probable these times might be the defender's actions again, though he had known what had come therefrom, not having connexion with, or necessary dependence on these actions, each does not so much as import his present thoughts or approbation thereof, but is very consistent with a perfect disapprobation of the same. And is it not ordinary to say, that if such times were to have been, or such notorious or circumstances of actions as have been, that it is very like I would be engaged in them as well as others, or as I have been myself; and yet to say with great confidence I ought not to do so, like as truly it is known, and if need be, is offered to be proved, that the defender, on the jury century, had had to do of Cromwell's Council, and so many other famous Goodness, that things had been done wherein he would his return, but an action of the case will lie, Reg. 21. Bagg's case; and the Sheriff is a sworn Officer, and the law imposes this upon me, and the law is my custom in that case, and gives me a remedy.

Objection. Here is no double return, for it is no return at all, it not being under seal; and the Statute says, all returns shall be under the seal of the Sheriff. So here is no harm at all, he might have gone into the House, if he had pleased.

Reply. As the Common Law there was no necessity the return should have been under the seal of the Sheriff; so as a good return need avoid, and not a void return. If it were not good or left under the seal of all those that elect, what will become of those that sit now? It was never done yet, it is not a return without seal, it is good, proinde fit.

As to the exceptions taken to the declaration, it is well laid in Richards's case pleading, he lays a fourth exception there; and that he lays for action indebitum factum, it is as much as factum indebitum, a return, which is proinde fit, Richards's case, and Richards's case. How should it be a return, unless it be as a third? And yet it is intended to be as a third, he, Reg. 23.

The pleading of indebitum factum is the same with debet, and no exception taken to it. But if it had been upon a demurrer, there might have been mischief for the exception, but now it is an exception upon a verdict, and it shall be intended, that they that tried it had the right of the return. 2 Rich. 4. fol. 247. *Over a verdict a vicious plea shall be made good, and indebitum factum, 3 Cr. 53. fol. 371. Southwell and Brown's case, and Palmer's case, 4 Cr. 1. in those cases that have been cited, and yet adjudged good.*

Though there be no seal, yet when he returns this, and a man suffers damage by it, and all the mischief that may happen, who is the party who takes the advantage of it? Is he that has done the wrong? No, he cannot, 2 E. IV. 21. 25. E. IV. 18. 29.

So therefore, both because the declaration is well laid, and the party well entitled to his action.

The Judgment ought to be affirmed.

An Argument in the great Case concerning Election of Members to Parliament, by Sir Robert Atkins, Knight of the honorable Order of the Bath, and late one of the Judges of the Court of Common-Pleas.

Tit. 26. Cap. 11. In the Case of King's Bench, Rot. 577.

Sir Samuel Bernardyffen, Bart. Plaintiff; Sir William Smeu, Defendant. In Trovassu upon the Case.

THAT whereas the King, 8 Ed. 25. of his reign, by a writ out of the Chancery, directed to the then Sheriff of Suffolk, commanded that he should cause an election to be made of another Knight for the said Shire, in the place of Sir Henry North, lately dead; and that he should certify the election under his own seal, and the seals of those that were present at the election, into the Chancery.

Which writ, 12 Ed. 25. Car. II. was delivered to the defendant, then Sheriff.

And, 24. Feb. 35. Car. II. in full County, by the people resident in that County, the writ was read.

And also the plaintiff was duly elected to be Knight for that County, by the greater number of the people then resident in the said County, every one whereof could spend 40. p. even within that County.

And also the defendant, then Sheriff of the said County, provisit factu habeat, afterwards the same 24. Feb. 35. Car. II. returned the said writ into the Chancery; together with an Indenture between him the said Sheriff, and the aforesaid Electors of the plaintiff, of the aforesaid Election of the plaintiff, made according to the said writ requires.

Yet the defendant, then Sheriff, Officiis suis dictum minus ponderans, sed maxime et maxime interdictum ipsum Sheriffem in hoc parte suam rite p. agere, and to deprive the plaintiff of the truth and office of one of the Knights of the Shire, to be executed in Parliament, and to cause the plaintiff to expend great sums of money against the duty of his office.

Falsely, maliciously and deceitfully returned into the Chancery, together with the aforesaid Indenture, another Indenture annexed to the said writ, purporting, the same to be made between him the said defendant, then Sheriff, of the one part, and divers other persons; containing, That the said other persons, as the greater part of the said County, did chuse one Sir Lancelot Trunchb. Bart. otherwise Lancelot Lord Haulagehouse, as Knight of the Shire, to come to Parliament.

Whereas in truth, the said Lancelot was not chosen by the greater part.

By reason of which false return of the said other Indenture, the plaintiff could not be admitted into the Lower House at the return of the said writ, and also a great time after.

Till the plaintiff, upon his petition to the Commons, and till after he had spent divers great sums of money about the proving of his election, and divers pains and labours in that behalf suffered, afterwards, fol. 20. Rot. 26. Car. II. he was admitted, and his election was declared to be good.

Plen. Non tulit.

*Verdict. Pro parte dom. 800*l.

*Judgment. Pro parte Sir Samuel Bernardyffen, in the King's Bench, for the 800*l.* damage, and for the 80*l.* costs.*

The defendant, Sir William Smeu, filed a writ of Error before the Justices of the Common-Bench, and the Barons of the Exchequer, in the Exchequer-Chamber, to reverse the said judgment given by the Judges of the King's Bench.

And two of the Justices of the Common Bench, viz. Sir Robert de la, and Sir William Ede, upon argument, were of opinion, That the said judgment was good in law, and were for affirming that judgment.

But the other two Judges of the Common Bench, and the four Barons of the Exchequer, holding the said judgment in the King's Bench erroneous, were for reversing the said judgment.

And the said judgment shall stand reversed; but needs a redress by error in Parliament.

Sir Samuel Bernardyffen, Bart. Plaintiff, Sir William Smeu, Defendant, in an action upon the Case.

I shall divide the Record into the several parts of it:

1. There is first, the occasion, or as we commonly call it, the indictment to the action; that is, Sir Henry North, who served in Parliament at Vol. VII.

Knight of the Shire for Suffolk, died; and a new writ issued to chuse another in his place.

2. In the next place, the right that accrued to the plaintiff, Sir Samuel Bernardyffen, he was duly elected Knight of the Shire.

3. The injury done him by the defendant, with the aggravations of it, viz. Although the defendant well knew the plaintiff was duly elected, and that he did return him; yet contrary to the duty of his office as Sheriff, and according to approach him, and in despite him of the right he had, and on purpose to put him to great expense and charges.

He did falsely, maliciously, and deceitfully return another Indenture with the former; importing, that another person was chosen by the greater part of the County.

4. The damage sustained by the plaintiff, after the writ was returned.

1. He could not for a long time be admitted to sit to do his duty, and discharge his trust.

2. He was put to great charges to prove his election.

3. He did sustain great pains and labour.

5. The right done him at last, and the satisfaction and amends made him;

1. By the House of Commons. His election was declared good, and he was admitted to sit.

2. By the Jury. They have found the wrong done by the defendant, and the damage sustained by the plaintiff; and they have repaid him with 800*l.* damages.

3. By the Court of King's Bench. They have given judgment for the plaintiff.

And the question before us, is, whether this judgment be erroneous? I hold the judgment not to be erroneous. I am for affirming of the judgment.

1. I conceive the matter set forth in the plaintiff's declaration, to be actionable.

2. That the wrong and injury complained of, is such for which the Law gives him a remedy. And 3. That he has taken his proper remedy, by bringing this action upon the case.

All this being in the affirmative, the proof of it lies upon him.

My ground and foundation is this, That where one person does injury to another, and the person to whom the wrong is done suffers particular damage and loss by the injury, there the Law gives a remedy, by action, to the party injured.

But here is an injury done.

And here is a particular damage sustained.

Therefore an action lies.

I shall first prove the ground or foundation, which is the major premiss, then, That where a wrong or injury is done, and a particular damage sustained, there the Law gives a remedy by action.

1. From the nature and quality of the Law, which is to do right to all, and to give relief and redress to those that receive wrong; And should there be any case where a person might receive an injury and damage, and yet have no remedy nor redress, the Law would be defective, which would be a reproach to the Law and Government.

The Law has appointed several Courts, and gives them several powers and jurisdictions; so that in the one or the other, every person that has suffered injury and damage may make his complaint, and have right done him.

Sir Edw. Coke, in his 4th. Inst. fol. 405. in his Exp. upon the Stat. of R. II. c. 14. cap. 11. It is an ancient maxim of the Common Law, Non recedat quicquam a curia Regis sine remedia. Whoever has just cause to complain, shall have their right remedy. And curia Regis non debet deficiere in jussu adhibendo.

Both these rules and maxims, which have use and the same sense, are remembered in that Stat. of R. II. c. 14.

In Pruden's case, 9 Rep. fol. 38. 8. ad. quod. That an action upon the case lies against executors for a debt, due by the testator upon a simple contract. And in the argument of that case it is said, That by that resolution, Justice and right is advanced, and the creditor paid his just debt; and if the debt should be discharged by the death of the debtor, it would (if the Judges) be a great defect in the Law, that there should be a right, and a remedy for it. And the Judges agree the maxim I mentioned but now, non recedat quicquam a curia Regis sine remedia.

In Moor v. Wapman's case, 9 Rep. fol. 3. it is urged as an absurd thing in law, that a man should have wrong done him, and yet should be without remedy. And the reporter does observe, that the Judges in all ages have endeavored to put the rule of R. II. in execution, curia Regis non debet deficiere in jussu adhibendo.

Nay, the Law has to great a zeal for redressing of wrongs, that as far as the maxims and rules of the Law are, yet if there were any rules or maxims that stood in our way to hinder, the Law would break through those rules and maxims, rather than suffer an injury to be without remedy.

9. Inst. fol. 31. about the middle, Non wrong in injuria, either public or private, can be done, but it shall be redressed in our Court or other, by due course of Law. And in the lower end of that folio, A justice of Justice is adhered in Law.

Sir Peter Banes, amongst the elements of the Law, fol. 41. delivers this as a principle, Remedium a plerisque juris partibus quibusdam deficiat remedium; which he himself expresses in this sense, That the Law will dispense with some maxims, rather than wrongs should be unpunished.

1. My next argument to prove this position, That where an injury is done, and damage sustained, the Law gives a remedy, shall be taken from the nature of an action, which is the ordinary remedy the Law gives for the redressing of a private wrong.

Now what the nature and definition of an action is, we learn from the most ancient authors of the Law, as Bracton, and Flou, and the Assize of the Justices, as they are collected by Sir A. C. 2. Inst. fol. 40. and they all agree almost in the same words:

his attendance was? and direct other questions relating to the Parliament, must of necessity be decided."

10. Id. Id. fol. 27. The very lower end of this file, there is an action brought against Mr. Knapp, for letting a Burgess of Parliament go at large by writ ad prohem in Parliament, who was in execution: The Lord Dyer says nothing there, what became of it, but Sir Francis Alder, in his Rep. fol. 57, at the lower end of this file, reports, that it was held by Dyer, that if one condemn'd in debt or trespass be taken into the Parliament, and after taken in execution, that he shall not have his privilege of Parliament. And, as he says, it was held by the Judges of the Law, in the case of Ferris; and that tho' his privilege was "not allowed," yet, (as they held) it was waived; which case of Ferris was the same here mentioned before in Id. fol. 275, as appears by Mr. Compton in his justification of Courts, fol. 8. b.

So that some things relating to the Parliament, the Courts of Westminsterhall must determine, and the Judges cannot avoid it, if they will do justice.

11. But some things there are concerning the Parliament, which the Courts of Westminsterhall may determine if they think fit, or they may at the discretion of the Judges depend their final proceeding, and determine the Parliament must to determine them.

12. Id. fol. 17. 18. It is there debated by the Judges, whether it were a privilege and legal right that pass'd in Parliament against Sir John Popham, for a rape committed by him; and as depended upon the course of the two Houses, in their transferring of Bills from one to another, & of withdrawing the Bills; and they sent for the Clerk of the Parliament and consulted with him about it, and there, Forsyth, Chief Justice, held the Act in question to be a good Act of Parliament; but, says he, nevertheless the matter, or question, shall wait till the next Parliament meet, and then we may be certified by them of the certainty of the matter. By this it appears, that the Judges did not disown the jurisdiction of that estate, that was so nearly depending upon the usage of Parliament, but that it belonged to them, not to the Courts; and that it was convenient to be advised by the Parliament, and to wait till then.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. 40. tells us, that matters of difficulty were usually advised to Parliament.

13. Some things there are that concern the Parliament, wherein the Courts of Westminsterhall must not intermeddle, but the jurisdiction belongs to the Parliament only.

By the Statute of 4 H. VIII. c. 8. tho' all in that Act that concerns one Richard Brode is a private Act, yet there is one clause which is a general Act, and is declaratory of the ancient law and custom of Parliament, viz. It is enacted, That all Sworn, Assurances, Concessions, Excuses, Fines, Assurances, Pardons, Commutations, Charges, and Inquiries, at any time from thenceforth, to be made or had upon any Member, for any Debt, Fines, Pardons, or anything, or declaring of any matter, upon any Member, is deemed and treated of, as utterly void and of none effect. This concerns none but Members of Parliament, and it provides for freedom of debates in matters that are proper to be treated of in Parliament.

The Lords, for themselves only, and for their own House, made claim of this privilege and jurisdiction, 1 R. II. 2. Sir Robert Grosse's Act fol. 32. but it is limited only to matters moved in Parliament, and the King allowed it in full Parliament.

And Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. 15. says, That past reverses, the like belongs to the House of Commons: "And this is the reason, says Sir E. C. that Judges ought not to give any opinion of a matter of Parliament, because it is not to be decided by the common Laws used in other Courts, but judicium bonis et valentibus Parliament."

So likewise in case of the privilege of a Member of Parliament, against suits and executions, sitting the Parliament, the Judges have refused to give their opinion, tho' demanded by the Lords; as they did in the case of Thorp, Speaker of the House of Commons, who was taken in execution between two sessions of Parliament, of which the Commons made Complaint to the Lords, and the Lords asked the advice of the Judges, whether the Speaker ought to be delivered by privilege of Parliament? The Judges answered, That they ought not to determine the privilege of the High Court of Parliament: the case is 31 H. VI. fol. 10. Rolls 2d part. 94. ca. 1. See 33 H. VI. Sir Robert Grosse's Abridg. new. 6.

Concerning departure from Parliament, (sitting the Parliament) and not attending according to their duty, the case seems doubtful, whether any other Court than the Parliament can determine of that offence, it seeming to be of a middle nature. For tho' it be an offence committed by a Member, and that in Parliament-time, which argues for their privilege, and against the jurisdiction of any inferior Court, especially while the Parliament sits, who undoubtedly may take cognizance of it, and punish it; Yet on the other side, when the Parliament has not taken cognizance of it, and the Parliament is risen, who should not take cognizance, if the King's suit, be punished in the Star-chamber, while that was a Court, and now in the King's Bench? And why should privilege protect against non-attendance, when the true ground of privilege is by reason of attendance. And Mr. Pender, who was a very learned Lawyer, submits to the jurisdiction, but transfers his departure, viz. the case of the Bishop of Winchester, 3 E. III. remembered by Sir Ed. Coke, in his 2 Inst. in his Chapter of Parliament, (as far as he reports it) from rather to be an authority against the jurisdiction of any other Court before the Parliament itself, in such case of proceeding against a Member to punish him for non-attendance: For the Bishop being impeached by original writ at the King's suit, (which I suppose was in the King's Bench) quo vi reffit a Parliament per Gesta Regis.

The Bishop pleaded quod iure de paribus, et dicit, quod ipsi coram dilecto in Decretum Regem in alio Parlamento, in Parlamento tunc coram eorum et comitibus, et non nisi in iudicio, and so Sir E. C. seems to leave the victory on Sir Ed. Coke's side, and that has been succeeded. But Sir Francis Alder, 270, 271 reports the case of the Lord Sneyd, and the Lord Abergavenny, how they were deeply fined in the Star-chamber, 4 Jac. for absenting from Parliament, as the complaint of the Attorney General, are true.

And there were then present in the Star-chamber, the Lord-Chancellor, Chief Justice Popham, Fleming, and Wray, and for precedents to justify the proceeding against them in that Court, they cite the case of the Earl of Cornwall, 4 H. III. and the Bishop of Winchester's case, (which I mentioned but now) 3 E. III. how that for departing from Parliament, without licence, their lands were seized.

* Sir John Elliot, and Donald Miller, pleaded the like Plea to the jurisdiction of the King's Bench. Ante p. 340.

But the objection in our case, standing in matter of detention of a Knight of a Shire to serve in Parliament: that no other Court but the Parliament must meddle in it, as the objection would have it.

Also, It is not imperative, therefore, to acquiesce briefly of the true jurisdiction on this matter.

Sir Robert Grosse affirm, that writs of Summons for Knights of the Shire to serve in Parliament, began 4 H. III. and that the advantage of Commons met in Parliament, was perfectly to lessen and curb the power of the Lords, since the daring Earl of Lancaster was slain in the battle of Evesham (which was that very year), and the Barons were totally routed by Prince Edward, (afterwards King E. I.) and K. H. III. was selected out of their bands. And as he says that opinion, it is observed, that the writ went to the Sheriff, to summon two Knights out of every Shire that is to be found upon record, as that of the close Roll 40 H. III. (the very same year) 49. fo. 10. and 14. Thus Mr. Poynt affirm, as his pretence to the Abolishment of the Records of the Tower, p. 1. in the beginning of that fol. 2nd fol. 13. b. in the middle of that fol.

But we must not be governed by Histoicks in matters of law; and therefore, without standing the declaration of Sir Robert Grosse, as Mr. Poynt's, we will presume that the House of Commons, and also, out of Knights of the Shire, who sit in the Commons Law, have a business in, and a concern, because we had no written law that does best begin any such institution.

But to come clear to the objection, and to enquire who are the proper Judges of the right of election?

Mr. Poynt, in the same Preface, fol. 14. b. in the middle of it, (as I myself have hold it, for the grant has no facta to the Preface.) "The King and Lords (says he) were anciently free Judges of the legality of Elections of Members of the House of Commons, till the time of King Henry VI."

And in Sir Robert Grosse's Abridgment, fol. 392. the year 1 H. IV. new. 82. at the prayer of the Commons, for King Richard, that the Commons were not only restorers, and that all judgments appertain to the King and Lords, which is set in Statute, Grimes, Salsbery, &c. such like, the which order the King would from that time to be altered.

But we know that the House of Commons is now put out of the jurisdiction of determining all questions concerning the election of their own Members; for at least, as it is order to time being abolished or excluded from sitting there. But how far their judgment is concluding to all others to other purposes, I have now no full occasion to examine; for, as has been observed, the Plaintiff in this case grounds his action upon his original right of election, and mentions the determination of the House on his side, and not only alleges that he was duly elected, but is returned by it. Defendant answers, And that tho' he was for some time hindered from sitting, by occasion of the false returns, made by the Defendant on purpose, and the election was under question by it, yet he proved it clearly to the House, and was admitted, and his election declared good; and taking it for granted that he was duly elected, he fees in the King's Bench, by this action to recover damages for the injury done him by the Defendant, for which the House of Commons could not have helped him. For so many purposes they have no jurisdiction, for they cannot examine a witness upon oath, nor can they add the parties a Jury to give damages, nor have they any power to award a trial, or to cause the sheriff to be pannel a Jury.

Obj. 3. This is an abuse of a new invention, and provisio inofficiosa, and never any such was brought before, that of Red 22nd March, and never had any determination.

Ans. 1. For the King's use, in the particular circumstance, but not in the main, nor in the substance; for now, in that 'tis brought by one elected Knight of a Shire against the Sheriff, for a false and malicious return of another's indictment, whereby the plaintiff was put to great expense and trouble; but 'tis not ut sit in the general course of the action. For nothing is more frequent than actions upon the case, where an injury is done; and damages follow; nay, 'tis very frequent for actions upon the case to be brought against Sheriffs, for mere false returns, and that where there is no malice, nor any of their great apprehensions that appear in this case.

For this I refer you to the case in Red's abridg. 1. part, fol. 99. Grove, Feiler and Morley, in the King's Bench, where the Sheriff of a franchise was newly removed, but tho' he were removed, took upon him to answer, but made a false answer to the Sheriff's warrant, to execute a Fieri fac. against an Adversary, and the Sheriff made such Returns on the Court; and thereupon an action upon the case brought against the Sheriff, and adjudged in his: And that the Sheriff at this point shall take notice who is the rightful Sheriff of the Franchise, and accept of no answer to his warrant from any other.

19 H. VI. 20. An Action upon the case against a deputy Sheriff, for misfeasance & Writ.

19 H. VI. 3k. by Folkes. If a Sheriff upon a Fieri fac. return a Jury that is insufficient to pay debts, the next sheriff to whom the debts are charged to be levied, shall charge himself with the debts, and must not return a Nisi, but shall have an action upon the case against his Predecessor, for his false return; yet here is no malice, but at the most a neglect, or a mistake only.

30 E. III. 7. Bresh. action upon the case, 67.

An action upon the case against a Sheriff for not summoning and warning a man in due time, upon a writ of Procurator or attachment, whereby he failed damages, 20 judgment given against him, or the like. This is at bare neglect or omission, and seems to be the least or lowest sort of injury; and yet being accompanied with a particular damage to the party, tho' without any malice on the Sheriff's part, the action will lie.

3 E. IV. 20. Bresh action upon the case, pl. 91 by Dorly and Pige, for a false return only.

If a Nisi be returned against one who has no land, E. N. R. 93. 31 E. III. Fins. Abr. Pross 55.

So not returning a writ of fiscalis distringas, which is a mere neglect and non-fugit, tho' there be no malice, 21 E. III. 43. Br. Abr. pl. 48. 5 Rep. 23. 6 91. 7 Rep. 11.

So against a Bishop, if he falsely return, that an executor has not refused the executoryship, when he was he has accepted, 3 Lex. 221.

So against an Ecclesiastic, 9 H. VI. 60. 21 E. IV. 23. 27.

Much more shall the action upon the case lie against the Sheriff, as the circumstances of this case are, where the return is not only false, but is know it to be false, and he did it maliciously, with a purpose to hinder the plaintiff from fitting, and to put him to expense, and where the plaintiff has had to great a damage. And the Sheriff by his oath is oblig'd to do right as well as poor as to rich, in all that belongs to his office. 2. To do no wrong to any man for favour nor hate. 3. To disturb no man's right. 4. Truly to return, and truly to serve all the King's writs, as far forth as shall be within his cunning. And the Jury by their verdict in this case, have found the defendant to fail in every one of these clauses of his oath. And tho' the circumstances that do diversify all cases are new in this case, yet it is very frequent as to the case, to have new cases and new circumstances; and there is nothing more frequent than this variety and novelty.

Sir P. Co. says, in his Book of advancement of learning, speaking of cases criminal on law, fol. 18. says, That the narrow compass of man's memory cannot comprehend all cases, which come back flow'd up; and therefore cases omitted and new, do often present themselves, but every new case does not require a new law: for then the legislative power must be continually exercising: But tho' it differs from former cases in circumstances, yet it may fall under a general rule, or be proceeded upon by parity of reason; which is the reason of the law.

And the Statute of 17. 23. cap. 24. has made ample provision for all such new cases that fall under a general rule, but have no former writ, or writ of course, that fits it in all the particulars and circumstances. In English cases, fresh records in law, fresh cases, says the Statute, in the 18. 23. cap. 24. In the 18. 23. cap. 24. there you have the distinction of writs, fresh records in law, fresh cases, and from thence the Cause's have their name, because they have the drawing of their writs.

Some are now Misprificals que non sunt de iure firmiores; et de aliquo certo forma, sed sup. in constanti servatione variatione casuum, falluntur & periculis as are action upon the case, &c. which have not any certain form, but are upon occasion drawn by the Masters of the Chancery, and from thence are called Misprificals, all this is by virtue of the words of the Statute of 17. 23. c. 24. Concordant dicit in Consuetudine de bene facienda. 2. 18. 405. 406. 407.

And many new cases may be put, that have no parallel cases to be found in our Books, in all the particulars and circumstances be regarded, as the case, 3. Car. 1. in the King's Bench, where an action upon the case is brought against an Apprentice, for what he did in his office, viz. for falsely and maliciously professing one, and that in the Spiritual Court, for intemperance. This was against an officer for what he did in his office, and to which his oath oblig'd him; and this was for a thing done in the Spiritual Court, viz. the Confraternity Court at Exeter, and for a matter merely of ecclesiastical cognisance, viz. intemperance, whereas the Common Law had nothing to do; and this case had no parallel nor precedent before it: and yet being an injury and damage to the party professed, and done falsely and maliciously, and without colour, and for which the party injured could have no recompense in any other Court, but at Common Law, it was adjudged the action lay. This case tho' it had no parallel before it in all the circumstances, yet in many respects it is a parallel to the case before us. There is the like action against comibles for making a false proffession, Crake Car. 467. and the case I cited before against a Sheriff, 12. Rep. 138.

And for that objection and observation concerning the novelty of this action, this more may be said in answer to it; That till of late years Sheriffs have given no occasion for the like action of this; for double returns, upon elections to Parliament, have not been in ancient times.

Mr. Pym, in his Brevia Parliamentaria Rediviva, fol. 137. observes, that there were not above two or three calls of elections questioned from 49. H. III. till 25. E. IV. for ought appears by the returns, or Parliament-Rolls, and not so much as our double returns in indentures.

And the common law does comply with, and conform to the general opinion and genius of the Kingdom, and values what they generally esteem and value, and redresses what they value not.

Herefore an election to serve in Parliament was not a thing to be defensible, and so much sought after as now-a-days it is; and it is not the desire or seeking after it that is to be disliked or condemned, for he that desires the office of a Bishop (says the Apology) desires a good office; but it is the undue means used, or the ill ends for which it is desired, that makes the seeking bad.

Mr. Pym, at supra, fol. 486. says, 1. E. III. a writ issued to elect two Knights for the county of Northampton, and the Sheriff returned this answer, omnesque comiti Northamptonie sui replebunt, and ipsi per totum Eboracensem sunt decesserunt, quod non habent unde pueri expensa ducibus militibus preficiantur, sed anglorum ad hoc levato, sumendum.

In his fourth part of his Register of Parliamentary writs, is mentioned a Patent of exemption granted 42. E. I. to the town of Terrington in Drom-flore; which Patent recites in its preamble, that the men of that town never wyl to send Burgeys to Parliament, till the Sheriff, 25. E. I. in Januario fuisset multum retentum.

So that a malicious return to Parliament is no new thing, but has been formerly done; and as the plaintiff in this action has well said the Sheriff for returning against him with him, so I make no doubt but at the case then stood, with the general humor and opinion of the people, that the Sheriff might have had their remedy against the then Sheriff for returning them summoned.

And the Law is still the same, in that it still sets a price and esteem upon that which the people generally esteem and value.

And several cases have been put to prove, that new Statutes have given occasion to new actions upon the case, which actions could not have been sued at the Common Law; and yet those new Laws and Statutes do not give those new actions, but only occasion them.

Brevia vni. 1. 2. 3. King's Bench, Rediv. 1. 2. 3. fol. 47.

The plaintiff here brought an Action upon the case against the Sheriff of Bedford, for suffering 7. 4. to escape out of his custody, 7. 3. being committed by the Commissioners of bankruptcy, for refusing to answer Interrogatories, the plaintiff being one of the creditors, and 7. 3. a bankrupt; and after many exceptions taken to the declaration, the Court gave judgment for the plaintiff. And yet there was no such thing as a commission of bankruptcy at the common Law; but the common Law takes occasion by the Statute of bankruptcy, to give such an action upon the case, which before those Statutes could not have been sued.

In like manner the common Law takes occasion by those Statutes that give the action of waste against tenant for life, or years, against whom it lay not by common Law, to give an action upon the case against such tenants, if they will not permit their Lessees to enter upon the thing demised, to view whether waste be done or not. Crab 2. part, 478.

Obiect. 4. That there is not one case in Law parallel to this case, for a Sheriff to be sued for returning the whole truth, and something more than the truth: tho' actions for false returns are frequent.

Ans. This is an action for a false return, and something more. That it is for a false return, appears by that allegation, that he did falsely make his return, and the Jury have found it so, and we must believe it. And it was false in this, in that he returned an Indenture pretended to be under the hands and seals of divers persons, as the greater part of the factum story, purporting the choice of another than the plaintiff to be Knight of the Shire. The plaintiff does not allege, that there ever was any such Indenture sealed by any person; but that the defendant did falsely return another Indenture, purporting the same to be made by divers persons, &c. So that we may reasonably understand it, that in truth there never was any such Indenture sealed by any but the Sheriff himself, and not by any others that were pretend to be the election. 2dly, Tho' the Sheriff have returned the whole truth, yet together with that truth he returned a falsehood; and all that was re-estimated, it could not appear which was the truth; and in the mean time the plaintiff sustained all his damage.

Obiect. 5. That the Sheriff said herein as a Judge, and therefore if he er, he is not to be sued for it, but his error may be sifted; and the Law will not suffer an agreement tending to the discredit of a Judge, Pl. nement. 2. 1. 4. and Dy. 8. 3. k.

Ans. All this is true, as to that that is a Judge of Record, in respect of the greatness of his authority, and the great trust the King and the Law repose in a Judge of Record; but the Sheriff is no Judge at all in what he acts in the election of Knights for the Shire, but is only an officer upon Record, 5. H. VI. 53. and 6. H. VI. 24. de f. m. p. 6. b. in some particular cases indeed, the Sheriff is a Judge, as in a Justitia, 6. R. 2. 12. de f. m. p. 6. b. and a Judge of Record, as in Replevin, by the Statute of Mortm. 13.

Obiect. 6. The Statute of 23. H. VI. c. 15. has provided a remedy against the Sheriff for any abuse committed by him in elections, viz. the penalty of an hundred pound, in case of Knights of the Shire, to the Knight injured. And it does rectify in the preamble, that a convenient remedy for the party grieved is not ordained in the former Statutes; and from hence it is inferred, that there was no remedy for the party grieved at the common Law, nor before this Statute.

Ans. I have already proved, that there was a remedy at the common Law, and before this Statute; and this Statute is an argument to prove it, for this Statute mentions a party grieved, and there could be no grief without a remedy, otherwise the Law would have been defective. And it cannot be denied, but that if there were a remedy at the common Law, this Statute being in the affirmative does not take it away, only it gives another remedy.

And for the words of this Statute of 23. H. VI. that a convenient remedy for the party grieved is not ordained by the former Statutes; this does not argue that there was no remedy at the common Law, nor does it argue that there was no remedy at all; but that there was no convenient remedy by those former Statutes, and thereupon the Statute of 23. H. VI. gives an hundred pound to the Knight injured by an undue return.

I shall put these like cases where Acts of Parliament give remedies, where yet there were other remedies before at common Law, and the party may sue for either: Rediv. 1. 2. 3. fol. 93. 94. 95.

A Difference is made to the Sheriff to distress the defendant in an action, and the Sheriff returns not a return, but an answer lies by the Statute of 17. 2. 3. c. 4. yet the plaintiff may well sue his action upon the case against the Sheriff, because it appears by the words of the Statute, that it is a false return. Observe the argument there used, viz.

If the action upon the case did not lie, in such case the plaintiff had not any remedy at the common Law, which was greatly mischievous; and the Statute (as is there observed) tho' it gives a new remedy, and takes no notice of any remedy that was before in the case, yet it does not refrain the plaintiff from any remedy that he had at the common Law. 'Tis there said too, a Querra but Seignior Roll has this Note upon it, that Tr. 3. Car. 1. m. 18. Seignior upon good advice, brought his action upon the case against the Sheriff of London, for returning too small fines against the Mayor and Commonalty of London.

The Statute of 17. 2. 3. c. 4. (5. E. 3. 2. 3. fol. 406. 405.) first gives an action of assize against the Sheriff of him that levied the assize; and that Statute finis (as Sir E. C. observes) to understand that the party grieved was without any remedy before; for it provides in these words, as, ceteris non residentis quorundam auctoritate Regis fieri consuevit: yet Sir E. C. takes notice, fol. 405. of 5. E. 3. at the lower end of that job, upon the words (as he says) *That the makers of that Act knew well that the party injured by the assize might enter upon the ground of the wrong-doer, not only when it was in his hands, but after it was aliened too, and abuse the nuisance, and so prevent himself of the remedy by action of nuisance given by this Act. And besides that Sir E. C. is he might bring his action upon the case, and recover damages, non quodam modo non a causa sed ex causa.*

Obiect. The ground of this action against the Sheriff is for making a double return. Now the declaration sets forth only one perfect return, and that is of the plaintiff's election, which the declaration says, was procedum contra iudicem; and it was by Indenture, under the seal of the Sheriff and Electors: And tho' the plaintiff alleges, that the late Sheriff and the Electors returned another Indenture of the election of another person, (which is the promise that he complains of) yet that appears to be no return; for it was not said, non est Indenture sub sigillo suo. And the Statute of 23. H. VI. c. 15. and 5. H. VI. c. 7. requires Indentures sealed by the Electors to be returned to the sheriff, which Indentures so sealed and tucked, shall be holden for the Sheriff's return.

Ans. This other Indenture last mentioned, must be understood an Indenture called, in like manner as the former; for the declaration just before mentions ask or vote the Lord Hastings were not chosen by the major part of the Freeholders. If it had been said ask or vote the Freeholders supposed to seal the writ, never did seal the same, there had been a falsity in his misnomer part of finding in the Indenture, but his finding his two Indentures, which were really sealed by the Freeholders, at that import, whom the Freeholders of each Indenture (and not the Sheriff) say, that they are the major part, is no falsity in his misnomer part, but only deferring to judge between them, which is the major part, or more properly judging that they are both equal in number.

They object, that the matter in this question is not matter of Judgment, in so far as counting the Poll, which requires Arithmetick, but not Judgment; but certainly if it be rightly considered, it will be thought a question of Majesty is not barely a question of fact, but a question of judgment, a question of difficult judgment, there are many qualifications of Election.

1. They must have 40 s. per annum, their value must be judged.
2. It must be Freehold, and the Title.
3. It must be their own, their colourable and fraudulent gifts made many times on purpose to get votes, must be judged.
4. The Electors must be sufficient; here the settlement of the party must be determined.

5. There are many things that incapacitate voices, as bribery, force, &c. and many other questions arise, that are of such difficulty in debate of them, much time is spent in Parliament, and sometimes a Committee determines one way, and the House another. Is not this then a question that refers to Judgment?

They object again, the Sheriff may give an oath concerning all the qualifications, and he is to keep no further.

I answer, the Statute has given the Sheriff power to give an oath in assistance of him, but the Statute does not say that whoever takes that oath shall have a voice. Neither does the Statute 23 Hen. VI. say, that the Sheriff shall not be charged with a false return, that requires the way: to do it, although he may use such means for his direction, yet he must consider his own fidelity, and use make a false return. If a man, upon taking such an oath, give the Sheriff a special answer, or if it should be known in the Sheriff he fears false, the Sheriff must determine according to his own judgment, and not by what is forced.

It may hence be concluded, that the Sheriff, as to deciding a majority, is a Judge; and if so, my next question is, that there is the same reason he should be free from actions, as any Judge in Wyllmote's case, or any other Judge. Does not support the Publick, that the Sheriff should deal uprightly and impartially? Ought he not to have courage, and for that end should not the Law provide him security?

Consider his disadvantages, what a great and cruel accompany such elections; what importunity, nay, what violence there is upon him from the contending parties.

We may say, no other Judge has more need of courage and resolution to manage himself, and determine uprightly, than he. No other Judge determines in a case of greater consequence to the publick, or difficulty, than he; expose him to such actions, and an insolent Election he must have trouble; for commonly each party is confident of his success, his conduct, and his friends, that let the Sheriff return never so uprightly, the party that is rejected will revenge it by a suit, especially if he say for at Common Law, to have boundless damages, without running any hazard himself, but of the loss of his office.

If we Judge, that find ourselves free from actions, should not be tender of others that are in the same circumstances, it may well be said, We note you, for too impudently bearing burdens upon others, but will not bear the load of them yourselves.

3. My second reason is, because it is aliovi for, either to examine the right of the Election, or behaviour of the Sheriff; both which are incident, and indeed the only considerations that can guide in the Trial of such causes, if they be allowed.

It is admitted, that the Parliament is the only proper Judicature to determine the right of Election, and to censure the behaviour of the Sheriff. How then can the Common Law try a cause, that cannot determine of those things, without which the cause cannot be tried?

No action upon the case will be for breach of a trust, because the determination of the principal thing, the trust, does not belong to the Common Law, but to the Court of Chancery; certainly the reason of the case at Bar is stronger, as the Parliament ought to have more reverence than the Court of Chancery.

They object, that it may be tried after the Parliament hath decided the Election; for then that which the Common Law would not try is determined, and the Parliament cannot give the party the costs he is put unto.

Then I perceive they would have the determination of the Parliament binding to the Sheriff in the action, which it cannot be; for that is between other parties to which the Sheriff is not called: it is against the cause of Law, that the Sheriff is Judge, Decree or Proceeding between other parties should bind the interest of, or any way conclude a third person; because ought it to do here: it may be said for parties combining to represent a case to the Parliament, that the right of Election may appear either way as the parties please. Is it fit the Sheriff, who is not admitted to controvert such determination, should be concluded by it, in an action brought against him, to make him pay the reckoning?

Did the Parliament believe, when they determined this Election, that they pulled Sentence against the Sheriff, upon which he must pay Scot & Loe? Sure if they had imagined so, they would say, in Justice, they ought to have bound his defence, before they determined it.

And yet that was the measure of this case, the Sheriff was not bound in Parliament, indeed he was more blamed there; and yet upon the Trial, which concerned him so deeply, he was not allowed to defend himself, by showing any minority or equality of votes, the Parliament having determined the Election.

I do not by these reflections tax the Law of Injustice, or the course of Parliament of Inconsequence; I am an admirer of the methods of both: it is from the Excellency of them, I conclude this Proceeding in this new-fangled action, being absurd, unjust and unreasonable, cannot be legal.

To answer the other branch of this objection, I say, it does not follow, that because the Parliament cannot give costs, therefore this new-fangled action must lie, to help the party to them.

For then such an action might as well lie in all cases, where there is a wrong, to be remedied by course of Law, and no costs are given for it.

At the Common Law no costs were given in any case, and many costs remain at this day, where the Statute have given no costs: as in a Prohibition, Sive fines, and Quare impedit, and divers other cases; and yet no action will lie to recover these costs, and why should it lie in the case at Bar?

In this case the Parliament have already had in under their consideration in the Statute 23 Hen. VI. and have appointed what shall be paid by the Sheriff that offend, viz. 100. to the party, 200. to the King, and imprisonment; the Parliament have found what shall be paid for computation, and what for punishment, and would have provided for costs, if they had thought fit.

3. My third reason is, because a double return is a lawful means for the Sheriff to perform his duty in doubtful cases.

If this be so, then all aggressions of falsity, malice, fit intention, will not make the thing actionable, for whatever a man may do for his safety, cannot be the ground of an action.

There is sometimes Domus assidue incurs, though the thing be done on purpose to bring a suit upon another, without any design of benefit to himself, as if a new house be erected contiguous to my ground, I may build anything on purpose to blind the lights of that new house, and no action will accrue, though the malice were never so great; much less will it lie, when a man acts for his own safety.

If a Jury will find a special verdict; if a Judge will advise and take time to consider, if a Bishop will delay a Patron, and impanel a Jury to inquire of the Right of Patronage, you cannot bring an action for these delays, though you suppose it to be done maliciously, and on purpose to put you to charges; though you suppose it to be done finiter, knowing the Law to be clear, for they take but the liberty the Law has provided for their safety, and there can be no demonstration, that they have not good designs, for theirs are within their own breasts; it would be very unbecomingly, that a man might not have leave to doubt without too great pain.

The course of Parliament makes out the ground of this reason to be true in fact, so that a double return is lawful when the Sheriff doubts; for if the Parliament did not allow a double return in doubtful cases, they ought never to accept a double return; if it were in itself a good and lawful return, they ought not to enquire it was not, but find for the Sheriff, and compel him forthwith to make a single return. But we see where there is doubt, the Parliament sends out for the Sheriff before they have examined the case, and given particular directions.

And if it must of necessity be the course for the Sheriff to suppose the votes are equal, and the Election is void for force, suppose the Sheriff doubts upon the validity of some votes, shall he transmit his doubts generally to Parliament? Was there ever any such thing done? Was there it of any other way but to make a double return, and leave it fairly to the decision of Parliament?

It was said by my brother Ellis, that if the Sheriff had returned, in the nature of a special verdict, the special matter, and had concluded in this manner, viz. if the Parliament shall adjudge Sir Samuel Barnardiston to be chosen, then he returns him; and if the Parliament shall adjudge the Lord Hastings to be chosen, then he returns him; that such a return as this had been free, and could not have borne an action.

This is a pretty invention, found out for argument sake, but methinks it furnishes too force at all in the matter for which it is brought, but rather shows the right to be the other way: for let any man of common sense, make a double return, as it is now said, he is not the same thing consequence? It is not a double return, as if the Sheriff should say to the Parliament, "The right of Election is between these two, I am in doubt which of them I shall reject, and expect your direction." This is the import of a double return, and is the same in effect, as if it had concluded like a special verdict; and so my brother Ellis's instance should not be actionable, though he concluded otherwise.

That other new-fangled way could not be received, viz. For,

1. The Freeholders would never give in such a return.

2. It is a return it is not capable of being concluded by the Sheriff.

But the judgment of the Parliament must be entered upon record, to make it any return, it concluding nothing at all, as a special verdict concludes nothing, till the judgment of the Court be entered upon the roll with it.

3. The Parliament will not, as I believe, admit of new devices in the course of their Proceedings, whatever we do at Law.

But the double return is practicable in the County, for the Freeholders of each part will under their Indentures; and it is easily amended in Parliament, by rejecting the Indenture of those Freeholders that were not the major part, which way has been practised in doubtful cases for many years.

So that I apprehend the case at Bar to be more repugnant and favourable, than that case, which my brother Ellis put as a case that would bear an action.

Again, suppose the Sheriff had informed the Parliament of his doubts, and that he could not readily determine where the majority was, but it was between two persons, A and B, and therefore desired their favour, either to grant him time to determine it, if they pleased to command him to do so, or else, that they would decide it themselves, and he would obey what directions they should make in it, and thereupon the Parliament had taken upon themselves to determine it.

This must clearly be not an actionable, for it is not actionable to delay a return to any Court of Justice, where the Sheriff had leave from the Court to do so.

A double return, in any understanding, speaks the same thing to the Parliament; and upon it they may either direct the Sheriff to make a single return, which is to cause him to decide it, or they may do it themselves.

And here, I must needs reflect upon the second reason I gave against this action, that the matter of it is aliovi for, I find myself and my brothers that argued for the action, engaged in a discovery of the nature of a double return, and the course of Parliament upon it, which, as a Judge, I cannot so well speak to. I had the honour to be of this House of Commons, and whilst I was there, I considered filled as well as I could the course of the Proceedings of the House, and am therefore able to speak something of them, and I am brought into this discourse necessarily by this action: but I must needs say, it is an improper discourse for Judges, for they know not what is the course of Parliament, nor the privilege of Parliament. When the Lords in Parliament, whom they are bound to assist with their advice, ask the Judges any thing, concerning the course or privilege of Parliament, they have answer'd, that they know them not, nor can advise concerning them.

If in Parliament we do not know, nor can advise concerning these things; how can we judge upon them out of Parliament? We ought to know better as judges, and therefore we cannot judge of things we cannot know.

Our being engaged in a discourse improper for Judges, shews the action to be improper, as much as any other argument that can be made; and this argument arises from my brother's charge against the action.

But now I am at this discourse, I must go a little further; my observation from the course of Parliament has been, that they will not permit the Sheriff to delay his return, to deliberate, and he cannot take security of either party; and if a single return be not justified by the Committee of Elections, he is in danger of the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. It is plain, that there is no way for an incorrect Sheriff to be safe, where he comes in doubt, but making a double return; and if that should be admissible too, the favour of the Parliament would be the most agreeable service in the world.

It seems admissible to me, that it should be objected, that this course of Law is necessary to prevent the great mischief arising from double returns, whereas, if it be a mischief, or difficult by the Parliament, either in general or any particular case, they may reject them when they please, and command the Sheriff to make a single return; so that they may remedy it by their practice, without their Legislative Power.

Their practice hitherto has been to receive double returns, which therefore in some cases must be lawful, and in the very case the double return was accepted, and the Sheriff no way punish'd for it; which he ought to have been, if it had been blameworthy.

If double returns are accepted by Parliament, they are allow'd, and we must say they are lawful, which is the ground of my third reason; for which I hold this action not maintainable.

4. My fourth reason is, That there is no legal damage occasioned by the Sheriff. The damages laid in the declaration are,

1. Being kept from sitting in the House.

2. The pains and charges he was put unto, to get his election into the House.

3. That of his being kept from sitting in the House, is as much every man's damage in the whole County, nay, in the whole Kingdom; and any man who sits will have an action for it, as the Member chosen.

As fit in Parliament is a service in the Member, for the benefit of the King and Kingdom; and not for the particular profit of the Members.

It is a rule in Law, that no particular man may bring an action for a nuisance to the King's highway; because all the men in England might as well have actions, which would be infinite; and therefore such an offence is punishable only by Indictment, except there be special loss occasion'd by that nuisance.

For the same reason, the exclusion of a Member from the House, being as much damage to all men in England, as to himself, he, nor any man else in England, can have an action for it, but it is punishable upon the publick house, and not otherwise.

For this reason was the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. wisely consider'd: by that Statute the action is not given to the party for his particular damage, but the action given is a popular action, only the party griev'd hath a preference for six months; but if he do not sue in that time, every man else is at liberty to recover the same fine.

2. The other point of damage, is the pains and charges he was put unto, and that is not occasion'd by the Sheriff, but by the deliberation of the House. Why should the Sheriff pay for that? It may be, if the Parliament had sent for the Sheriff the first day, and blamed the double return, he would have usur'd to determine the matter speedily, and then should have been no cause of complaint for delay: but the Parliament flow so much cause of doubt, that they think it not fit to put the Sheriff to determine, but to resolve to examine the matter, and give him direction that may guide him in sending his return, thereupon they give a day to the parties on both sides, and sending the matter of long examination, and withal difficult, they deliberate upon it.

It seems very unreasonable the Sheriff should be made pay for this, which he did not occasion; but was a course taken by the Parliament for their own satisfaction, who found no fault in the Sheriff for putting them to all that trouble.

Suppose Sir Samuel Bernardin had been return'd alone, and the Lord Hunsdown had petitioned against that return, there had been the same charge to have defended that return; so that it was the cost of the opposition party that occasioned the charge, the deliberation of the Parliament that occasioned the delay; but neither of them can be imputed to the Sheriff.

I cannot differ this case, from the case of bringing an action against a Jury, for malconduct, knowingly, and on purpose, to put the party to charges, finding a mistere specially, whereby great delay and great expences were, before the party could obtain judgment; and yet I think no man will affirm that an action will be in that case.

In this case the damages are found entire, so that if both parts, viz. the one suing in the House, and the pains and charges are not admissible causes of damages, it will be intended the Jury gave for both, and so the judgment is for that cause erroneous.

I suppose the voices of Parliament will not be mentioned for damages, for in most places they are only imaginary, being not demanded; but if there were so any consideration of them, it will not alter this case; for upon this return they are due as from the first day, and so no damage can be pretended against that return.

5. My fifth reason is taken from the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. which has been so often mention'd, that Statute is a great evidence to me, that no action lay by the Common Law against a Sheriff, for a false return of a writ of Election to the Parliament; and this evidence is much strengthened by the observation that hath been made, that never any action was brought otherwise than upon that Statute.

I must admit, that if an action lay by the Common Law, this Statute hath not taken it away, for there are no negative words in the Statute; but it is not likely that the Parliament would have made that Law, if there had been any remedy for the party before.

The Statute observes, that some Laws had been made before, for preventing false returns, but there was no convenient remedy provided for the party griev'd; and therefore give him an action for 100 l. If the Courts of Justice had, by the Common Law, jurisdiction to examine misfeitures, not concerning the returns of Sheriffs to the Parliament, what needed the Parliament to be so elaborate, to provide Law after Law, to give them power therein, and at last to give the party griev'd an action? Can any man imagine but that the Parliament took the Law to be, that the party was without remedy? I know preambles of Acts of Parliament are not always useful; but it becomes us, I am sure, to have respect to them, and not to impose any fault or failing to them, especially where oftentimes usage speaks for them.

If it has been objected, that in those times, it was reckoned a damage to be return'd twice in Parliament, which is the reason that as soon then did bring his action against the Sheriff for returning another in his stead. This cannot be true, for the Statute calls him the party griev'd, and is careful in providing convenient remedy for him; and we see by the many Statutes about those times, that it was a mischief very frequent, and there wanted no occasion for these actions; which does extremely strengthen the argument of the non-use of this pretended Common Law.

An action upon the case, where it may be brought, is a plaister that fits it for all times and all cases; and if such an action might then have been brought, there was no need for the Parliament to provide a convenient remedy.

By Littleton's rule, often mentioned by my brothers, we may conclude this action will not lie; for if such an action had lain, it would have been brought before this time.

In the case of Buckley against Rio Thomas, in Plowden's Commentaries, 128, which appears to be so elaborately argued both at Bar and Bench; if this Common Law had been thought upon, they might have prevented the question, whether the Sheriffs of Wales were bound by the Statute of 23 Hen. VI.

It seems plain to me, that the makers of the said Statute were ignorant of this Common Law; and yet my brother Tharold observes, the Judges, in those times, actually assisted in the passing of the Laws.

The Judges and Counsel in the case of Buckley's case were ignorant of this Common Law, else it would have been mention'd in the argument of that case.

This Common Law was never reveal'd, that I find, until a time that there were divers other new lights. I mean those times, when Mum brought an action for a false return against Straw, during the late troubles; but in those times it could never obtain Judgment. I have heard that the Court of Common-Places sent the Record to the Parliament, as a case too difficult for the Courts of Common Law to determine.

The Statute of 23 Hen. VI. is not only evidence, that no such action lay at the Common Law; but, in my opinion, is not consistent with any remedy at the Common Law, unless it be allowed that the party should be doubly punish'd.

If the party griev'd has brought his action upon the Statute, and recover'd, it was admitted by the Counsel, that no action can be brought at the Common Law; nor a return, can be recovered by the Statute, after he has recover'd by the Common Law, because Nonnulli poſſunt per actionem debere.

So far it stands well; but suppose the party griev'd has let his time of three months, and then a third petition brings a popular action, and recovers 100 l. upon the Statute; there is nothing on bill but the party griev'd from his action at Common Law, for his letting bill will not conclude him; so Statute of Limitations extending to this case. And if it be so, then must the party, besides his Fine and Imprisonment, be doubly punish'd by this Statute; which was made, as the Letter of it imports, because there wanted convenient remedy.

And now I am discoursing of this Statute, I must observe the great wisdom of the course of Parliament in these cases, which hath in great measure prevented the bringing of actions against Sheriffs, even upon this Statute.

Where the Sheriff mistakes the person in his return, he incurs the penalty of 23 Hen. VI. tho' it be without malice; and it may happen that any where there are 21 Electors of one side, and 20 of the other, the Sheriff returns him that hath 21, and the Parliament adjudging an incapacity in two of the 21, may determine he that had the 20 voices was duly chosen.

In such case the Sheriff had made a false return, within the penalty of the Statute of 23 Hen. VI. and no evidence shall be given against the determination of the Parliament.

This was a very hard case for the Sheriff, and if we were liable to such a mischief, many a pait Sheriff might be awaken'd, that takes himself to be secure.

But the course of Parliament prevents this, as it is reason, for immediately upon their determination, they send for the Sheriff, and call him to amend his return; and there is no record that can warrant any action to be brought for a false return: as when the Marshal of the King's Bench or Warden of the Fleet have made an improprietor return, contrary from causes where-with the Prisoner stood charged in their custody, whereby they became liable to action, they frequently move the Court to amend the return; and when the return is amended, all is set right, for there is no averring against a Record; in like manner, when the Sheriff hath amended his return, he is secure from any action upon that occasion.

By this means, there has of late years been no recovery upon the Statute, because all persons chafe rather to compel the Sheriff to amend his return, than they might be admitted to sit in the House, than to take their remedy upon the Statute, and no man can recover upon the Statute first, and afterwards their return amended: for I have been told, that by the course of Parliament, unless the Petition be lodged within some few days after the return, it cannot be received afterwards. So that a man cannot upon that

Statute

Statute here remedy at Law, and also in Parliament: which seems to be wisely provided, to prevent any contrivance of determinations.

The Statute of 23 H. VI. furnished those that argued for this office, with some argument, which doth now vanish: They said that all the inconveniences that could be objected to this addition, were the same upon the Statute of 13 H. VI. viz. That upon that Statute, the right of election must be examined upon a trial, where there might be a contrivance of determinations: for it appears by what I have said, that there can be no contrivance of determinations.

And there are other inconveniences in this remedy by the Common Law, which are not in the remedy given by the Statute, for by the Statute the time to be recovered is limited; the Informer hath time prescribed, for that there are bounds set which cannot be exceeded: but the remedy by the Common Law is without limitation of time, which is considerable; for all Sheriffs that ever made any return otherwise than the Parliament determined, will be liable, during their whole lives, to them that will call them to account for it. I say, this is without limitation of time, without measure of damages, or any rules contained in a written law: It depends upon a general notion of justice, which may be enlarged by construction, as it is now introduced without precedent.

To finish my observation upon this Statute, I say it is great wisdom in the Parliament to call the Sheriff to answer the return, and to prevent any remedy against him upon the Statute 23 H. VI. for I do not see that the rules of law concerning elections, are so manifestly clear and known, that it is fit that the Sheriff should, upon all returns that are corrected by the Parliament, pay the reckoning of the costs.

6. I have a third reason against this addition, which is, because the Sheriff is not admitted to take security to save him harmless in such cases; I take this reason to be iniquitous, and there needs no other in the case.

It were the most unreasonable and grievous thing in the world, that the Sheriffs should be bound to act without any deliberation, and not to be allowed to take any security, and yet be liable to an action, which way favour he takes: There is no court can avoid it but this of a double return, as I have before shown.

It has not been said, by any that argued the other way, that the Sheriff may take security, and, I suppose, will not be said, for it would be a dangerous course for Parliaments, for then the most ingenious man must be returned, and not be who is truly chosen.

If the Sheriff may not take security, the law must be his security. It was an argument used by my brother Ellis, That because the law imposes an officer, to wit, the Sheriff, therefore the law must give the party an action against that officer, if he misbehaves himself: The argument doth not hold universally, for the law imposes a Judge, and yet no action lies against him. But the reason of that argument, if turned the other way, is striking; for, as thus, The law will not suffer the Sheriff to take a security, therefore the law must be his security, else it were a most unreasonable law. This reason of itself is sufficient to bear the whole case, for no case can be put in our law, nor, so safe can he in any reasonable law, where a man is compelled to judge without deliberation, and cannot take security, and yet shall be liable to an action.

I have two more reasons to add, upon which I lay great weight, they depend not upon any particular circumstances of this case, but the general consideration of it.

1. That it is a new invention.

2. That it relates to the Parliament.

As it is a new invention, it ought to be examined very strictly, and have no allowance of favour at the end; and it will have the first feature that many other novelties, heretofore attempted in our law, have had.

Actions upon the case have sometimes been received in new cases, where it stands with the rules of law, and no inconvenience appears; but they have been more often rejected. I shall instance some cases that have been rejected, because it will be manifest by them, that all the arguments and positions laid down by my brother that would support the action, are as well applicable to several cases that have been already rejected, as to the case at bar.

An action upon the case was brought against a grand-jury-man, for falsity and maliciously conspiring to indict another, and adjudged it would not lie.

Against a witness for testifying falsely and maliciously; and an action was brought against a Judge, for adding falsity and maliciously; but adjudged that no action would lie in these cases.

I have three instances to add, as very argument urged for this action. The arguments my brother made in defending falsity and malice, which they made from the comparison of other actions upon the case of misnomer; the argument, that because the law imposes the office, it will punish the malice, has the same force in the case of a Judge, Juror, or Witness, and yet my brother admits in those cases, an action will not lie, which shows the invalidity of these arguments.

Now I shall give other instances where actions upon the case have been rejected for novelty and notions of inconvenience.

An action of the case was brought against the Lord of a Manor for not admitting a copy-holder, and it was adjudged it would not lie. Case 368.

There was a verdict found, and damages given by the jury in that case: The Lord is compellible in Chancery to admit a copy-holder, and what harm would it have been, if there might have been a remedy given by the Common Law, there being a truer broken by which the Lord was bound? The reason of the books now, because it was a novelty, and it would be vexatious, if every copy-holder should have an action against the Lord, when he refused to admit him upon his own terms.

It has been adjudged, that an action upon the case will not lie for the breach of a trust, because the Common Law cannot try what a trust is; but if such actions were allowed, the law might declare that to be a trust, which the Court of Chancery, that properly judges of trusts, might say it is not; so, when the Court of Law cannot examine the principal matter, the damages that we are but dependent upon shall not be regarded.

At my brother's argument in the case of Sir W. Soame, for maliciously killing Sir Th. Wentworth, the case was this. The plaintiff was a young lawyer that had expended all his gains in the purchase of a rent that was determinable upon the death of Sir Th. Wentworth; Sir W. Soame quarrelled with Sir Th. Wentworth in the streets, about a mistress, and killed him, whereby Madjion lost his rent. It was held the action would not lie, though it were said to be done maliciously, on purpose to determine the plaintiff's rent.

I observed in that case, that although Mr. Madjion knew very well that there was a mistress in the case, and that the rent was not aimed at, yet he would find try his fortune in the suit; thinking that a jury, perhaps, out of compassion to him, or to discourage the like facts, might make the malice pay him for his loss: but the Judges would not suffer it to go on, it being a mere device and a new-fangled action.

It has been held, that an action will not lie against a Parson for suing for tithes in-kind, knowing that there was a modus, because it might then be perilous for any Parson to insist upon his right.

It was held by the Court of Common-Pleas, that no action will lie for suing an Attorney, knowingly, in any other Court against his privilege: for his means to enjoy his privilege, is to claim it by way of privilege; and he is not bound to claim his privilege, nor can his adversary know he will claim it.

An action was lately brought in the King's Bench, (as I have heard) for detaining a post-learned man, whereby the plaintiff wanted information that might have been of great advantage to him. The Court distinguished the case, so that it proceeded no further. It was then said (as I heard) to this effect. That if such precedents were admitted, there could hardly be any dealing or correspondence, but might be matter for actions at law. And although the case depended upon proof of particular malice, and the defendant will be acquitted if his case be not odious yet we must consider that there is both charge and vexation of mind that attends the defence of a just cause, and we must not subject men for their actions to such trouble and hazard.

These instances show, that although an action upon the case be often a contrivance, yet when actions have been in new cases, they have always been strictly examined, and upon considerations of justice or inconvenience they have been many times rejected.

For though the law advances novelties, as my brother observed, yet it is with consideration that vexation be not more advanced than necessity.

In my opinion, that no new device ever was, or can be introduced into the law, but abundantly difficulties arise upon it, which were not foreseen, which makes me very jealous of admitting novelties. But,

2. In matters relating to the Parliament (which is my second ground) there is no need of introducing novelties; for the Parliament can provide new laws to assert any misdeeds that arise, and it ought to be left to them to do it.

Especially in a case of this nature, concerning elections, which the Parliament have already taken care of, and prescribed remedies by the several Statutes that have been made concerning them; I say, in such a case, there is little need to bring the law.

The Judges in all times have been very tender of meddling with matters relating to Parliament. I do not find that ever they tried elections, but where Statutes give them express power; or that they ever examined the behaviour of a Sheriff, or any officer of the Parliament, in relation to any service performed to the Parliament, but upon those Statutes: As in Bromley's case, Dyer 168. The Statute was their rule in the Star-Chamber, and they inflicted the same punishment that is appointed by that Statute.

If we shall allow general remedies (as an action upon the case) to be applied to cases relating to the Parliament, we shall at last invade the privilege of Parliament, and that great privilege of judging of their own proceedings.

Suppose an action should be brought in time of perjury, against a Member of Parliament, for that he falsely and maliciously did exhibit a complaint of breach of privilege to the Parliament, whereby the party was sent for in custody, and lost his liberty, and was put to great charges to acquit himself, and was acquitted by the Parliament.

If upon such a case the jury should find the defendant guilty, why should not that action be maintained as well as this at bar? It may be said for that action, that the judgment of the Parliament is followed, and the privilege is not tried at Law, but determined, 1. In the House, 2. It may be said, the party has no other way to recover his charges.

It would be dangerous to admit such an action, for then there would be peril in claiming, any degree; for if the party complained of, had the forfeiture be acquired by the House, the Member that made the complaint would be at the mercy of the jury as to the point of malice and quantity of damages. Such a precedent, I suppose, would not please the Parliament; and yet it may with more justice be the second case, than this at the bar the first.

Actions may be brought for giving Parliament-privileges wrongfully. Actions may be brought against the Clerk of the Parliament, Sergeant at Arms, and Speaker, for ought I know, for executing their offices on, with assaults of malice or damage: and then such Judges and Juries determine what they ought to do by their offices. This is in effect prescribing rules to the Parliament for them to act by.

It cannot be feared whether we shall be drawn, in we meddle with matters of Parliament in actions at law. Therefore, in my judgment, the only safety is in those bounds that are warranted by Acts of Parliament or constant practice.

Suppose this action had been brought before the election had been decided in the House, and the jury had found one way, and the Parliament had determined contrary, how inconsistent had this been?

But it was said in the King's Bench that the Court would not try it, before the Parliament had determined the election, and then that cannot be contended, but the judgment of the Parliament must be followed. And my brother Ellis has now said, hardly he can well be so indiscreet as to bring such an action before the Parliament had determined it, and the Court will not try it, before the election at the election is determined in a proper way. In my opinion, this was not rightly considered, for how can the Court say any thing, to expect the determination of the Parliament? And what reason or force is there, that the Sheriff, who is no party called to answer in the Parliament, should be concluded in any thing by a judgment between other other parties, to defend himself from a demand of damages in a Court of law, where witnesses are examined upon oath, which they cannot be in the Common House?

There is no reason the fate of law should stay till the House have determined the evidence, if the determination of the House be not conclusive in that case.

And for the discretion of the parties, that are like to bring such actions, I cannot depend upon it. If I live in this age, some men will insist upon their private right in the hindrance of publick Affairs of higher consequence than any that can come before the Courts in Widdow's Hall.

It may be, they will not want men that will peruse us to judge in such cases; and not only before the Parliament have determined, but against what the Parliament have determined; and will tell us, that the Sheriff was no party, that witnesses were not there examined upon oath, and produce Arguments from Antiquity which we shall be very loath to judge of.

I can see no other way to avoid consequences derogatory to the honour of the Parliament, but to reject the action; and all others that shall relate either to the proceedings or privilege of Parliament, as our Predecessors have done.

For if we should admit general remedies in matters relating to the Parliament, we must first consider how far they shall go, which is a dangerous province; for if we err, privilege of Parliament will be invaded, which we ought not any way to endanger.

This I speak of general remedies. Now I will consider this particular case, which, in my opinion, would bring great danger and dishonour to the Parliament.

It is dishonourable to the Parliament that there should be no protection in their service; I have shewn that the Sheriff can be safe in no case, if he shall be sued in such a case as this; And can there be a greater reproach, than that there is no safety in their service? Nobody can serve them cheerfully and willingly at this rate.

It has been objected that the Sheriff is not their officer, but is the officer of the Court of Chancery, which sends forth the writs, and receives the returns. The Argument is plausible, but will not pass in the Parliament; for they say the Court of Chancery is the Repository for their writs, but will not allow them to stay without warrant from the House: They will not suffer the Court of Chancery to meddle with the persons of the Sheriff. The Parliament sends immediate orders to the Sheriff, if the return be too slow, they desire the Sheriff to amend his return, and they punish the Sheriff when they find him faulty; so that it appears they exercise an immediate jurisdiction over the Sheriff. And I suppose they would judge it very false doctrine to say, that the Court of Chancery, or us, can any way meddle with the returns or the officer.

Admitting the Sheriff to act in returns as the Officer of the Parliament, it seems to me that he should be liable to no other punishment but what they inflict, otherwise they cannot expect to be obeyed.

To have others judge when their servants do well, will be to have others give rules to their servants and service, which they will think inconsistent.

Let it be considered how hard a task Sheriffs have in the elections of Knights to the Parliament: The appearance commonly is very numerous, the parties contending very violent, the proceeding tumultuous, the selling sometimes is at several places at once; so that the Sheriff can hardly be a witness of the action; and if the dispute be in the House of Commons, he is in no party to it. If after all this, the Sheriff, who cannot indemnify himself by security, shall be liable to an action, the service of the Parliament may be reckoned a miserable slavery, which is not for the honour.

As this is dishonourable, so it is dangerous to the Parliament; it concerns the Kingdom that returns to the Parliament should be upright and impartial, and that they may be so, the Sheriff should be secure from all suits.

Judges are not liable to actions, that they may proceed uprightly and impartially; if they were subject to suits for their judgments, there is that selfishness and confidence on both sides, that one side would be dissatisfied and trouble them, and they could not discharge their duty without apprehensions of disquiet.

If the Sheriff be exposed to actions thus, let us consider what and whom he is to fear. He may fear the suit of the party, and he may fear the suit of the King. And it follows necessarily, that if an action lies, an information for the King will also lie for the misdemeanour in his office: If it be not a safe privilege by the complexion of it, as Parliamentary, from being examined in Widdow's Hall, but that he may be punished at the suit of the Party, he may certainly as well be punished at the suit of the King: If so, Where is the Sheriff's security? Will his own innocence secure him? That must be used by a jury of the County where the Parliament sits, who are, it may be, strangers to him as well as to the matter; or by a jury of the County where the election was, where, it may be, they will be of an opposite party; the plaintiff may wait his opportunity, and question him twenty years after: And if he be condemned, his punishment is unlimited, a fine may be set to any height for the King, and damages may be given to any value for the party. Where is his security upon such proceedings? Will he not be more afraid of such punishment out of Parliament, than of any punishment in Parliament? Will not, say, may not his terror make him desire to please them that can punish him out of Parliament, rather than to do right? Will not that be dangerous to the constitution of Parliament?

As the punishment out of Parliament may be a terror to those who mean well, so colourable punishments may be as mischievous on the other side; for they may prevent any punishment in Parliament, for non pro puniunt pro evadit delicta; they may serve for protection of men that do ill. When it is seriously weigh'd, of what consequence this may be, the case at Bar will not be thought a case fit to be received by the Judges without the concurrence of a new law.

They object, there is malice found by the verdict, and that there can be no danger or inconsistency that malice should be punished. This objection fortifies my opinion; for malice, upon which they would have the scales turn in this case, is not a thing demonstrative, but interpretative, and lies in opinion; so that it may give an handle to any man to punish another by.

The influence of this very case shews, that a good man may reasonably be afraid of the event of his defence in such a case.

Vol. VII.

For altho' the matter was of great consideration in Parliament, and at last decided by a few voices, and an obliquation of the Sheriff's misdirection there; sho' it appeared upon the trial (which I may say, being present there), that the Sheriffs were guided by the advice of his friends of Council, and of Parliament-men, that told him the only safe course was to make a double return; yet the Jury condemn'd him to pay fool, against the expectation of the Court: For the Judges that were present at the trial did all declare publicly, that they would not have given that verdict.

The Jury heard all the evidence the Jury could see upon, for being of a remote County to the place of election, the Jury could know nothing of their own knowledge, and yet the Judges concern'd not with the Jury in their opinion.

I know we are not to examine the truth of the verdict, we must take it for gospel, neither doth any partiality in this particular lead me in judgment; but I drew it as an instance that malice is not demonstrative; men's minds may be mistaken, and innocent men may therefore have reason to be afraid, especially in ill times, and may use such means for their safety as may not be convenient for Parliament.

But there can be no danger or an inconvenience in the tenure of the Parliament, that represents the whole Kingdom, who hitherto have done, excus'd this power, and who may at any time reform the law, if the present practice be by any way inconvenient.

Upon these reasons which I have produced, I ground my opinion: Now it will be necessary to weigh what hath been said as apposition to it.

The Arguments urged on the other side, relate either to the ingredients or circumstances of this action, or to the foundation or substance of it.

I call the ingredients and circumstances of the action, that is a laid with these words, Falsely, maliciously, detestably, &c. fincer: And that there is a verdict in this case, and damages are found.

The words falsely, maliciously, & detestably, will sometimes make a thing actionable, which is not in itself, without malice proved, tho' there be the same damage to the party.

As when a man causes another to be falsely indicted, yet if it be not malicious, no action lies; tho' there be the same trouble, charge and damage in one case as the other.

But it is only where a man is a voluntary Agent; for if a man be compellable to act, you cannot molest him upon any agreement of malice: As if a grand-jury-man causes another to be indicted, tho' you ever malice, you cannot have an action against him, so far a witness that doth testify, or a judge that judgeth.

In the case at Bar, the Sheriff is compellable to act, and not barely as a Minister to find the indictment, but as a Judge to try which is the major part of the due Election, and if he misdotes, there is no reason it should subject him to an action upon an artificial agreement of malice.

As when a man causes another to be falsely indicted, Bank, Mr. Justice Bingham said well, that the words falsely & maliciously were given words of course, and put into every action: So that to his knowledge James many times had no regard to them, that he looked upon them as words of form.

If we should make the words falsely & maliciously support an action without a fit subject matter, all the actions of mankind would be liable to suit and vexation: They that have the coming (as we call it) of declarations in actions of the case, if they be faulty in their art, will be sure to put in the words falsely & maliciously, lest the case be what it will, they are here proper and singular in a Court's hand, that help to make havoc for any man, but will use make a dith of themselves.

For if a man shall use malice in an action against a Judge.

Not against an indolent or weakish, nor where words are not actionable, tho' the plaintiff hath a verdict and damages found; nor for a breach of trust, which is also false.

The reason of every one of these cases holds in the case at Bar: Therefore it ought to have the same Retelation.

As to the word fincer, it hath many significations; and if an action be brought for keeping a dog that worried another's sheep, fincer means an unlawful man's eye, unlawful, so for detaining the servant or wife of another, fincer: In these cases, if the defendant hath been told that the dog did worry sheep, or that it was the servant or wife of another, tho' it may be he did not believe it, yet it was fincer; for the word implies no more than having notice: And in those actions he must declare himself as his proof, and may, if he doth, and danger by putting away those things which give offence. But in this case he could receive information by none, and is not to believe or deliberate any body, but is bound to judge of the thing himself, and so act according to his judgment; so that no proof could be made of the fincer, for one side tells him the Election was one way, and the other side tells him it is the other way; but he being present to the whole action, must follow the dictates of his own judgment. Hence it appears, fincer in this case is an empty word, not relating to notice of a fact, but a matter of judgment, which cannot any way be proved.

It has been often said, that this case is stronger by being after a verdict and damages found by the jury, and it has been said, that perhaps upon a direct issue, it might have been found more doubtful.

The case is the same to me upon a verdict, that it would have been upon a general demurrer, and no stronger; for a demurrer is the confession of the party, of all that can be proved, or can possibly be found upon that declaration.

It is my Lord Chief's advice in Cromwell's case, 4th part, 24. a. moves to demur to a declaration, if there be any hopes of the matter of fact, for the matter in law will well serve after a verdict as upon a demurrer.

It had been a very odious case, if the Sheriff should have admitted all this fact to be true by a demurrer.

The finding the Plaintiff's damages adds no strength to the case; for we see every day upon actions for words, tho' the Jury find the defendant guilty for saying words falsely & maliciously, and find it to be so in the Plaintiff's great damage; yet if the words are not such as will bear an action, the Court stays judgment; and if judgment happens to be given, it is reversible for error, which shews that the finding damages by the jury cannot make an action better than if it were to be adjudged upon demurrer.

I Gall

I shall now consider what hath been said to maintain this action upon the main substance and foundation of it. They say, this is a case within the general reason of the Common Law, for here is malice, falsity and damage; and where they concur, there ought to be remedy. And altho' this be a new case, yet it ought not for that reason to be rejected; for other kind of actions have been newly introduced, and this is as fit to be entertained as any.

My brothers that argued even now for the action, showed great learning and great pains, and certainly have said all that can be urged in support of this case: But as for as I could perceive, they have spoken only upon general reasons to that purpose I just now mentioned, but nothing that I could observe applicable to the reasons and differences I go upon.

As for the rule they go upon, that where falsity, malice and damage do occur, there must be remedy; I confess it is true generally, but not universally, for it holds not in the case of a Judge, nor an Indictor, nor a Witness, nor of words that import not legal falsity, tho' they are found to bring damage, as I have shewn before. And the reasons that exempt these cases from the general rule, have the same force in the case at bar.

I must confess that Judges have sometimes entertained new kinds of actions, but it was upon great deliberation, and with great discretion, where a general inconvenience required it.

If Sir Wm's case were new (for my brother Tharold observed truly it was dead in that case, that there were infinite numbers of precedents) that case imported the common course of justice, Actions for words that are said to be new, tho' they have been said some hundreds of years, are a necessary means to preserve the peace of the Kingdom. The case of Smith and Grylls, 20 Car. 15. was a case of general concern, being that prosecutions for treason may be against any man, and at any time.

But in the case at bar, neither the peace of the Kingdom, nor the course of justice is concerned in general, but only the administration of officers of the Nation; as the execution of Parliamentary Writs; and can never happen but in issue of Parliament, and must of necessity fall under the notice of the Parliament; so that if the law were deficient, it is to be presumed the Parliament would take care to supply it. Discretion requires us rather to attend that, than to introduce new precedents upon such general notions that cannot govern the course of Parliament.

My brother Adams said, the Common Law coupled with the genius of the Nation; I do not understand the Argument: Does the Common Law change? Are we to judge of the changes of the genius of the Nation? Whether any general notions carry us at this rate! For my own part, I think, tho' the Common Law be not written, yet it is certain, and not arbitrary. We are bound to observe the laws as they are, and I fear not how we can change them by our Judgment; and as for the genius of the Nation, it will be well considered by the Parliament, who have power of the laws, and may bring us to a compliance with it.

In the case at bar, I look upon the Sheriff as a particular officer of the Parliament for the managing elections, and as if he were not Sheriff: I look upon the writ as if it were an order of Parliament, and had not the name of a writ: I look upon the course of Parliament, which we pretend not to know, to be incident to the consideration of it; so that it stands not upon the general notion of remedy in the common course of justice.

The Arguments of the filling of the value of money, whereby the penalty of 100*l.* provided by the 25 H. VI. is become incredible; and the increase of the estimation of being a Member of Parliament; if they were true, are arguments to the Parliament to change the law by increasing the penalty, but we cannot do so.

My brother Adams, in his Argument, would embolden us; telling us we are not to think the case too hard for us, because of the name or course of Parliament; for Judges have punished Absconders: They may determine what is a Parliament, what is an Act of Parliament, how long an Ordinance of Parliament shall continue, and may punish trespasses done in the very Parliament.

I will not dispute the truth of what he said in this, but if his Arguments were artificial, he might have feared them, for they have no manner of effect to draw us beyond my sphere.

I will not be afraid to determine any thing that I think proper for me to judge, but being I cannot find the Courts of Justice have at any time meddled with cases of this nature, but upon express power given them by Acts of Parliament, I cannot consent to this precedent; I am confident when there is need, the Parliament will defend it, and make laws to enlarge our power, so far as they shall think convenient.

I see no harm that Sheriffs in the mean time should be safe from this new-devised action, which they call the Common Law; if they mismanage themselves, they are answerable to the Parliament, whose officers they be, or may be punished by the Statute, made for regulating Elections.

It is time for me to conclude, which I shall do by repeating the opinion I am full delivered, viz. That this judgment is not warranted by the rules of law, That it is a breach of novelty of dangerous consequence, and therefore ought to be reversed. Some noviter eritis, non veteri eritis, falli.

Norris, Chief Justice, and five other Judges (against Ellis and Adams) reversed the judgment upon the matter in Law. That the action lies not. (Note, The Lord Chief Justice Farthing, and Lord Chief Baron Trotter, both deceased, who in their lives were eminent Members of Parliament, were of the false opinion.)

Soon after the Revolution, Sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his Writ of Error into the House of Peers, to reverse the reversal of the judgment given in the Exchequer; but the House affirmed the reversal of the said judgment, as appears by the following Resolutions.

Per curiam, 24 May, 1689.

THIS Day the Lord Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench brought into this House a transcript of a Writ of Error, to reverse a judgment given against Barnardiston at the suit of Soame.

Sabbath, 25 May, 1689.

Whereas Sir Samuel Barnardiston brought his Writ of Error into this House, and hath assigned errors thereupon, to which Sir William Soame was Defendant; who left Dame Catherine Soame, his widow, his executrix; and the House being moved, that the said Dame Catherine Soame may join issue thereupon; it is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, that the said Dame Catherine Soame be, and is hereby required to join issue to the said Writ, on or before Thursday next, being the sixth instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; whereas the said Sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said Dame Soame, to the end the issue may accordingly.

Sabbath, 3 Junij, 1689.

The House being moved, that they would be pleased to appoint a day for hearing the errors argued upon the Writ of Error brought into this House, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiston is Plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame, widow, executrix of Sir William Soame, Defendant: It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That this House will hear the said errors argued by Counsel on both sides, at the bar, on Saturday next, being the fifth instant, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and in the mean time the may join issue if they please: whereas the said Sir Samuel Barnardiston is to cause notice to be given to the said Dame Catherine Soame, to the end she attend accordingly.

Sabbath, 8 de Junij, 1689.

This day being appointed for hearing errors argued by Counsel, upon the Writ of Error wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiston and the Lady Soame, the Counsel for the Plaintiff appeared, but none appeared for the Defendant: And upon such made at the bar by Nicholas Baily, Solicitor, that he served the order of this House at the house of the Lady Soame; thereby giving notice, that the cause was to be heard this day, whereas the House heard the Counsel of the Plaintiff, and made the ensuing Order, &c.

After hearing Counsel this day, upon the Writ of Error depending in this House, wherein Sir Samuel Barnardiston is Plaintiff, and Dame Catherine Soame is Defendant: It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, the wrong judgment on this Writ of Error be, and is hereby adjudged, null, void, and of no effect; and that they are, and were Judges, and now in Town do attend this House that day, to inform the House of their reasons and grounds for their judgment for reversal of the judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case.

Ordered, That all the Judges be present on Monday morning, to advise this House in this business of Sir Samuel Barnardiston.

Monday, 10 Junij, 1689.

William Montague, Esq. was called in, and the Speaker told him, That the House desired to hear from him, upon what grounds and opinions he gave his opinion for the reversal of the judgment for giving eight hundred pounds to Sir Samuel Barnardiston?

He taking notice that there was Counsel present for Sir Samuel Barnardiston, but no Counsel for the Lady Soame, he said, seeing the Defendant did not appear with Counsel, he desired he might not be looked upon as Counsel for the Defendant; upon that the company was commanded to withdraw: And the House ordered Mr. Montague should be admitted to come in alone; who being come in, said, he would, for their Lordships satisfaction (as well as he can remember) acquaint them with the grounds and reasons which induced him to give his opinion for the reversal of that judgment; and so he proceeded to give the heads of what he said, which being ended, he withdrew.

And after consideration thereof, it was moved that the Counsel for Sir Samuel Barnardiston should be called in, and the Speaker to acquaint them with the effect of what Mr. Montague had said; that so the Counsel might be able thereby to reply, for the better information of their Lordships and the Judges then present. And after some debate, the question was put, whether the Counsel shall be called in? It was resolved in the negative.

Then it was moved to make use of proxies, which was opposed, as concerning their not being admitted in preliminary cases of judgment.

After hearing William Montague, Esq. for his judgment in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case, and debate thereupon, it is ordered, That the Clerk do inspect the books concerning proxies; and whether they have been used in cases of judicature; and give an account to-morrow morning what he finds therein: And that all the Judges do attend the House to-morrow.

Martin, 11 Junij, 1689.

The Clerk of the Parliament, in pursuance of the Order yesterday, shewed several instances where proxies have been used in preliminaries to private causes: It is ordered by the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, That proxies may be used in such preliminary cases, but not in giving judgment; and that this order be added to the Roll of binding Orders.

Ordered, That the Counsel of Sir Samuel Barnardiston shall be heard on Friday next to reply to what Mr. Montague gave for his reasons for reversal of Sir Samuel Barnardiston's judgment; and that all the Judges do attend at the same time.

Per curiam, 14 de Junij, 1689.

After hearing Counsel in Sir Samuel Barnardiston's case this day, to reply to what Mr. William Montague said for his reasons to reverse the judgment given in the Exchequer: It is ordered, That this House will hear all the Judges give their opinions in this case on Tuesday the 25th of this instant June, at ten of the clock in the forenoon.

Martin, 25 de Junij, 1689.

The House heard the opinion of all the Judges in the case of Sir Samuel Barnardiston, upon his Writ of Error depending in this House.

And the question being put, Whether to go on in the debate of this business now? It was resolved in the affirmative.

After debate, the question being put, Whether to reverse the reversal of the judgment given between Sir Samuel Barnardiston and Sir William Soame? It was resolved in the negative.

Leave is given to several Lords to cater their dissent to the above said question, and accordingly do enter their dissent for the reasons ensuing.

1. Because it is a denying Sir Samuel Barnardiston the benefit of law, which gives relief in all wrong and injury: And tho' this be an action of the civil impression, yet concerning a damage to the Plaintiff, the Common Law gives him this action to repair himself; and if it were not so, there would be a failure of justice, which cannot be admitted.

2. Because

g. Because the allowing this reversal tends towards the giving the power and encouragement to Sheriffs to make false and double returns; by which means the right of Elections will be avoided, and it tends thereby to the picking of a House of Commons, which may overturn the whole frame of the Government, and establish what Religion and Government a pack'd Parliament shall think fit.

XXXI. Proceedings in the House of Commons, on an Appeal being brought in the House of Lords, by Dr. SHIRLEY, against Sir JOHN FAGG, and others, their Members, May 1675, 27 Car. II.

SIR John Fagg, Bart. this day informed the House, that he was summoned to appear to a Petition in the House of Lords; a Committee was thereupon appointed to search for precedents to that purpose.

Mercurii, 5 Maii.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to acquaint them that this House hath received information, That there is a Petition of Appeal depending before them, at the suit of Thomas Shirley, Esq. against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House; to which Petition, he is, by order of the House of Lords, directed to answer on Friday next; and to desire the Lords to have a regard to the privileges of this House; and that Sir Trevor Williams do go up with the Message to the Lords.

Sir Trevor Williams reports, that he had attended the Lords with the Message of this House, concerning Sir John Fagg; and that the Lords will return an answer by Messengers of their own.

Mercurii, 7 Maii.

A Message from the Lords by Sir William Bourne, and Sir Samuel Clarke.

Mr. Speaker,

The Lords have considered of the Message received from the House of Commons, concerning privilege in the case of Sir John Fagg, and do return this answer, That the House of Commons need not doubt, but that the Lords will have a regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, as they have of their own.

Sabbati, 8 Maii.

A Committee was appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what entries are therein made against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, and to report the same.

Mercurii, 12 Maii.

Dr. Thomas Shirley ordered to be sent for to custody, to answer his breach of the privileges of this House, in prosecuting a suit by petition of Appeal in the Lords House, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

And a Committee is also appointed to inspect the Lords Journals, to see what has been done in like cases; and the said Sir John Fagg is ordered not to proceed, or make any answer to the said Appeal, without the licence of this House.

Mercurii, 14 Maii.

Sir Thomas Lee reports from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, and the entries therein, in the case between Dr. Thomas Shirley and Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, that the Committee had perused the Journals of the Lords House, and found the entries to be as follows:

April 26 36h.

Thomas Shirley, Esq. presented a Petition to the Lords. Ordered, That the said Sir John Fagg may have a copy of the said Petition, and put in his answer thereto, in writing, on Friday the 7th day of May next, at ten of the clock in the forenoon, if he thinks fit.

May 26 5h.

The Commons send a Message by Sir Trevor Williams: The Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses of the House of Commons, in Parliament assembled, have been informed, that there is a Petition of Appeal depending before their Lordships, at the suit of Thomas Shirley, Esq. against Sir John Fagg, a Member of their House. To which Petition he is, by their Lordships order, directed to answer on Friday next, and desire their Lordships to take care of their privileges.

Answer, That this House have considered of their Message, and will send answer by Messengers of their own.

Ordered, That the Committee for Privileges do meet this afternoon, to consider of the Message received from the House of Commons this day, concerning Thomas Shirley, Esq. and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House, and search precedents in the case, and report to the House to-morrow morning.

May 26 5h.

The Earl of Berke reported, That the Committee of Privileges having met and considered of what was referred to them in the case between Thomas Shirley, Esq. and Sir John Fagg, a Member of the House of Commons, and the Message from the House of Commons thereupon; have ordered him to report, That the Committee have found that the House did order the business of Mr. Hale and Mr. Shipley, upon the like Message of the House of Commons, to the Committee of Privileges; who had report to the House, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords as judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the law; and the House did agree with their Lordships, upon this occasion, to take the same course, and to insist upon their just rights in this particular, which their Lordships will be pleased to signify to the House of Commons, in such manner as they shall think fit.

The House agreed with the Committee in this declaration, and ordered the same to be entered into the Journal-book of this House, as their declaration was.

"That it is the undoubted right of the Lords as judicature, to receive and determine in time of Parliament, Appeals from inferior Courts, though a Member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the law."

Then it was moved, that the former answer sent to the House of Commons, in the case of Mr. Shipley and Mr. Hale, might be given now to the House of Commons, in this case of Sir John Fagg; and that the declaration and report agreed to this day, might be added to it.

The Declaration aforesaid was read, and the question being put, Whether this shall be as a part of the answer to be given to the House of Commons? It was resolved in the negative.

The answer returned hitherto to the House of Commons, in the case of Mr. Shipley and Mr. Hale, was in these words: That the House of Commons are not bound but that their Lordships will have a regard to the privileges of the House of Commons, on the hour of their own.

The question being put, Whether this answer shall be now returned to the Message from the House of Commons? It was resolved in the affirmative.

May 27th, it was sent accordingly.

May 7.

Whereas this day was appeared for Sir John Fagg to put in an answer to the Petition and Appeal of Thomas Shirley, Esq. depending in this House, if he thought fit; the said Sir John Fagg appearing personally this day at the Bar, and desiring longer time to put in an answer thereunto;

It is thereupon ordered, That the said Sir John Fagg hath hereby further time given him for putting in his answer, till Wednesday next, being the 28th day of this instant May, at ten o'clock in the forenoon.

May 12.

Sir John Fagg put in his answer to the petition of Mr. Shirley. A debate arising thereupon, touching the privilege of their House; Resolved, &c. That the Appeal brought by Dr. Shirley in the House of Lords, against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, and the proceedings thereupon, are a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of this House.

The House being informed, that the Warrant of this House for taking of the said Dr. Shirley into custody, was forcibly taken away and detained from the Sergeant at Arms his Deputy, attending this House, by the Lord Abbot: And the Sergeant's Deputy being called in and examined as to the manner of fact, gave this testimony:

That he found Dr. Shirley in the inner Lobby of the House of Lords, and that he came to him, and desired to speak with him, and acquainted him that he had a Warrant from the House of Commons to apprehend him, and desired to know, whether he could show him any reason to excuse him, that that he might not come the warrant to him: And that he likewise told him, that he would not execute the warrant on him in that place, but desired of him, that he would go along with him freely; and that in case he would not, he would take his opportunity in another place.

And that the said Lord Mordaunt coming in, in the mean time, required him to show his warrant; which being produced, the Lord Mordaunt laid hands on it, and held it to fall, that it was in danger of being torn; and that therefore he was forced to part with it, and desiring to have it again, the Lord Mordaunt refused it, but carried the warrant into the House of Lords. That Dr. Sturley afterwards refused to go along with him, saying, that he was not then his prisoner; and that several persons intervening, the Doctor escaped from them. And a debauching ensued thereupon.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords to complain of the Lord Mordaunt, for forcibly taking away and detaining the warrant of this House, from the Deputy Sergeant at Arms, for taking of Dr. Sturley into custody; and to demand the justice of the Lords House against the said Lord Mordaunt.

And that the Lord Arden do go up to the Lords with the Message.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do issue forth a new warrant to the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, for apprehending Dr. Thomas Sturley, to answer his breach of privilege, for producing a fact by petition of Appeal in the Lords House, against Sir John Figg, a Member of this House, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

Session, 15 May 1675.

The Lord Arden reports from the Lords, that he had, in challenge to the commands of this House, attended the Lords, and delivered the Message concerning the Lord Mordaunt's taking away and detaining the warrant for apprehending Dr. Sturley, and that the Lords had returned this answer;

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

The Lords have considered of your Message, and of the complaint therein; and they return you this answer, That they find the Lord Mordaunt have done nothing but what is according to his duty.

The House then resumed the debate of the matter concerning the privileges of this House, and the matter being debated, Resolved, Scilicet, That the Appeal brought by Dr. Sturley in the House of Lords against Sir John Figg, a Member of this House of Commons, and the proceedings thereupon, is a breach of the undoubted rights and privileges of the House of Commons; and therefore the Commons desire, that there be no further proceedings in that cause, before their Lordships.

Ordered, That a conference be desired with the Lords concerning the privileges of this House, in the case of Sir John Figg; and that Sir Thomas Lee do go up to the Lords to desire a conference.

A Message from the Lords by Sir Maudslayi Brampton, and Sir William Goffart:

Mr. Speaker,

We are commanded in let this House know, that the Lords spiritual and temporal assembled in Parliament, have received a warrant, signed Edward Seymour, which they have appointed us to show you; and desire to know, whether it is a warrant ordered by this House?

The matter of the Message being debated, the question being put, That the word superintendency, be part of the answer to the Lords Message, It passed in the negative.

Resolved, That the messengers be called in, and that this Answer be returned, That this House will consider of the Message.

The messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker does acquaint them, that the House will consider of the Message.

Resolved, That the Message last received from the Lords, lean unsatisfactory Message.

Resolved, That a conference be desired to be had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the last Message received from the House of Lords.

Resolved, That it be referred to Mr. Garraway, Esq. to draw up a petition to be offered at the said conference.

Then the House being informed, that there is a cause upon an Appeal brought up by Sir Nicholas Dingwall, against Mr. Ogden, a Member of this House, appointed to be heard at the bar of the Lords House.

Resolved, That a Message be sent to the Lords to acquaint them, that this House has received information, that there is a cause upon an Appeal brought by Sir Nicholas Dingwall against Mr. Ogden, a Member of this House, appointed to be heard at the bar of their House, on Monday next; and to desire their Lordships to have regard to the privileges of this House: And that Sir Richard Temple do go up with the Message to the Lords.

Ordered, That Mr. Ogden do not appear any further in the prosecution of the Appeal brought against him by Sir Nicholas Dingwall, in the House of Lords.

Ordered, That Sir Nicholas Dingwall be sent for in custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, to answer his breach of privilege in prosecuting a suit in the House of Lords, against Arthur Ogden, Esq. a Member of this House, during the session and privilege of Parliament.

Resolved, That whoever shall appear at the bar of the Lords House, to prosecute any but against any Member of this House, shall be deemed a breaker and infringer of the rights and privileges of this House.

Session, 17 May 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports, That the person appointed had attended the Lords, and delivered the vote of this House, concerning the Appeal brought by Dr. Sturley against Sir John Figg.

So Sir Thomas Lee reports from the Committee appointed to draw up reasons for the conference to be had with the Lords, Reasons agreed by the Committee, which are as follow, viz.

For that the Message is a way of interrogatory upon the proceedings of the House of Commons, in a case concerning the privilege of a Member of that House, of which they are proper Judges.

For that the matter of the Message comes in it an undue reflection upon the Speaker of the House of Commons.

For that the matter of the Message does highly reflect upon the whole House of Commons, in their Lordships questioning that House concerning their own orders; which they have the more reason to apprehend, because the day before this Message was brought to them, the warrant was owned by the complaint of the House of Commons to their Lordships, that the same was taken and detained upon a warrant of theirs; by a Peer, which imports, that the question in that Message could not better inform them fully, and to tends to interrupt that mutual good correspondence, which ought to be preserved invariably between the two Houses of Parliament.

Session, 18 May 1675.

Sir Richard Temple reports from the Lords, That he had attended their Lordships, according to the command of this House, with the message in the case of Mr. Ogden, to which the Lords returned an answer, which being in writing, was delivered in at the Clerk's table, and read, and is as followeth:

The Lords do declare, That it is the undoubted right of the Lords in judicature, to receive and determine in the Parliament Appeals from inferior Courts, except a Member of either House be concerned, that there may be no failure of justice in the law. And from this right, and the exercise thereof, their Lordships will not depart.

The matter of the Lords answer being debated, Resolved, "That it is the undoubted right of this House, that none of their Members be summoned to attend the House of Lords, during the session or privilege of Parliament."

Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Lords, upon the privileges of this House, contained in the Lords answer to the last Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogden.

Ordered, That Sir Henry Figg do go up to the Lords, to desire a conference upon the subject-matter of their Message, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Sturley.

Session, 20 May 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to draw up reasons to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords upon the privileges of this House, contained in the Lords answer to the last Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogden, which reasons were twice read, and with some alterations at the Clerk's table (upon the question severally put) agreed to: which are as follow, viz.

1. That by the laws and usage of Parliament, privilege of Parliament belongs to every Member of the House of Commons, in all cases, except Treason, Felony, and breach of the Peace; which hath often been declared in Parliament, without any exception of Appeals before the Lords.

2. That the reason of that privilege is, that the Members of the House of Commons freely attend the public affairs of that House, without disturbance or interruption; which hath extended as well to Appeals before the House of Peers, as to proceedings in other Courts.

3. That by the constant course and usage of Parliament, no Member of the House of Commons can attend the House of Lords, without the especial leave of that House first obtained, much less be summoned or compelled to do so.

4. If the Lords shall proceed to hear and determine any Appeal where the party neither can, nor ought to attend, such proceedings would be contrary to the rules of justice.

5. That the not determining of an Appeal against a Member of the House of Commons, is not a failure of justice, but only a suspension of proceedings in a particular case, during the continuance of that Parliament, which is but temporary.

6. That as it is a failure of justice, it is not to be remedied by the House of Lords alone, but it may be by Act of Parliament.

Hence Sir Thomas Lee reports from the Committee appointed to prepare the further address of the House to his Majesty, for the reviving of his father's as is in the Prærogative King's service; which the House desired the further consideration of all Parliament next.

Then Sir Thomas Lee reports from the Lords, that he had attended, and desired a conference with the Lords on the privilege of this House, contained in the Lords answer to the Message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogden: And that the Lords will return an answer by Messengers of their own.

Mr. Pease reports, from the conference had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the former conference, concerning the warrant for apprehending Dr. Sturley, That the Lords had returned an answer to the reasons of this House, delivered at the former Conference, and are as follow:

"The Lords have appointed this conference, upon the subject-matter of the last conference, and have commanded us to give their answers to the reasons and other matters then delivered by the House of Commons."

"To the first question, the Lords conceive, that the most natural way of being informed, is by way of question; and fixing a paper here which did reflect upon the privileges of the Lords House, their Lordships would not proceed upon it till they were assured it was owned by the House of Commons: But the Lords had no occasion at that time, nor do they now think fit to enter into the debate of the House of Commons being or not being proper Judges in the case concerning the privilege of a Member of that House; their Lordships need only consider upon facts of this paper, being only, how far the House of Commons intended (if that paper were theirs) the apprehension of Dr. Sturley, for prosecuting his Appeal before the Lords, did encroach upon their Lordships both privilege and undoubted rights of judicature in the consequence of it, exempting all the Members of both Houses from the judicature of this the highest Court of the Kingdom; which would cause a failure of that supreme justice, not admissible in any other Court, and which their Lordships will never admit."

"As to the second reason, the Lords answer, That they do not approve head how the Matter of this Message is any reflection upon the Speaker of the House of Commons."

"To the third reason, The Lords cannot imagine how it can be apprehended to the lead to reflect upon the House of Commons, for the House of Peers, upon a paper produced to those Lordships, in form of a warrant of that House, wherein doubts was made among the Lords, whether any such thing had been ordered by that House, to enquire of the Commons, whether such warrant was ordered there or no? And without such Liberty by the Lords, it will be very hard for their Lordships to be rightly informed, in as to perform a good correspondence between the two Houses, which their Lordships shall endeavour to know when warrants in the name of that House are true or pretended: And it is so ungrounded an apprehension, that their Lordships intended any reflection

"Action in asking that question, and not taking notice in their message of the complaint of the House of Commons concerning that warrant, that the Lords had sent their message concerning that paper to the House of Commons, before the Lords had received the said Commons complaint."

"But their Lordships have great cause to except against the unjust and unkind reflection of that House upon their Lordships, in asserting that the question in the Lords' message could not be for information, as we affirm, but tending to interrupt the mutual correspondence between the two Houses; which we deny, and had not the least thought of."

"The Lords have further commanded us to say, that they doubt not when the House of Commons have received what we have delivered at this conference, they will be sensible of their error, in calling our message strange, unusual, or unparliamentary. Though we cannot but take notice, that their answer to our message, that they would consider it, was the first of that kind that we can find to have come from that House."

"The question being put, Whether the House be satisfied with the reason delivered by the Lords at the last conference? it passed in the negative. Resolved, That a free conference be desired with the Lords upon the matter delivered at the last conference; and that the former Managers do attend, and manage the free conference."

Friday, May 21. The House resolved on Wednesday next to proceed in the further consideration of that part of the message relating to Appeals from inferior Courts. Sir Trevor Williams ordered to go up to the Lords, to desire a conference upon the privileges of this House, contained in their answer to the message touching Mr. Ogilby's case, which he accordingly did; and reports, That the Lords will return an answer thereto by messengers of their own.

May 25. A message ordered to be sent to the Lords to remind them of the former message; and upon it to desire a conference upon the privileges of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogilby. And ordered the matter of the jurisdiction of the Lords, in cases of Appeal, be taken into consideration to-morrow morning.

Parliament, 28 May, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee to whom it was referred to draw up reasons to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords upon the subject-matter of their answer to the last message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogilby, several reasons agreed by the said Committee; which he read at his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the Clerk's table; where the same being twice read, were, upon the question, severally agreed unto, and are as follow, viz.

"For that the Commons desired a conference upon their privileges concerning by the Lords answer to a message sent to the Lords the 18th of May, in the case of Mr. Ogilby; their Lordships have not agreed any conference in the case of Mr. Ogilby; but have only agreed a conference concerning their privilege in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Ogilby, which was the only subject-matter of the desired conference."

"The limitation in the Lords' agreement to a conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the conference that may in any way concern their Lordships' jurisdiction, is in effect a denial of any conference at all, upon the subject on which it was desired; which ought not to be: the jurisdiction which their Lordships claim in Appeal against a Member of the House of Commons, and the privilege of that House being in that case involved, that there can be no conference upon the latter, without some way touching upon the former."

"That this manner of agreeing to a conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of Proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament, in coming to conference; and doth tend to place a power in the Managers of such conferences, to judge whether such proviso's be broken or not; and accordingly to proceed, or break off the conference upon their own judgments."

June, 31 May, 1675.

Sir Leslie Jenkins reports, that he had attended the Lords, with the message of this House, for conference upon the subject-matter of the Lords' answer to the last message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogilby; and that the Lords had sent answer, that they would return answer by messengers of their own.

A message from the Lords by Sir Mansfield Bromfiel, and Sir William Bromfiel.

"Mr. Speaker,

"The Lords have commanded us to acquaint you, that they desire a conference presently in the Painted-Chamber, with the House of Commons, upon that not coming to the conference desired by them on Thursday last, and by the Lords appointed to be at ten of the clock in the Painted-Chamber, on Friday the 31st of this instant May."

The messengers being withdrawn, and the message debated, a present conference upon the question was agreed.

And the messengers being called in, Mr. Speaker acquainted them, that the House had agreed to a present conference.

Ordered, That the former Members that were appointed to manage the former conference in the case of Mr. Ogilby, do attend and manage this conference.

Sir John Trevor reports, from the conference, that the Lords had declared the intent of this conference, in the effect following, viz. "That the Lords have appointed this conference, out of that constant desire and resolution that they have to continue a free correspondence between the two Houses; which is of the essence of Parliamentary Proceedings."

"For this end their Lordships have commanded us to tell you, that they cannot but take notice of the House of Commons failing to be on Friday last, at a conference desired by themselves, and appointed by the Lords at ten of the clock in the Painted-Chamber."

"That they conceive it tends to an interruption of all Parliamentary Proceedings, and to evade the right of the Lords to appoint time and place for a conference."

Voc. VII.

Ordered, That it be referred to the former Committee, who are appointed to draw up reasons, to be offered at a conference to be had with the Lords, upon the subject-matter of their answer to the message of this House, in the case of Mr. Ogilby; to consider of the manner delivered by the Lords at the last conference; and to prepare and draw up further reasons, to be offered at another conference to be had with the Lords, upon the subject-matter of the last conference. And that the Committee do meet this afternoon at five of the clock in the Speaker's Chamber. And Mr. Sergeant Maynard, and Mr. Serjeant, are to have notice to attend the same.

Mardi, 1 Juny, 1675.

Sir Thomas Lee reports, from the Committee appointed to inspect the Journals of the House of Lords, and to set what Proceedings have been entered, in the case of Mr. Dalnashy and Mr. Ogilby; that they had inspected the Lords' Journals, as to the case of Mr. Dalnashy, and collected what Proceedings had been in that case, but had no opportunity of time, yet to do it in the case of Mr. Ogilby. Which Proceedings being reported, were read, and delivered in at the Clerk's table, and are as follow, viz.

29 April, 1675.

The Appeal brought by Cryse and Cryse, complaining against a Decree in Chancery made, wherein Mr. Dalnashy is named to be one of the Petitioners; Creskorne and Bryer are ordered to put in an answer, and Dalnashy, if he please.

May 12, 1675.

Ordered, That this House will hear Counsel at the Bar, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Cryse and others, against the Lady Viscountess Creskorne, the Lady Anne Bryer, and Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; and their answer thereto, depending at this House, on Wednesday the 19th of this instant May, at six of the clock in the forenoon; wherein the Petitioners are to cause timely notice to be given to the said Defendants, or their Agents in the said cause, for that purpose.

May 26, 1675.

Whereas Sir Nicholas Cryse, Barr. having an Appeal depending in this House, against the Lady Viscountess, Lady Bryer, and Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; a Member of the House of Commons, hath prayed that Council may be assigned him to plead his cause upon the said Appeal, and hath named Council for that purpose:

It is ordered, That Sir John Churchill, Sergeant Puck, Sergeant Powhatan, and Mr. Prier, named by the said Sir Nicholas Cryse, be, and are hereby appointed to open, and manage the said cause, on the part and behalf of the said Sir Nicholas Cryse, on Thursday the 27th day of this instant May, at ten of the clock in the forenoon; and at such other times, as it shall be depending in this House.

Upon reading the Petition of Sir Nicholas Cryse, Barr. Thomas Cryse and John Cryse, Esqrs. shewing, that having an Appeal depending in this House against Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; a Member of the House of Commons, and others, they are in danger of being arrested by an order of the House of Commons; and therefore pray the protection of this House, that they may have liberty to prosecute their said Appeal with Freedom:

It is thereupon ordered, That the said Sir Nicholas Cryse, Barr. John Cryse, and Thomas Cryse, or any of them, their or any of their Counsel, Agents or Solicitors, or such other person or persons as they shall employ, in prosecuting the said Appeal before this House, be, and are hereby privileged, and protected accordingly by this House; until the matter upon the Appeal be determined by their Lordships. And all persons whatsoever are hereby prohibited from arresting, imprisoning, or otherwise molesting the said Sir Nicholas Cryse, John Cryse, and Thomas Cryse, or any of them, their or any of their Counsel, Agents, or Solicitors, upon any pretence whatsoever, during the time prefixed, as they or such of them will answer the contrary to this House.

May 26, 1675.

The cause between Sir Nicholas Cryse, etc. plaintiffs, and Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; defendant, appeared to be heard the 27th, was ordered to be heard the 28th May.

May 27.

Upon reading the petition of Sir Nicholas Cryse, complaining, that the Council assigned him by this House, to plead his cause at the bar, wherein Mr. Dalnashy is one of the defendants, do refuse to plead for him in this case, in regard of a vote of the House of Commons; Sir Nicholas Cryse was called in, and shewed, that he desired the order of this House to Sergeant Puck, Sergeant Powhatan, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Prier.

Whereupon it is ordered, That whereas Sir John Churchill, Sergeant Puck, Sergeant Powhatan, and Mr. Prier, were by order of this House, dated on the 19th instant, assigned to be Counsel for Sir Nicholas Cryse, John Cryse, and Thomas Cryse, in their cause depending in this House against Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; a Member of the House of Commons, and other defendants, at such time as the said cause shall be appointed to be pleaded at the bar of this House; having appointed to bear the said cause by Counsel on both sides, to-morrow at three of the clock in the afternoon:

It is this day ordered, That the said Sir John Churchill, Sergeant Puck, Sergeant Powhatan, and Mr. Prier, be, and are hereby required, to appear at the bar of this House, to-morrow, at three of the clock in the afternoon, as Counsel to plead in the said cause, on the behalf of the said Sir Nicholas Cryse, John Cryse, and Thomas Cryse, as they will answer the contrary to this House.

May 28, 1675.

Counsel heard at the bar on both parts, upon the Petition and Appeal of Sir Nicholas Cryse, etc. and the order of Dionis Viscountess Creskorne, etc. and Thomas Dalnashy, Esq; put in defenses, concerning a decree in Chancery: Resolved, the Petition and Decree be dismissed.

May 28.

This day the House heard the Counsel of Sir Nicholas Cryse, John Cryse, and Thomas Cryse, upon their Petition and Appeal depending in this House; and also the Counsel of the Lady Bryer, and Mr. Dalnashy, upon their answer thereto; and after a serious consideration thereof, the question being put, Whether this Petition and Appeal shall be dismissed this House? It was resolved in the affirmative.

Mr.

Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Paul, and Mr. Porter attending at the door, in obedience to the order of the House of Commons; and being severally called in, Mr. Speaker did severally acquaint them, that they were summoned to give an account to the House, of their speaking as Counsel at the Bar of the House of Lords, in the prosecution of a cause depending upon an appeal, wherein Mr. Delaval, a Member of this House, is concerned, in the manifest breach of the order of this House; and giving up, as much as in them lies, the rights and privileges of the Commons of England: And they having answered and made their excuses to the effect following: That they had no notice of the order or vote of this House, but what they have heard in common discourse abroad; and because they conceived Mr. Delaval, a Member of this House, might be concerned, they refused several times to appear as Counsel, or to accept their fees; but being obliged of Counsel for Sir Nicholas Grigg, and an order of the House of Lords being served on them to attend at their trial, and that these attendings, and Mr. Delaval having put in his answer in the House of Lords, and not inflicting on his privilege afterwards, and the Counsel for the Lady Brayer, who was the principal party concerned, desiring to be of counsel for Mr. Delaval, they conceived they might lawfully appear as Counsel without breach of the order, or invading the rights and privileges of this House, which was not intended by them; and Sir John Churchill, by way of further excuse for himself, said, that he had willingly ready to prove, that Mr. Delaval was willing and desirous to have the business go forward. And the said Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Paul, and Mr. Porter, did all of them humbly submit themselves to the pleasure of the House, if they had in any thing misbehaved themselves; and being withdrawn, and the matter debated: The question being put, That Serjeant Pemberton be taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Serjeant Pemberton, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Paul, and Charles Porter, Esq. be taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, for their breach of privilege of this House.

Monday, 2^d Janu.

Ordered, That Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Poynter, and Sir Thomas Lee do withdraw, and amend the reasons upon the debate of the House, which was close; and the reasons agreed to are as follow:

"The House of Commons do agree with the Lords, that conferences between the two Houses of Parliament are essential to Parliamentary Proceedings, when they are agreed in the usual and Parliamentary way; but the manner of the Lords agreement to the conference, so have been in Friday the 21st of May last, at ten of the clock, in the Painted Chamber, with limitation and proviso, did necessitate the House of Commons to bear so great a trial at that conference, and gave the first interruption to parliamentary proceedings as conference between the two Houses.

"For that the conference defined by the Commons, was upon their privileges, concerned in the answer to the Lords in a message of the House of Commons, sent to the Lords the 17th of May, in the case of Mr. Ogleby, to the which the Lords did not agree, but did only agree to a conference concerning their privileges in general, without reference to the case of the said Mr. Ogleby; which was the only subject-matter of the desired conference.

"The limitations in the Lords agreement to a conference, with proviso that nothing be offered at the conference that may any ways concern the Lords jurisdiction, is in effect a denial of any conference at all upon the subject upon which it was desired, which ought so to be.

"The jurisdiction which the Lords claim in Appeals against a Member of the House of Commons, and the privilege of that House in that case, is so involved, that no conference can be upon the matter without some way touching the former.

"That this manner of agreeing in a conference with any limitation or proviso, is against the course of proceedings between the two Houses of Parliament, in coming to conferences; and doth tend to place a power in the Managers of such conferences to judge, whether such proviso be broken or not; and accordingly to proceed or break off the conference upon their own judgments.

"The House of Commons doubt not, but that when the Lords have considered of what is delivered at this conference, the good correspondence which the Lords express they desire to continue between the two Houses, (which the Commons also are no less careful to maintain) will induce them to remove the present interruption of coming to conferences; and therefore to agree to the conference, as it was desired by the House of Commons, upon the privileges of their House, concerned in the Lords answer to the message of the House of Commons, in the case of Mr. Ogleby: That the particular limitation, that nothing be offered at the conference, that may any ways concern the jurisdiction of the Lords, appears unreasonable; for that their Lords jurisdiction in Parliament is circumscribed by the laws of the land, as to their proceedings and judgments, and is, as well as all other Courts, subjected to Parliament."

Tuesday 3^d Janu. 1675.

Mr. Poynter reports, That the Lord Pryor-Seal did manage the conference, and had delivered the intent and occasion of the conference; which Mr. Poynter did report to the House, to the effect following, viz.

"The Lords do take notice of the House of Commons, their ordering into custody of their Serjeant, Mr. Serjeant Paul, Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, Counsellors at Law; as if agreed by their Lords to be of Counsel in an Appeal heard at their Lords Bar, in the case of Sir Nicholas Grigg, against the Lady Brayer, Mr. Delaval, and others; the Lords in Parliament, where his Majesty is highest in his royal estate, and where the last resort of judging upon Writs of Error, and Appeals in Equity, in all cases, and over all persons, is undoubtedly fixed, and permanently lodged.

"It is an unexampled usurpation and breach of privilege against the House of Peers, that their orders or judgments should be disputed, or endeavoured to be controuled, or the execution thereof obtruded by the Lower House of Parliament; who are no Court, nor have authority to administer an oath, or give any judgment.

"It is a transgression against the right and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws, which have provided, That no Freeman shall be imprisoned, or otherwise restrained of his liberty, but by the process of Law.

"This tends to the subversion of the Government of this Kingdom, and to the introducing of arbitrariness and disorder.

"Because it is in the nature of an invasion from the Lower House (who have no authority or power of jurisdiction over inferior subjects, much less over the King and Lords) against the orders and judgments of the Supreme Court.

"We are further commanded to acquaint you, That the Lords have therefore, out of that justice which they are dispensers of, against oppression and breach of laws, by judgments of this Court, let at liberty by the Consent of the House of Commons, all the said Serjeants and Counsellors; and prohibited the Lieutenant of the Tower, and all other Keepers of prisons, and Gaolers, and all persons whatsoever, from arresting and imprisoning, detaining, or otherwise molesting, or charging the said Gentlemen, or any of them in this case: And if any persons, of what degree soever, shall presume to the contrary, their Lordships will exercise the authority with them intrusted for putting the laws in execution.

"And we are further commanded to read to you, a Roll of Parliament, in the full year of the reign of King Henry the IVth, whereof we have brought the original with us."

"And a debate arising thereupon, Resolved, That a conference be desired with the Lords upon the subject-matter of the last conference; and that their Members following, be appointed to prepare and draw up reasons upon the debates of the House, to be offered at the conference: Mr. Secretary Cromwell, Esq.

Ordered, That the effect in whole custody so far received of the fifth of Henry the IVth, mentioned at the conference with the Lords, do attend the Committee appointed to draw up reasons for another conference this afternoon: And they are to meet at three of the clock, in the Speaker's chamber, and to send for Petitions, Papers, and Records.

Ordered, That no Member of this House do attend the Lords House, upon any summons from the Lords, without leave of the House.

Friday, 4th Janu. 1675.

Ordered, That the thanks of the House be returned to Mr. Speaker, for causing Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, formerly committed by order of this House to the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, for a breach of privilege, to be letted and taken into custody in Wynnington-hall, for his breach of privilege.

The House being informed, that Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Paul, and Mr. Charles Porter, who were ordered to be taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, are now in Wynnington-hall:

Ordered, That the Sergeant at Arms now attending this House, do go with his Mace into Wynnington-hall, and do execute the order of this House, and the warrant of Mr. Speaker thereupon; for arresting and bringing in custody Mr. Serjeant Paul, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, for their breach of the privilege of this House.

The Sergeant returning, gave an account, that he had executed the order of this House, and Mr. Speaker's warrant thereupon, and had brought the said Mr. Serjeant Paul, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, in custody, into the Speaker's chamber.

The question being put, That Sir John Churchill, Mr. Serjeant Paul, Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Porter, be sent to the Tower, for their breach of privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House?

It was resolved in the affirmative.

Ordered, That Mr. Speaker do give his warrant to the Lieutenant of the Tower, to receive them into his custody.

Ordered, That John Poynter, Esq. the now Serjeant at Arms attending this House, be proceeded against all persons that shall any ways molest or hinder him from executing his office.

So Thomas Lee reported from the Committee, the reasons agreed to be offered at the conference to be had with the Lords upon the matters delivered at the last conference; which were twice read, and with some amendments made at the table, severally agreed; and are as follow, viz.

"Your Lordships having desired the last conference, upon matters of high importance concerning the dignity of the King, and the safety of the Government, the Commons did not expect to hear from your Lordships at that conference, things so contrary to, and inconsistent with, the matter upon which the said conference was desired, as were then delivered by your Lordships.

"It was much below the expectation of the Commons, that after a representation of your Lordships message of matters of so high importance, the particular upon which the conference was grounded, should be only the commitment of four Lawyers into custody of their own Serjeant at Arms, for a manifest violation of the privileges of their House."

"But the Commons were much more surprised, when your Lordships had introduced the conference with an assurance, that it was in order to a good correspondence between the two Houses, that your Lordships should immediately assume a power to judge the orders of the House of Commons for imprisonment of Mr. Serjeant Pemberton, Mr. Serjeant Paul, Sir John Churchill, and Mr. Charles Porter, to be illegal and arbitrary; and the execution thereof a great indignity to the King's Majesty; with many other high reflections upon the House of Commons throughout the whole conference, whereby your Lordships have condemned the whole House of Commons as criminal, which is without precedent or example, or any ground or reason to be shown.

"It is not against the King's dignity for the House of Commons to proceed by imprisonment, a Committee that is guilty of violating their privileges, that being according to the known laws and customs of Parliament; and the right of their privileges declared by the King's royal Presence in former Parliaments, and by himself in this.

But

"But your Lordships claiming to be the supreme Court, and that his Majesty is highest in his royal estate in the Court of judicature there, is a diminution of the dignity of the King, who is highest in his royal estate in full Parliament; and is derogatory to the authority of the whole Parliament, by appropriating it to yourselves.

"The Commons did not by this impeachment infringe any privileges of the House of Peers, but only defend and maintain their own: On the other side, your Lordships do highly intrench upon the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, by denying them to be a court, or to have any authority or power of judicature; which, if admitted, will leave them without any power or authority to preserve themselves.

"As to what your Lordships call a transcendent invasion of the rights and liberty of the subject, and against Magna Charta, the Petition of Right, and many other laws; the House of Commons profess that your Lordships know, that neither the Great Charter, Petition of Right, or any other laws, do take away the law and custom of Parliament, or of either House of Parliament, or else your Lordships have much forgotten the Great Charter, and those other laws, in the several judgments your Lordships have passed upon the King's subjects in cases of privilege. But the Commons cannot find by Magna Charta, or by any other law or ancient custom of Parliament, that your Lordships have any jurisdiction in cases of Appeals from the Courts of Equity.

"We are further commanded to acquaint you, that the enlargement of these persons in prison, by order of the House of Commons, by the Commons' Officer of the Black-Rod, and the prohibition which three or four other officers and other persons whatsoever, not to receive or detain them, is an apparent breach of the rights and privileges of the House of Commons: And they have therefore called them to be released into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, and have committed them to the Tower.

"As for the Parliament-Roll of the first of King Henry the IVth, called to be read by your Lordships at the last conference, but not applied, the Commons apprehend it doth not concern the case in question: For that this Record was made upon occasion of judgments given by the Lords, to depose and imprison their lawful King; to which the Commons were not willing to be made Parties. And therefore the Commons conceive it will not be for the honour of your Lordships to make further use of that Record.

"But we are commanded to read to your Lordships the Parliament-Roll of a 4th III. N. 6. which, if your Lordships please to consider, they doubt not but your Lordships will find occasion to apply it to the present purpose."

Ordered, The Thanks of the House be given to the Speaker, for his care in issuing the Warrant for retaining the persons committed yesterday into custody.

The Sergeant at Arms ordered to be sent to the Tower; and the other Sergeant at Arms attending, was ordered to apprehend him for betraying his trust, in not executing his office, in bringing the persons committed yesterday to his custody, to the bar of the House.

An Address ordered to be prepared to be presented to his Majesty, to desire a new Sergeant at Arms to attend the House.

Saturday, June 4, 1675.

Mr. Secretary Conway acquainted the House, that it was his Majesty's desire, that the House would adjourn till four of the clock in the afternoon, and that both Houses should at that time attend him in the Banqueting-house at Whitehall.

A debate arising touching the removal of John Popham, Esq. Sergeant at Arms in ordinary, attending the House yesterday, the further debate thereof was adjourned till five of the clock in the afternoon. And then the House adjourned till four in the afternoon.

In the Afternoon,

The House then met at the time they adjourned to, and went in a body to his Majesty at Whitehall; and the House of Lords being also present, his Majesty made the following Speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"YOU may remember, that at the meeting of this Session I told you, no endeavour would be wanting to make the convenience of this Parliament agreeable. I am very glad to perceive that is quickly shewn you the truth of what I then said; but I hope that you are not deceived, that the intent of all these endeavours is only to procure a dissolution. I myself I look upon it as a most malicious design of those who are enemies to me and the Church of England; and were the contrary known, I should not doubt but the dislike of their brethren would alone be a means of bringing the House in a good understanding. But I now I cannot provide any way to be service to the delivery of it, I will tell you plainly my opinion, that the course of coming to any conclusion without your consent, cannot be without admitting of free conference; or may come to be another by the reason then offered, or make me to judge by the differences, when all hath been said in both Houses which the matter will afford. For I do not see how I can possibly be grown to differers in the whole Kingdom, if I can prevent it; and I am sure my judgment shall always be impartial between my two Houses of Parliament. But I will tell you now, that should you be in debate about your privileges, I will not suffer my own to be involved. I have nothing more to say to you at this time, but to desire, as I did when we last met, that you would get together, and not suffer ill men to divide to hinder the House from a happy conclusion.

[The House of Lords presented an Address to his Majesty, to remove the Lieutenant of the Tower; whereas the Lord Treasurer reported his Majesty's answer, viz. "That his Majesty had considered the circumstances of the matter, and is not satisfied how with justice he can remove him."] "

The House then took into consideration his Majesty's Speech, and resolved, minus contradietione, That the humble Thanks of this House be returned to his Majesty, for the gracious expressions in his Speech this day made to both Houses of Parliament; and such Members of this House as are of his Majesty's Privy-Council are desired to present the humble Thanks of this House to his Majesty.

Resolved, That it doth not appear to this House, that any Member thereof hath either sustained or promoted the difference between the two Houses of Parliament; or in asserting the Rights of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this House; or to have done any thing inconsistent with his duty, or the trust reposed in him. And then adjourned to Monday, June 7.

On Monday, June 7, the House resolved, That what Sergeant Popham did in detaining the four Lawyers into his custody, and concluding them to the Tower of London, was in pursuance of his duty, and by the order of the House; and the further debate concerning the said Sergeant at Arms was adjourned till Wednesday morning.

A copy of an order from the House of Lords for the hearing Counsel in the case of Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, to-morrow morning, was then read and debated: And,

Resolved, That as to the case of appeal brought against Sir John Fagg, in the House of Lords, he shall have the protection and assistance of this House.

Resolved, non. est. That if any person or persons shall be aiding or assisting in putting in execution any sentence or judgment that shall be given by the House of Lords, upon the Appeal brought by Dr. Sturley against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, such person or persons shall be adjudged and taken to be betrayers of the rights and liberties of the Commons of England, and the privileges of this House; and shall be proceeded against accordingly.

Ordered, That their Votes be made publick, by setting them up in Whitehall, and in the Lobby of this House; and the Clerk of the House to take care so to do.

In the afternoon the House proceeded in the further consideration of several matters for the preservation of their rights and privileges, and resolved, non. est. That no person committed by order or warrant of this House, for breach of the privileges or contempt of the authority of the House of Commons, by order or warrant of the House, shall not make any return thereof, or yield any obedience thereto, before he hath first acquainted the House therewith, and received their order and direction how to proceed therein.

Ordered, That their resolutions be immediately sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower; and then the House adjourned.

Tuesday, June 8, 1675.

A message sent to the Lords to remind them of the last conference; and for a conference upon the subject-matter delivered by the Lords at the last conference.

Sir John Rokeby informing the House, that he had received the four Lawyers committed to his custody by the House, and desired to deliver them to the Commons' Officer of the Black-Rod; and that he was frieved left night with four Writs of Habeas Corpus, to bring the said four Lawyers before the King and his Parliament at Whitehall, this morning, and craved the advice of the House what to do therein:

Ordered, The Thanks of the House be given to the said Sir John Rokeby for his behaviour therein; and Mr. Speaker intimated to him, that he should forbear to return the said Writs of Habeas Corpus, which were read and debated; and the further debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow-morning, and a Committee appointed to search the Lords Journals to see what hath been done in the case of the four Lawyers, the Writs of Habeas Corpus, and Mr. Sergeant Popham; and to search for precedents on the Writs of Habeas Corpus, and adjourned.

Wednesday, June 9.

Sir Thomas Clarges reports from the Committee, to whom it was referred to search for precedents touching Writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in Parliament; that the Committee had found several precedents of Writs of Habeas Corpus returnable in Parliament, and considered of them: And that the Committee thereupon had agreed upon four Resolves to be presented to the House, which he read in his place, and afterwards delivered the same in at the Clerk's table, where they being twice read, were upon the question severally agreed to, and are as follow:

Resolved, non. est. 1. That no Commissioners of England, committed by the order or warrant of the House of Commons, for breach of privilege, or contempt of the authority of the said House, ought, without order of the House to be by any Writ of Habeas Corpus, or any other writ, to try whatsoever he shall be accused and answer, or receive any determination in the House of Peers, during that Session of Parliament wherein he is committed.

Resolved, non. est. 2. That the order of the House of Peers for the issuing out the Writs of Habeas Corpus concerning Mr. Sergeant Popham, is in defiance and illegal; for that it is general, and expressio in particular cause of privilege, and commands the King's Great Seal to be put to writs not returnable before the said House of Peers.

Resolved, non. est. 3. That the Lord-Keeper be acquainted with these resolutions, to the end that the said Writs of Habeas Corpus be superseded, as contrary to law and the privileges of the House.

Resolved, non. est. 4. That a message be sent to the Lords to acquaint their Lordships, that Mr. Sergeant Popham, Sir John Churchil, Mr. Sergeant Pemberton, and Mr. Charles Farrow, were committed by order and warrant of this House for manifest breach of the privilege, and contempt of the authority of this House.

Ordered, That Col. Birch do go up to the Lords with a message, that a conference be defined upon the subject-matter of the last conference.

A message was this day sent from his Majesty in the House of Lords, by Sir Edward Gardiner, Officer of the Black-Rod, commanding this honourable House to attend his Majesty forthwith in the House of Peers; and accordingly Mr. Speaker went up with the House, where his Majesty was pleased to make the following Speech to them:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I think I have given sufficient Evidence to the World, that I have not been wanting on my Part, in my Endeavours to procure the full Satisfaction of all my Subjects, in the Matters both of Religion and Property: I have not only invited you to those Considerations at our First Meeting, but I have been careful, through this whole Session, that no concern of my own should divert you from these.

Besides, as I had only designed the Matter of it to be the pressing of good Laws, for the curing of them, I have already wasted much longer than I intended, and should have been contented still to have continued my Expectations, had there any Hopes remained of a good Conclusion. But I must confess, the ill Drivings of our Enemies have been too prevalent against those good ones I had proposed to myself, in behalf of my People, and such unhappy Differences between my two As yet are grown to such a Height, that I find no possible means of putting an End to them, but by a Protraction. Is it with great unwillingness that I make use of this Expedient, having always intended to Adjournment for the preferring of such Bills as were undisturbed. But my As yet are, that by this Means the present Occasion of Differences being taken away, you will be so careful hereafter of the Public, as not to look one upon, nor to revive the old.

I intend to meet you here again in Winter, and have desired my Lord Keeper to prorogue you till the thirteenth Day of October next.

On the 13. 1675, the King came to the House, and began thus:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I meet you now with more than an usual Concern for the event of this Session; and I know it's not what may be reasonably expected from the Care I have for the Preservation of the Government. The Causes of the ill Protraction, as I for my Part do not desire to remember, so I hope no Man else will, unless he be to learn from thence how to avoid the like Occasion for the future. And I pray consider how fatal the Consequences may be, and how little Benefit is like to rebound to the People by it. However, if any of that Kind shall arise, I desire you would stir those Debates, tell you have brought such publick Bills to Perfection, as may conduce to the Good and Safety of the Kingdom.

[The rest of the Speech relates to his Majesty's recommending the Society of the Protestant Religion, the Supply for building Ships, and publick Debts, &c.]

Then the Lord Finch, by his Majesty's Order, made a Speech to both Houses, recommending Unity, and making good Laws, and the Care of Religion, &c.

The Earl of Shaftesbury's Speech in the House of Lords, upon the Debate of appointing a Day for the hearing Dr. Sturges's Cause, the 20th of October, 1675.

My Lords,

On the 11. All is at Stake, and therefore you must give me Leave to speak freely before we part with it. My Lord Bishop of Salisbury is of Opinion, That you should never appoint a Day to consider what to do upon the Petition, when to appoint a Day of bearing; and my Lord Keeper, for I may name them as a Committee of the whole House, tells us in very eloquent and studied Language, That he will propose a Day for his Noble Lord's Cause, and much less offensive and injurious to our own Privileges, than that of appointing a Day of bearing. And I beseech your Lordships, do you not allow all these last Words except some shewable Proposal! But it ended in this: That your Lordships should appoint a Day, say, a very long Day, is another thing you must not do. And my Lord hath intended to convince you, that this is your only Course, by several undeniable Reasons, the first of which is, That 'tis against your Jurisdiction to have this Cause, which is not proper, before us, nor ought to be referred by us. To this, my Lords, give me Leave to answer, That I did not expect from a Man professing the Law, that after an Answer by Order of the Court was put in, and a Day had been appointed not hearing, which by these Accidents was set aside, and the Plaintiff moving for a second Day to be assigned, that ever, without hearing Counsel of both Sides, the Court did enter into the Merit of the Cause. And if your Lordships should do it here in a Cause attended with the Circumstances this is, it would not only be an apparent Injustice, but a plain Subterfuge, to evade a Point you shall see maintain.

But my Lord's second Reason speaks the Matter more clearly, for this is, Because 'tis a doubtful Case, whether the Commons have not Privilege, for this reason, my Lord would have you to appoint a further, and a very long Day to consider of it: Which, in plain English is, that your Lordships should confide upon your Books, that you conceive it on second Thoughts a doubtful Case, for so your appointing a Day to consider will do; and that for so other Reason, but because my Lord-Keeper thinks it so: which I hope will not be a Reason to prevail with your Lordships, since we cannot yet, by Experience, tell that his Lordship is capable of thinking your Lordships in the right, in any Matter against the Judgment of the House of Commons, 'tis to hard a Thing even for the ablest of Men to change in Habits.

But my Lord's third Reason is the most admirable of all, which he offers unanswerably, viz. That your Lordships are all combined in your Conclusion, that this (if perfected) will undo a Branch. I beseech your Lordships consider, whether this Argument, thus applied, would not overthrow the Law of Nature, and all the Laws of Right and Property in the World: For 'tis an Argument, and a very good one, that you should not stand or insist on Claims, where you have not a clear Right, or where the Question is not of Conscience and Merit, in a Matter that may produce a dangerous and pernicious Breach between Relations, Persons, or Bodies Politick, joined in Interest and high Concerns together. So, on the other Hand, if the Obstinacy of the Party in the wrong, shall be made an unanswerable Argument for the other Party to receive and give up its just Rights; how long shall the People keep their Liberties, or the Princes or Governors of the World their Privileges? How long shall the Husband maintain his Dominion, or any Man his Property, from his Friend's or his Neighbour's Obstinacy? But, my Lords, when I hear my Lord-Keeper open so eloquently the fatal Consequences of a Breach, I cannot forbear to fall into these Considerations how it comes to pass, that if the Consequences be so fatal the King's Ministers in the House of Commons, of which there are several that are of the Cabinet, and have daily Access to his Majesty, and have the Direction and Tract of his Affairs, I say, that none of these should preclude these Consequences there, or give the least Stop to the Career of that House in the Business; but that all the Votes concerning this Affair, may, even that very Vote, That no Appeal from any Court of Equity is acceptable by the House of Lords, should pass unopposed. And yet all the great Masters with us here, the Bishops and other Lords of greatest Dependence on the Court, content this Point, as it is, as yet ad hoc factum. I hear his Majesty in Justice, but you would not declare against Appeals in Parliament. I cannot much blame the Court, if they think (the Lord-Keeper and the Judges being of the King's name, and as his Power to change) that the Justice of the Nation is late enough, and I, my Lords, may think so too, during the King's Term, though I hear Scotland, not without Reason, complain already. Yet how future Princes may see this Power, and how Judges may be made not Men of Ability or Integrity, but Men of Relation and Dependence, and who will do what they are commanded, and all Men's Causes come to be judged, and Editors disposed on, as great Men at Court please.

My Lords, the Confirmation of our Government hath provided better for us, and I can never believe so wise a Body as the House of Commons, will promise that foolish Woman which plucks down her House with her Hands.

My Lords, I must preface in the next Place, to say something to what was offered by my Lord Bishop of Salisbury, a Man of great Learning and Abilities, and always vested in a stronger and clearer Way of reasoning, than the Bishops of this noble Lord answered before did: accustom him so; and that Reverend Prelate hath said the Matter very fair upon two Heads:

The first, Whether the Hearing of Causes and Appeals, and especially in this Point, where the Admiralty Court Privilege, be so material to us, that it ought not to give way to the Rights of State, or greater Affairs that shall be of our time? The second was, If this Bishops be of this Account, yet whether the appointing a Day to consider of this Petition, would prevent that Grievance and Prejudice to your Cause?

My Lords, to this give me Leave in the first Place to say, that this Matter is no less than your whole Jurisdiction, and your Jurisdiction is the Life and Soul of the Dignity of the Peerage of England; you will quickly grow barren, if you grow idle. You have now the greatest and most useful End of Parliaments principally in you, which is not to make new Laws, but to redress Grievances, and to maintain the old Land-Marks. The House of Commons Business is to complain, your Lordships to relieve, not only the Complaints from them that are the Eyes of the Nation, but all other particular Persons that address to you. A Land may grow under a Multitude of Laws, and I believe such does; and when I hear you so multiply, these odious Sources that Directions and Security to the People, I look upon it as the greatest and the Weakness of the latter Age, if not worse, the Effect of the Deceits of ill Men; that it is given a general Opinion, that where there is not a particular Direction in some Act of Parliament, the Law is defective, as if the Common Law had not provided much better, firmer, and plainer, for the Peace and Quiet of the Nation, than intricate, long perplexed Statutes do; which has made Work for the Lawyers, given Power to the Judges, lessened your Lordships Power, and is a good Measure to hinder the Security of the People.

My Lord Bishop tells us, That your whole Jurisdiction is not in question, but only the Privilege of the House of Commons, of their Members not appearing at your Bar. My Lords, were it so, were it that for Justice and the People's sake you must not to part with it, flow for a Privilege of the House of Commons, their Servants, and those they owe obedience to, Wilmot's Hall may with grief tell your Lordships. And the false Privilege of their Members being not sued, must be allowed by your Lordships as well; and what a Palace of Justice this would prove, whilst they are Lords for Life, and you for Intimacy, let the World judge: For my Part, I am willing to come to Conference whenever the Dispute shall begin again; and dare undertake to lose your Lordships, that they have neither Precedent, Reason, nor any judicable Pretence to these against us; and therefore, my Lords, if you part with this undoubted Right merely for sitting, where will the sitting stop! And, my Lords, we are sure it doth not stop here, for they have already, Memor. Casuarinae, voted against your Lordships Power of Appeals from any Court of Equity: so that you may plainly see where this Caution and Reason ad hoc means to stop; not one jot short of losing your whole Jurisdiction aside, for the same Reason of saving the King's Money, of not interrupting good Laws, and whenever this word of Necessity would all Beach, upon what Score so ever; and your Lordships plainly for the Beach will be as well made upon your Jurisdiction in general, as upon this; so that when your Lordships have appointed a Day, a very long Day, for to consider whether Dr. Sturges's Cause be not too hot to handle; and when you have done the same for Sir Nicholas Stanten, whose Pension I hear is coming in, your Lordships will proceed to a Vote, to lay all private Business aside for six Weeks. For the Privilege of private Business hath stood upon this last Age, upon that which a your most publick Duty and Business is; namely, the Administration of Justice. And I can tell your Lordships, besides the Reason that leads to it, that I have some Intelligence of the designing such a Vote. For on the second Day of your Sitting, at the Rising of the Lords House, there came a Gentleman into the Lobby, belonging to a very great Person, and stood in very great Haite, After the 1. he says? Please they please the Vote? And being asked, What Fate? He answered, The Fate of an private Business for his Wife.

My Lords, if this be your Business, let them you see; if we are to postpone our Jurisdiction for fear of offending the House of Commons for its Words, that they in the interim may pass the Money, and other acceptable Bills that his Majesty thinks of Importance, are so many wife Men in the House of Commons to be led asleep, and to pass all this acceptable Things; and when they have done, so far as we let look upon them?

Will they not remember that next time there is want of Money; or may not they rather be assured by their Ministers that are amongst them, and go on to unanimously with them, that the King is on their Side in this Conveyance? And when the publick Business is over, our first will be too short to make a Breach, or vindicate ourselves in the Matter. And then I beg your Lordships, where are you, after you have suffered but the

the last Session your right of Judicature, so high, even in this point; and after the House of Commons had gone to high against you on the other hand, as to put up their declaration and remonstrances on Wyndham-Hall doors; the very next Session after, you postpone the very same cause; and not only that, but all Judicatures whatsoever? I beseech your Lordships, will not thus prove a fixed prebend and confession against yourselves? 'Tis a Maxim, and a rational one among the Lawyers, That no possessor of any Estate has any remedy, if there be a third party there with some equity. My Lords, in consequence, I humbly repeat I have given a sufficient answer to my Lord Bishops second question; Whether the appointing a day to consider about you will do much that Princes, or of their confessions in your right? For it is a plain conviction, that it is a doubtful case, and that infinitely stronger than if it were a new thing to you, never heard of before: for it is the very same case, and the very same thing, divided in that case, that you formerly ordered, and so strongly asserted, in that upon time, and all the deliberation imaginable, you declare yourselves to become doubtful, and you put yourselves out of your own hands, into that power that you have no reason to believe on your side in this question.

My Lords, I have said the duty impossible to his Majesty, and shall with all submission now say to any thing he should think of importance to his affairs: but in this point it is to offer the constitution of the Government, if you are asked to lay the side, and there is no reason of State can be an argument to you. Lordships to turn yourselves out of that interest you have in the constitution of the Government: 'tis not only your concern that you maintain yourselves in it, but 'tis the concern of the poor ill man in England, that you keep your station: 'tis your Lordships concern, and that so highly, that I will be bold to say, the King can give you a set of a request if he recompens for it. What are empty titles? What is great power, or riches, and a great estate, whereas I have no more of great property? 'Tis the constitution of the Government, and maintaining it, that secures your Lordships, and every man else, as what is, hath, the power of Law, the birth-right of the People be maintained, has a fair prospect before him for himself or his posterity; but the greatest title, with the greatest perfect power and riches, is but a mere creature, and maintains only an absolute despotism, no otherwise than by ferule and low flattery, and upon uncertain terms.

My Lords, 'tis not only your Lordship, but the Interest of the Nation, that you maintain your rights; for let the House of Commons and Gentry of England think what they please, there is no Prince that ever governed without Nobility or an Army: if you will not have one, you must have neither, or the Ministry cannot long support, or keep still from rambling into a Democratical Republic. Your Lordships and the People have the same power, and the same care. My Lords, would you be so kind to let me know? 'tis all way to it, to put yourself in one of a future capacity, to be considerable in his service. I do not find to flatter, or in modern expressions, but that 'tis better, and a man is much more regarded that is a caprice, and opportunity to serve, than he that has wholly depraved himself of all for his Princes service. And I therefore desire, that I will serve my Prince as a Peer, but will not deliver the Peoples voice to him.

My Lords, I have heard of twenty foolish models and expedients to secure the Justice of the Nation, and yet to take this right from your Lordships, as the King by his commission appointing Commissioners to hear Appeals, or that the Twelve Judges should be the pretence, or that persons should be appointed by the Parliament, whereas all are not only to take away your Lordships full rights, that ought not to be sacred any more than any other part of the Government, but are in themselves, when well weighed, ridiculous: I must deal freely with your Lordships, those things could never have been in men's minds, but that there have been some kind of process that has given the full rule to it. Pray, my Lords, forgive me, if on this occasion I put you in mind of Committee-diners, and the scandal of it, those droves of Ladies that attend all causes 'twas come to that pass, that men were used or borrowed of their friends handsome sisters or daughters to deliver their Petitions: but yet for all this, I must say that your judgments have been fixed, unless in one or two cases; and that we owe too to that Bench, from whence we now apprehend most danger.

There is one thing I had almost forgot to speak to, which is the separation of law, the large space which is a region of State time; and to that, I pray, give me leave to say, if this be not a time of leisure for you to vindicate your privileges, you must never expect one. I could almost say, that the famous good agreement, and consent that is to be prayed for as well other times, may be fatal to us now; we owe the place of their last two years, and the disengagement from the French Interest, to the two Houses differing from the sense and opinion of Whigland: so as to a time, the thing in the world this Nation has most reason to apprehend, is a general care, which cannot now happen without very advantageous terms to the French, and disadvantageous to the House of Lords.

When the King's great Councils, and if, I have a right to differ, and give contrary counsel to those that are more about him: I fear they would make a general point, I am sure I would advise against it, and hinder it at this time by all the ways imaginable. I heartily wish nothing from you say and weight and reputation to those count is who would still the French. No money for ships, no preparations you can make, nor personal alliances our Prince has here, was secure us from the French, if they are at leisure. He is grown the most potent of us all at sea: he has built 24 ships this last year, and has 30 more in number than we; besides the advantage, that our ships are all out of order, and he is exactly provided for, that every ship has his particular three-hour. 'Tis incredible the money he hath, and is following in making harbours; he makes Nature itself give way to the vastness of his expense; and after all this, still in France he will, to intend upon his affairs, be thought to make all these preparations to sit over land, and fill on the back of Hungary, and batter the walls of Konstantinople. 'Tis not possible he should oversee his Interest in seizing of Ireland, a thing so feasible to him, if he be master of the Seas, as he actually now is; and which, when attained, gives him all the Southern Mediterranean, East and West-Indie Trade, and renders him both by sea and land, an excellent harbinger, perpetual Master of the Seas without dispute?

Vos. VII.

My Lords, to conclude this point, I fear the Court of England is greatly mistaken in us, and I do not wish then the reputation or the concurrence of the Kingdom, and that out of the most sincere loyalty to his Majesty, and love to my Nation.

My Lords, I have but one thing more to trouble you with, and that precedenture is a consideration of the greatest weight and concern, both to your Lordships and the whole Nation. I have often seen in this House, that the arguments with strength reason, and most convincing to the Lay-Lords in general, have not had the same effect upon the High-bench, but that they have unconsciously gone against us in matters, that many of us have thought essential and undoubted rights: and I consider, that 'tis not possible that men of great learning, party, and reason, as your Lordships are, fit not have the same case of doing right, and the same conviction what is right, upon clear reason offered, that other your Lordships have. And therefore, my Lords, I must necessarily think we differ in principles; and then 'tis very easy to apprehend, what is the clearest sense to men of my principle, may not at all periods be effect the confidence of the last man of a different one. I put your Lordships the case plainly, as 'tis now before us. My principle is, That the King is King by Law, and by the same Law that the law now obliges itself, and so it becomes the concern of every man in England, that has but his liberty, to maintain and defend, to his utmost, the King on all his rights are prerogatives. My principle is also, That the Lords are Lords, as the House and Rights belonging thereto, are a distinct part of the ancient constitution, and established by the same Law. The King governing and administering Justice by his House of Lords, and advising with both his Houses of Parliament in all important matters, is the Government I own, I am bound under, and an obliged to. If ever there should happen in future ages [as the God forbid] a King governing by an Army, without his Parliament, 'tis a Government I own not, am not obliged to, nor was bound under. According to this principle, every body must think that he is a subject, and not equally to prefer the frame of the Government, as all the parties in it, and cannot finally his confidence to give up the Lords House for the service of the Crown, or to take away the full rights and privileges of the House of Commons to please the Lords. But there is another principle got into the world, my Lords, that hath not been long there; for Archbishop Laud was the first author that I remember of it, and I cannot add that the Jansen, or indeed the Popish Clergy, have ever owned it, but some of the Episcopal Clergy of our English Isle; and 'tis said, as 'tis now, to the most dangerous, detractions Doctrine to our Government and Law, that ever was. 'Tis the first of the Canons published by the Convocation 1640. That Absorbtion is of Divine Right. This Doctrine was then preached up, and maintained by Bishops, Ministers, and others; as present years, by a book published by Dr. Salkeld, Bishop of Lincoln, under the name of Archbishop Usher, and now much it is spread among our dignified Clergy, is very clearly known. We all agree, that the King and his Government is to be judged for Christian's sake, and that the divine precepts require not only here, but in all parts of the world, obedience to lawful Governments. But that this family are our Kings, and this particular frame of Government is our lawful constitution, and all get us, is owing only to the particular Laws of our Country. This Laudian Doctrine was the root that produced the Bill of Tall left Session, and some very pernicious Oaths, that are of the same nature with that, and yet insisted by several Acts of the Parliament.

In a word, if this Doctrine be true, our Allegiance Oath is of no use, our Oaths are but mere words among ourselves during the Kings pleasure. Monarchy, if of divine right, cannot be a kind of monarchy by human Laws; say, what's more, cannot last itself: and all our claim of right by the Law, or constitution of the Government, all the jurisdiction and privilege of this House, all the rights and privileges of the House of Commons, all the properties and liberties of the people, are to give way not only to the Interest, but the will and pleasure of the Crown. And the best and worthiest of men, holding this principle, must soon to deliver up all we have, not only when reason of State, and the separate Interest of the Crown require it; but when the will and pleasure of the King is known, would have it so. For that must be, to a man of that principle, the only rule and measure of Right and Justice. Therefore, my Lords, you see how necessary it is, that our principles be known, and how fatal to us all it is, that this principle should be suffered to spread any further.

My Lords, to conclude, your Lordships have seen of what consequence this matter is to you, and that the appointing a day to consider, is no less than declaring yourselves doubtful, upon second and third thoughts; that you put yourselves out of your own hands, into a more than a moral probability of having this Session make a precedent against you. You let your duty to yourselves and the people; and that 'tis really not the Interest of the House of Commons, but may be the inclination of the Court, that you lose the power of Appeals: but I beg your House may not be seduced by, but that you Lordships would take in this affair the only course, to profess yourselves, and appoint a day, this day three weeks, for the hearing of Dr. Storks cause, which is my humble motion.

Saturday, Nov. 13. 1675. An order from the Lords to bring Sir John Fagg's cause to-morrow morning, was this day read in the House of Commons, and debated, and the further debate thereof adjourned till Monday morning next.

Monday, Nov. 15. The House resolved, That the petitioning Appeals in the Lords House, by Dr. Thomas Stork against Sir John Fagg, a Member of this House, is a breach of the privileges of this House; and that the said Sir John Fagg do not make any defence at the Lords Bar, in the said Appeal; and the further debate thereof was adjourned till to-morrow morning.

Tuesday, Nov. 16. Adjourned the further debate of Sir John Fagg's Interest till to-morrow morning; and on Wednesday, adjourned the further debate till Thursday, when Sir John Fagg's business was referred, and resolved, That his cause should be debated on the 17th, for avoiding differences between the two Houses upon this difference till Friday morning.

Sir William Crofts reports from the Committee, to whom it was referred to prepare and draw up reasons to be offered at the conference, to be defined with the Lords, for avoiding the confusion of opposing the difference between the two Houses; and a paper of reasons accordingly by the said Committee, to be reported to the House, being read; and the same being agreed to, is as follows, viz.

His Majesty having recommended to us, at the opening of this Session of Parliament, the avoiding this difference, if possible, and if it could not be prevented, that then we should defer their debate till we had brought such public bills to perfection, as may conduce to the good and safety of the Kingdom. The Commons affirm it a great misfortune, that contrary to that most excellent advice, the proceedings in the Appeal, brought the last Session against Sir John Egge, by Dr. Shirley, hath been renewed, and a day set for hearing the cause; and therefore the Commons have judged it this half-way, before they enter into the argument of Infamia of their rights in this matter, to propose to your Lordships the putting off the proceedings in this matter for some short time; that so they may, according to his Majesty's advice, give a dispatch to some bills now before them, of great importance to the King and Kingdom; which being finished, the Commons will be ready to give your Lordships such reasons against those proceedings, and in defence of their rights, as we hope may satisfy your Lordships that no such proceedings ought to have been.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Lords, to defer a conference, to preserve the good correspondence between the two Houses.

Resolved, That whatsoever shall prosecute any Appeal before the Lords, against any Committee of England, from any Court of Equity, shall be deemed a betrayer of the rights and privileges of the Commons of England; and shall be proceeded against accordingly; and the relation of Court to be affected in the Lobby, Wyndward, back-gate, and all Inns of Court and Chancery; and then adjourned till next morning, New the Sixth.

Die Sab. Nov. 10.

Ordered, That Dr. Thomas Shirley be taken into custody by the Sergeant at Arms attending this House, on all Sir Nicholas Stantis, for serving Mr. Crofts with an order to attend the Lords; and then adjourned to Monday Nov. 12.

On Saturday Nov. 10. 1675, Dr. Thomas Shirley appeared at the bar of the House of Lords, and his Counsel Mr. Wallis appeared, who would have excused his absence, but was ordered to appear again on Monday morning next to plead the cause; and the other two Counsel (one being as the country, and the other sick) were excused, and the said Dr. Shirley, Sir Nicholas Stantis, and Mr. Wallis were ordered to have the protection of the House: And upon Debate of the Commons Voted made yesterday.

Ordered, That the paper posted up in several places, signed by William Goldiers, Cler. Down. Com. against the Judicature of the House of Peers, in case of Appeals from Courts of Equity, is illegal, unparliamentary, and tending to the dissolution of the Government. And then upon consideration of the 1st vote of the Commons, it was proposed by Lord Mordaunt to make an Address to his Majesty to dissolve the Parliament, and call another and frequent Parliaments; and upon debate thereof, about eight o'clock at night they came to this question, and carried it by two voices only; That there should be no Address; the numbers being fifty and forty only; and then adjourned to Monday.

On which day the House being met, a message was sent by his Majesty, for the House to attend him forthwith in the House of Peers; which the House accordingly did, when his Majesty passed three Bills, and the Lord-Keeper, by his Majesty's order, prorogued both Houses of Parliament, till the 15th day of February next, wWednesday, 1676, which ended the year 1675.

The Profection, with several of several I ords for the Dissolution of this Parliament, entered in the Lords Journal, November 22, 1675, the day the Parliament was prorogued.

WE whose names are under-written, Peers of this Realm, having proposed, That no humble Address might be made to his Majesty from this House, that he would be graciously pleased to dissolve this Parliament; and the House having carried it in the negative: for the satisfaction of our loyal intentions towards his Majesty's service, and of our true respect and obedience to that honourable House; and to show that we had no sinister and uncharitable ends in this our humble proposal, do with all humility herein set forth the grounds and reasons why we were of opinion, that the said humble Address should have been made.

1. We do humbly conceive, that it is according to the ancient Laws and Statutes of this Realm, that there should be frequent and new Parliaments; and that the practice of several years hath been accordingly.

2. It seems not reasonable, that any particular number of men should for many years improve to great a trust of the people, as to be their Representatives in the House of Commons; and all other the Gentry and the Members of Corporations of the same degree and quality with them, should be so long excluded. Neither, as we humbly conceive, is it advantageous to the Government, that the Counties, Cities and Boroughs should be confined for so long a time to such Members as they have once chosen to serve for them, the mutual Correspondence and Interests of those who chuse and are chosen, admitting of great variations in length of time.

3. The long continuance of any such as are entrusted for others, and who have to great a power over the pulse of the Nation, must, in our humble opinion, naturally endanger the producing of factions and parties, and the carrying on of particular Interests and Designs, rather than the public Good.

And we are the more confirmed in our desires for the said humble Address, by reason of this unhappy breach fallen out betwixt the two Houses, of which the House of Peers hath not given the least occasion; they having done nothing but what their offices and professions have in all times done, and what is according to their duty, and for the Interest of the People that they should do. which notwithstanding, the House of Commons have proceeded in such an unprecedented and extraordinary way, that it is, in our humble opinion, become altogether unparliamentary for the two Houses, as the said House, justly to punish their great and good ends for which they were called.

For this reason, we do enter our protestations against, and dissent unto, the said Vote.

XXXII. Proceedings against Mr. Francis Jenker, for a Speech made by him on the Hustings, at Guildhall, on Midsummer-day, 1676, 27 Car. II.

[Published by his Friends.]

MR. Jenker having been a Trader for many years, and observing the daily decay of trade in the City, occasioned by such mischief, as is set out in the industry of its inhabitants, but only at the power of the Government to redress; and that did require a more speedy redress than a Parliament prorogued for fifteen months could afford: after having in vain petitioned the Lord-Mayor for a Common-Council, that might consider of a Petition about trade, and of a hearty zeal for the good of the City, as well as encouraged by the confidence and desire of many body Citizens, the liberty returned to the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen and Common-Council, by the Six vote of the 15th of this King, concerning Petitions, the votes of a majority of temporal Lords at the last Session, together with the unparliamentary reasons given in their prosecution; did at the Folk-mote (or Common-hall) holden the 24th of June last past, in the Guildhall of London, thus deliver himself:

Mr. Common Serjeant,

" IT seems a vain thing for this Court to be serious about the choice of Magistrates and Officers for the well government of this city; except they first take care to remedy those many mischiefs and grievances, which the city now groans under; and which seem to us to threaten the ruin and destruction of the whole; that if there be not some speedy redress, there will be little need of Magistrates and Officers, for there will be no city or people left here to be governed.

" Let us have once already been burnt to ashes, and firing is now become such a trade, that not only London, the Borough of Southwark, and the adjacent villages, but the Cities of London, Birmingham, Town corporate, and places of principal trade throughout the whole Kingdom, are perpetually in danger; so that no rational or considerate man amongst us " can promise himself, his wife, his children, or estate one night's security, but they may all be devoured in the consuming flames, except some speedy and effectual course be taken.

" But this is not all, for were our houses secure from fire, yet such is the general decay of trade, if not remedied, as must unavoidably bring the whole city to poverty and ruin; and it is concerned, that this is a very much occasion'd by the French, who have had such great opportunities upon our Woolen Cloth, Stuffs and other Manufactures, that we have almost lost our trade with France. They have spoiled our trade with Holland, Flanders, and Germany, by a destructive war. They have ruined our trade at home, and begg'd many thousands of our honest and industrious Weavers, and best English Manufacturers and Traders, by the vast quantity of their Silks, and other unmercenary commodities imported hither. So that upon an exact balance of the trade between us and them taken, it has been demonstrated, that this city and Kingdom doth lose eleven hundred thousand pounds every year. By means whereof, they who in Queen Elizabeth's time might not be suffer'd to build men of war, are now grown so powerful at sea, as to be able to beat both Dutch and Spanish, and have made themselves in a manner sole masters of the Mediterranean Sea. And they are grown so presumptuous, as daily to affront our English Merchants, and foremen in his Majesty's own ports. The Provosts daily take our Merchant-ships, plunder others, strip, imprison and torment our seamen, to the great discouragement of our English Navigators, and almost ruin of the Merchant.

" I shall instance in but one thing more, but that is worse than all the rest; that is, the just apprehension that is upon the minds of good men, of danger to his Majesty's person, and the Protestant Religion. I had not spoken this at this time and place, but having the honour to "serve the City in Common-Council; I have endeavored at several times to bring these things before the Court, but could not. In the mid of the last Common-Council I did deliver my Lord-Mayer, that a Common-Council might speedily be held, to hear and consider of a petition about trade, introduced by a great number of citizens of good quality, and Mr. Lordship did then promise, that a Common-Council should speedily be held: But it is a good new face, and there have been many fines and lectures, but no Common-Council."

"Wherefore methinks it does become the wisdom and gravity of this Court, not to admit of any longer delay in a matter wherein their All is concerned. And I do humbly move, (and I conceive it is not only my duty, but the duty of the great part of this Court) that some Members of this Court may accompany the Sheriff and Mr. Common-Sergeant, before we proceed in any other matter, to wait upon my Lord-Mayer and the Court of Aldermen, to desire that a Common-Council might speedily be held, humbly to petition his Majesty, that for the quieting and satisfying the minds of his loyal people, and for remedy of the many mischiefs and grievances we now groan under, he would graciously be pleased (according to the Statutes of the 4th and 5th of Ed. III.) timely to call a new Parliament."

Scarcely were the words, a new Parliament, pronounced, but the greatest part of the Assembly cried out, Well moved, well moved! And then spoke up formally to the Sheriff, yet several amongst them spoke enough to draw a high approbation of what had been said, and not one word was spoken in contradiction; which when the Common-Sergeant took to prevent, is conceived) others speaking to the same matter, he spoke to this purpose:

"That what had been moved, seemed to be the general desire of a whole Court, and since the Gentleman that made the motion was pleased to join him with the Sheriff, and that he must either his opinion in the matter, it was this, That it was not so proper to carry up that message before they did proceed to these elections, as first to determine their elections, and then carry up an account of state and that together."

But many in the Court did insist upon the message, and desired a message to be sent up immediately, whereupon one of the Sheriff's spoke, and did acknowledge, "That what had been said by the Gentleman that spoke first, was true; but that he was an old citizen, and had long known Common Hall; and he did believe that the proper work of the day was the election of officers, and therefore he did desire that the Court would proceed, and not to carry up the message till after that was done." To which one replied, "That according to his utmost understanding, that Court was one of the ancientest, greatest, and most powerful Courts of this City, and although the customary business of this day were the choice of officers, yet that Court had cognizance of any thing whatsoever that did relate to the good of the City, and therefore it was conceived, that nothing was more proper at that time, than that which concerned the preservation of the City from any ruin."

Upon which the other Sheriff directing his discourse to the Assembly, said, "That what the Gentleman had moved there, was true, and not unknown to most of the persons there present; but that he was of his brother's opinion, that it was fit still to go on to the work of the day, and not to carry up that message till after the election."

Many persons being still dissatisfied, and calling for a present message to be sent up, the Gentleman who first moved the business, made it his request, "That since there seemed a difference touching the circumstance of time, that they would proceed to election, and carry up the message with the persons elected, as the Sheriff desired," to which the Common Hall unanimously agreed. Upon which, silence being made, the Common Hall proceeded to election of Sheriff and Aldermen, and first up an account thereof to the Lord Mayor and Aldermen by the Sheriff and Common-Sergeant, as it usual in such cases.

The Lord Mayor and Aldermen presently came down, and took their Seats in the Court of Hatchings, according to custom; upon which, the Common-Sergeant came forth to the front of the Court, and declared the names of the persons elected, and immediately gave back. Whereupon the Common Hall called out for an answer to their message, upon which, the Common-Sergeant stepping forward again in the presence of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen and Sheriff, said, "That he had acquainted his Lordship and the Aldermen with their request, and that his Lordship had commended him to declare unto them, that he would be ready to join with them in that or any other thing for the good of the City." And with that the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, who left the Court of Hatchings, and dismissed the Assembly.

After dinner, the Recorder, Sir John Havel, one of a great pretence of loyalty, but indeed a perfluous grudge against Mr. Jenyns, conveyed the news to Whitfield; where, with his usual train of Rinwick, he made such a dismal representation of the matter, and was so powerful in his eloquence, as to occasion both the Sheriff and some other of the City officers to be sent for, who were examined by the Lord Chief Justice Ratford, in the presence of the King, the Lord Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, Duke Landradale, and other Lords.

The Sheriff and two others made affidavits; but a copy of them could never be obtained.

Upon the 27th of June, Mr. Jenyns was summoned by a messenger to appear at the Council-board the next day, accompanied with many of his friends, he attended at the Lobby, near the Council-Chamber, according to his summons, and after some time was called in; but his friends pressing to follow him, (as it usual on such occasions) were kept out, and not one suffered to go in with him.

The King sitting in Council, the Lord Chancellor, Duke Landradale, and other Lord about them, the Clerk at an affidavit made by the two Sheriffs, the Common-Sergeant, and Sir John Havel, an Attorney; the following relation ensued:

That Mr. Jenyns, at a Council-Hall, in London, the 24th of June last past, did comply of Whitfield, and did deliver, that before they went upon any other business, in some Members of that Court might accompany the Sheriff and the Common-Sergeant to wait upon the Lord Mayor, then in the chamber, to desire that a Common-Council might be called to petition his Majesty, in the name of the City, to call a new Parliament.

The affidavits being read, the Council-board proceeded to this effect: Lord Chancellor. Sir, What say you to this matter?

Mr. Jenyns. I desire to know if this be all you have to charge against me!

A Lord. Then you make little of this, you will find it to be enough.

L. Chan. Sir, did you move for a Common-Council to petition for a new Parliament?

Mr. Jenyns. Is it any crime to petition for a new Parliament?

L. Chan. Answer to the matter in charge.

Mr. Jenyns. With the liberty of his Majesty and this Board, I will.

The King. Go on.

Mr. Jenyns. May I please your Majesty, of all the subjects you have—

A Lord. (interrupting him) Answer to the matter.

Mr. Jenyns. If his Majesty will be pleased to hear me, I hope you will.

King. Let him go on.

Mr. Jenyns. May I please your Majesty, of all the subjects you have, none are more loyal than your City of London, and as the City none more loyal than myself. And no man there did more desire, and, in my circumstances, all more, in order to your Majesty's Religion, than myself. And I do defy any citizens, or other whatsoever, to say I have forfeited my loyalty by any one individual act—

King. (interrupting him) Sir, you are not Lord-Mayor, and I am very well satisfied with the loyalty of the City, and that it needs no such outcries.

L. Chan. Speak to the matter.

Mr. Jenyns. May I please your Majesty, being summoned to a Court of Common Hall in London, which is a Court that consists of the main body of the City—

L. Chan. (interrupting him) Sir, you are under a double mistake; for first, it was not a Court, and next, it did not consist of the main body of the City of London.

Mr. Jenyns. With your Lordship's leave, it was a Court which did consist of all the Livery of the City of London, which, if I understand any thing, is the main body of the City of London. And every Member of that Court hath freedom to propose and debate any such matter or thing as he believes to be for the service of his Majesty, and the good of the City; and so man can use more understanding than God hath given him. And I assure your Lordship, what I then moved was according to the utmost of my understanding for his Majesty's service, and the good of the City. And, my Lord, if I were under a mistake, I had the fortune to have good company; for what I moved was approved by the whole Court.

King. It was not so.

Secretary. We have a deposition to the contrary.

Mr. Jenyns. It was so.

Other Lords. It was not so.

Mr. Jenyns. May I please your Majesty, if you have a hundred depositions to the contrary, if the matter of fact were so, it was so; and I do affirm it approved by the whole Court.

A Lord. How came you to be a Privy-Councillor?

Mr. Jenyns. I never had any such ambitious thought in my head.

A Lord. How came you then to meddle with matters of State?

Mr. Jenyns. I thought any of his Majesty's subjects, in an humble manner, might petition his Majesty for a remedy of any grievance whatsoever.

A Lord. Do you think any one may petition for a Parliament?

Mr. Jenyns. I believe they may.

The King. I know whole bodies you are, and I'll take care that some such as you shall have to do with the Government.

Secretary. Read. What was your name?

Mr. Jenyns. My Lady, what I spoke was not in a court, but openly in the face of a multitude, and therefore cannot wait a witness to attest it.

A Lord. Jail your word it was a Court, and now it is a multitude.

Mr. Jenyns. We Citizens pretend not to place our words so readily in form, but that there may be great mistake in them; but I think my expressions were no great alacrity: For though it were a Court, yet the persons there were no more ours, that it may not be very improper to term them a multitude. Yet, if I have filled in due expectation, I beg his Majesty's pardon. I know foretellers of the ruin of the City of London, and the powers and privileges of the Courts there; and foretellers also of the ruin of England; but what the powers and privileges of this Court are, I know not, and therefore shall desire to say little, lest I should unwillingly offend.

L. Chan. Sir, pray tell us, who advised you in this matter?

The King. Who advised you?

Mr. Jenyns. What I then proposed was consented to by the whole Court, and so became their Act, as I said before.

L. Chan. and others. Answer directly to the question, or declare you will not.

Mr. Jenyns. Since I for your Majesty and the Lords are angry, though I am not sensible that I have given you any just cause for it; I must not lay it out without advice, lest you should be more angry, and to some any particular person (if there were such) would be a man and unworthy thing, therefore I desire to be excused all further answer to such questions, since the law doth provide, that no man be put to answer to his own prejudice.

King. We will take that for an answer.

L. Chan. Since you name the law, by the law you shall be tried.

Mr. Jenyns. I thank you and this Board.

L. Chan. You may withdraw.

He immediately withdrew, and the room being cleared of all his friends, and other company, Mr. Jenyns was kept there for the space of an hour and an half, and after that, without being called in any more, was, by a warrant of the Council, sent to the prison of the Gatehouse within the Liberties of Whitfield. Soon after his commitment, he demanded of the Keeper a copy of the warrant by which he was committed; as he might, and by law ought to have. The Keeper gave him a promise of it, but delaying the performance for two days, Mr. Jenyns resolutely demanded it of him as his duty, but could not yet obtain it. Some time after, the Keeper lent him one voluntarily, by his man, with this excuse, That before he had positive order to deny him one, and now had to give it him.

The

carried in the Petition, came to Mr. Yewin in a disordered confusion, and told him, That he had committed a mistake in returning the Petition; That his Lordship had asked him for it, and would be very sorry with him if he had it not; That he had left his Lordship looking over some papers, and had taken that opportunity of coming for it; and desired that he might have it, to present him from his Lordship's displeasure.

Thus the Morning's action gave Mr. Yewin a great deal of reason to suspect the Secretary's to be a more contrivance, and only to fascinate the truth; yet he took no notice of what had then passed, but from the Petition (which was then a stone of his friends hands) that evening to him. Upon the second thoughts which his Lordship bestowed upon the matter of the Petition, he was better reconciled to it, and passed better than his ward in considering the precedents; for instead of passing upon them till the next Term, he was pleased to carry them and the Petition to the Privy-Council, the next Wednesday; where, tho' all the particulars are not known upon credit's informations, this was the substance of what passed:

His Lordship acquainted the Board with the Address that had been made to him, and moved, that the Petition might be there read. After it was read, his Lordship told them, that it had some appearance of law, and desired that the Attorney-General might give his opinion. Mr. Attorney told him, if it were law, his Lordship ought to grant it, if it were not law, then to deny it, if it were of such difficulty as he could not fairly himself, that then he should advise with the Judges.

His Lordship then moved for an order of Council for his direction in the matter, to which some of the Lords replied, That they were a Court of State, and not of Law, and that it did belong to him, as Lord Chancellor, to inform them of matters of law; Thereupon his Lordship, clapping his hands on his breast, said, I thank God I have courage enough to serve his Majesty.

About the latter end of July, some of Mr. Yewin's friends attended his Lordship again, and offered him bail, insinuating upon the Writ of M Habeas Corpus as the subject's right; alleging to his Lordship the hazards that his health, his family, and his trade were exposed to by his confinement. His Lordship asked them, why they had not petitioned the King and Council; and told them, if Mr. Yewin thought it better to lie in prison and complain, than prison and be killed, he might do as he pleased.

They told him they had petitioned him in Mr. Secretary William's name, who promised them to move the King in Council in it. But when they remitted him of it upon the next Council-day, he was pleased to excuse himself. His Lordship told him, he never heard they had tendered bail; but the Writ of M Habeas Corpus was forgotten in all his answer.

They then told him, that the general report was, that the King and Council had referred it to his Lordship; but his Lordship would take no notice of that likewise, but said, the King would advise with the Judges when they came to Town. His Lordship withdrew from them; and they left word with his Secretary, That Mr. Yewin looked upon himself to be his Lordship's Prisoner.

On the — of August, Mr. Yewin's friends went again to his Lord Chancellor's, but his Secretary told him, his Lordship could not be spoke with. They prevailed with his Secretary to go up to him, and remind his Lordship of his late answer of advising with the Judges; and tell him, that several of the Judges had been in Town, and they did now desire his Lordship's Resolution.

The Secretary at his return told them, that as soon as he began to mention the business, his Lordship fell into a fit of the Stomach; but when that was over, he would mention it to him. About two hours after, they returned; and the Secretary being absent, another of his Lordship's servants came to them, and told them that his Lordship was not well, and could not be spoke with; but had ordered him to tell them, that Mr. Yewin might advise with his Council what was fit to be done, for he was none of his Council; and if he would petition the King and Council, he might; and that That was his answer.

On the 11th of August, being the last Council-day that was to be before the 3d of October, Mr. Yewin thought fit again to tender bail to the Council; and thus the Lord Chancellor, who discovered all knowledge of his doing so before, and that the whole Council might know of it, he sent this Letter by his bail to the Lord Privy-Seal, then President of the Council, which was publicly read.

"My Lord,

I Have been importuned since the 28th of June, to my great loss, charge, and prejudice of my health. I have hitherto been denied bail, Habeas Corpus, and the Writ of M Habeas Corpus, which I am informed, were never before denied to any of his Majesty's subjects in the like case: And this only for moving in a lawful Court, and in a quiet and peaceable manner, that which I did believe to be fit for his Majesty's Service, and the good of the City and Kingdom, and the prefervation of the Protestant Religion; and which I conceive I can make appear to be according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, if I am publicly called thereon. Wherefore I do not beg a discharge, for I desire nothing more than to clear my Innocence by a public trial; but since Mr. Yewin and others, committed to this put it for matter of a far other nature, are duly bound out, my humble request to your Lordship is, that you would be pleased to move his Majesty, that I, as well as any other of his Majesty's subjects, may enjoy the benefit of the Laws; and that the Writ of M Habeas Corpus may be granted to me, or that my bail, which now attend, may be taken: Your Lordship will very much oblige

"Your Lordship's humble Servant,

"FRANCIS JERVIS"

This Letter was by some imposed into a Petition; and when they had given it that name, (tho' that was the only thing wanting to please the Lord Chancellor) yet it could not procure the discharge of bail, but the method proposed by his Lordship, proved as ineffectual as those that were demanded of him. The Lord Chancellor's Resolutions being sufficiently discovered, Mr. Yewin's friends sought all further solicitations of his Lordship, and made full application to the Lord Chief-Justice Reynolds, on August 18th, then just returned from the Circuit.

The time of Sessions at the Old-Bailiwick drawing on, they caused two Writs of Habeas Corpus to be made (the common cause of removing prisoners from one Court to another); one, of disobedience, directed to the Keeper at the Gate-house; and the other, of proposuere, directed to the Sheriff of London, and desired his Lordship to sign them, that Mr. Yewin might be removed and brought to trial; for that the Keeper of the Gate-house not calculating any State-Prisoners, (as he called him) at the Sessions for Witchamver, he might be there all his life-time without trial, which no subject ought to do. His Lordship excused himself upon his late return to Town, which had not yet afforded him leisure to advise; and sent them to the Attorney-General, to know whether he were ready for a trial, before he would give them any answer.

Mr. Attorney, upon their coming to him, very worthily told them, That he had no order in it, but that he would not oppose the granting of those Writs: adding, God forbid that what the Law should have its due course. They returned to the Lord Chief-Justice with this answer, and offered to make oath that it was Mr. Attorney's answer; but he would give credit to nothing, but a note under Mr. Attorney's own hand. They told him, it was hard that a man should lie in prison, who was willing to bring himself upon trial; that Writs of this nature were every day granted, and did procure, could not reasonably be denied. His Lordship answered, he would know whether Mr. Attorney were ready for a trial. They replied, That they did not know when Mr. Attorney would be ready, and Mr. Yewin must stay for his Trial till then.

They then went his Lordship, as they had done formerly, That he would grant a Habeas Corpus to bring him before his Lordship, and that he would accept of substantial Sureties for bail, who should render him whenever Mr. Attorney should call for him; alledging, that such Writs had been frequently granted by the Lord Chief-Justice Kent, and one of the now Judges of the King's Bench.

His Lordship returned, that he did not doubt the security they should offer him; but he had never granted such a Writ, and he knew not upon what authority others had done it: And in short, refused to grant either that or the other Writ.

After all these denials of right, Mr. Yewin resolved to sit still, with the satisfaction, that his ill success was not imputable to the injustice of his cause; but to the pleasure or fear of those that had the power of making it otherwise: And with patience to expect it till the Term should see open the prison-doors, which will not break the denial of a Habeas Corpus, tho' a long Vacation may.

No further advice was therefore made to either of their Lordships; but themselves, after they had taken the pleasure of deparing him, were pleased to confederate to intercede for him: for as we heard, by very credible information, the Lord Chief-Justice went to the Lord Chancellor and told him, "That the Writs demanded of him, were according to Law, and could not be denied; and that he had only taken time till he had acquainted his Lordship with it."

The Lord Chancellor directed him to the Lord Treasurer for further advice; who sent him to the King. As soon as his Majesty understood, that what was demanded was the subject's right, he immediately commanded that the laws should have their due course, which their Lordships had stopped: And accordingly he was bailed.

[He was afterwards, in 1683, tried with Thomas Pilkington, Henry Cresswell, Edgar, and others, for a Riot at Goldsmiths, and fined 500 marks. See State-Trials, Vol. III. p. 541.

XXXIII. Articles of High Misdemeanours, humbly offered and presented to the Consideration of his most Sacred Majesty, and his most Honourable Privy-Council, against Sir WILLIAM SCROGGS, Lord Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench; exhibited by Dr. Oates, and Captain Bedlow, 31 Car. II.

THAT the said Lord Chief-Justice, contrary to his oath, the duty of his place, in sentiment of the King, his Crown and Dignity, did sit at liberty several persons accused upon oath before him of High-Treason, without their being ever tried, or otherwise acquitted; as namely, the Lord Broderick, &c.

II. That at the Trial of the Gorge Wileman and others at the Sessions-House in the Old-Bailiwick for High-Treason, the said Lord Chief-Justice (according to the Dignity of his place) managing the said Trial, did know-hear and curb Dr. Timothy Owen and Mr. William Bedlow, two of the principal Witnesses for the King in that case; and encourage the Jury (imposed and sworn to try the malefactors, against the said witnesses, by his publicly speaking highly could not be Mr. Langham write in his study: which was Mr. Biddle's evidence.

XIII. He faith, the matter complained of is a more contrait with other men, of which he thinks himself not bound to give Mr. Gales and Mr. Biddle any other account, but that by the taking of twelve guineas he lost forty; and that his backwardness to go into the Court at Walsden's Trial, makes it look as if he had not had ten thousand pounds to favour Walsden in his Trial.

If these Articles shall appear to your Majesty to be frivolous, or scandalous, or not true, I humbly pray — that your Majesty's pleasure therein, in relation to your Courts and Government.

And that such an evidence attempt may not go unpunished: that the new statute may be left to be proceeded against according to Law.

The Articles of Mr. John Gales, and Mr. William Biddle, against the Lord Chief-Justice Scroggs, were heard that 21st of January, 1679, before the King and Council; and upon the hearing of both sides, Mr. Gales and Captain Biddle are left to be proceeded against according to Law.

But I don't find the Chief-Justice recover'd any damages.

XXXIV. Proceedings against Sir WILLIAM SCROGGS, Knt. Lord Chief-Justice of the King's Bench, and other Judges, in Parliament, 1680. 32 Car. II.

Novem. 13, 1680.

Several Persons were examined in the House of Commons about the defaming of a Grand-Jury in Middlesex. After which, several Members of the House spoke as follows, viz.

Sir William Jones.

MR. Speaker, Sir, the prebendation of the Government in general, as well as our particular fidelity, have a dependance upon the matter that is now before you, in which there are so many misapprehensions to be cleared, so there is such some difficulty how to examine them. I cannot but observe, how the Proclamation is here again mentioned; by which you may conclude, there is such a great weight upon the people's right to petition by means thereof, and that the bill way to remove it, is to find out the authors and contrivers of that Proclamation, in order to proceed against them according to their deserts. Without which, what you have done in asserting the Right of Petitioning, will remain with some doubt; and that which did assist the proclaiming to the people, that it is sedition to petition the King, without that challenge they deserve. And therefore, I humbly conceive, you will do well to consider of it as soon as you can. It is not strange, that the Proclamation should be made use of with Country Gentlemen, to get adherents to petitioning, because the Judges themselves have made use of it to that purpose. They should have known, that though a Proclamation might be of great use, it is likewise the destruction of a Law, yet that it had never been used against a Law. But yet I do not admire so much at this as I do at the discharge of the Grand Jury, before they had finished their prebendations. It tends so much to the subversion of the established Laws of this Land, that I dare pronounce, that all the Laws you have already, and all that you are to make, will finally nothing against any great man, unless you can remedy it for the future. I observe, there were two real reasons why this Grand-Jury were so extravagantly discharged, one, because they would otherwise have protested the Duke of York for a Popish oath; the other, because they pretended a Petition to be delivered to the King for the raising of the Parliament, which they said it was not their business to deliver. Though I cannot but observe, how upon other occasions they did receive Petitions, and deliver them to the King, and all the difference was, that the Petition was delivered to a special Justice of Parliament. The truth is, I cannot much condemn them for it; but if they were guilty of such crimes as the witnesses have this day given you information of, I think they had no reason to farther Petition for the raising of a Parliament. But, Sir, this business will need a further Information, and therefore, I humbly pray it may be referred to a Committee.

Sir Francis Wrentham.

MR. Speaker, Sir, I think we are come to the old times again, when the Judges pretended they had a rule of Government, as well as a rule of Law; and they have acted accordingly. If they did never read Magna Charta, I think they are not fit to be Judges; if they have read Magna Charta, and do thus to contrary, they deserve a severe rebuke. And I discharge Grand-Juries of purpose to disappoint them of making their prebendations, is to deprive the Subject of the greatest benefit and security the Law hath provided for them. If the Judges, instead of ruling by Law, shall be acted by their ambition, and endeavour to get promotions rather by subverting the right Law, than by doing Justice, the Nation will soon be reduced to a miserable condition. Suppose that after the discharge of this Grand-Jury, some Person had offered to present some Member, Traitor, or other capital crime, for want of the Grand-Jury, there would have been a failure of Justice. As faults committed by Judges are of more dangerous consequence than others to the Public, for they do not wait precedents to prevent themselves for them than for others. I humbly move you first to pass a Vote upon this business of discharging Grand-Juries, and then to appoint a Committee to examine the misdeeds of the Judges in Walsden's case, and to report the same with all speed to you.

Mr. R. Tice.

MR. Speaker, Sir, As it hath been observed that this business has some reference to the Proclamation, I believe there is something of the plot in it too; and therefore, I think if the Plot did not go on, it would have been worse than that our Plot did, being the Judges, as well as most other persons in public places, have given it as much assistance as they could. But whereas, as some have spoken ill of these Judges, I dare to speak well of them in one thing, I am confident they have been as honest themselves as any of their benefactors; for I do believe that even as there were prefer'd to these places of purpose, because they should do what they have done. Laws of themselves are but dead letters: unless you can give the execution as well of these you have already, as of these you are now making, we shall spend our time to little purpose. Therefore I second the motion that hath been made for a Vote, to declare the rule of the House as to the discharging of Grand-Juries, and for entering the further examination to a Committee.

Mr. W. Biddell.

MR. Speaker, Sir, the business of this debate is a great increase of our sick and languishing condition. As our Ships, Forts, and Gallies are for securing us from the danger of our enemies from abroad, so our Laws from our enemies at home; and if committed to such persons as will turn their strength upon us, are equally dangerous. Sir, We all know how the Government of Scotland hath been quite altered since Mr. Jeff's Rebellion, by James Lawrie made there a prey to us: born a free man, yet so altered by the corrupt proceedings of Judges, yet so reduced to a state most odious of depending upon the arbitrary Power and arbitrary Government: here, that they are slow. It judges can thus prevent the penalties of the Law, by discharging my Grand-Juries before they have made their prebendations, and can make laws by their Rules of Court, I think the Government may soon be subverted; and therefore, that it is high time for the House to speak to these Gentlemen. In former times several Judges have been impeached, and hanged too, for their crimes since that; and the reason was, because they had broke the King's oath as well as their own. It is what hath been a trial of these Judges be fully proved, they shall not say that the Vote is of little use to them in the same impeachment. The truth is, Sir, I know not how the ill consequences we justly fear from Judges can be prevented, so long as they are made servants to popular, and have such dependance as they have. But that must be a work of time: in order to remedy our present miseries, let us pass a Vote upon this business of discharging Grand-Juries, and that it may be sent to the safe custody. If you please, let a Committee be appointed to examine the misdeeds of the Judges.

Mr. H. Poul.

MR. Speaker, Sir, I would beg leave to observe to you, because I think it may not be necessary to be considered by your Committee, what an opinion was given not long since by some of our Judges about Praying; which was, that Prayers of New might be prohibited by Law; and accordingly a Proclamation issued out. I will not take on me to confirm the opinion so illegal, but leave it to your further consideration. But I remember there was a complaint held by the Judges a little before, and they gave their opinion, that they were not of any way to prevent Praying by Law, because the Act for that purpose was expired. Upon which, some Judges were put out, and new ones put in, and then they gave their opinion. These things are worthy of a serious examination; for if Traitors may raise money by flouting at the Statute, borrowing of the Bankers, or re-employment, and the Judges make new Laws by an ill construction, or an ill execution of the old ones; I conclude, that Parliament will soon be found useless, and the liberty of the people an inconvenience as to the Government. And therefore, I think, Sir, you have been well moved to endeavour to pass your motion on some of these illegal proceedings by a Vote, and to refer the further consideration to a Committee.

Sir Francis Wrentham.

MR. Speaker, In the front of Magna Charta it is said, Nemo nos compellat, nisi defensores Justitiam, we will defend to every Justice to no man: to this the King is sworn, and with this the Judges are entrusted by their Oaths. I assure what they can say for themselves, if they have not said this Law, they are not fit to sit upon the Bench; and if they have, I had almost said, they deserve to lose their heads.

MR. Speaker, The state of this poor Nation is to be deplored, that in the midst all this, the Judges, who ought to be protectors of the Laws, have attempted to destroy them; and that to please a Court-faction, they have by treachery attempted to break the bonds of Liberty of Magna Charta, the great treasure of our people. It was no doubt said, but a Chief-Justice (Robert de Berey) in that day, persuaded the King he was not bound by it, because he was under age, when it was said. But this sort of violence the next Parliament referred, to the ruin of the pernicious Chief-Justice. In the time of Richard II. an unthinking, dissolute Prince, there were Judges that did violence unto the King, that the Parliament were only his creatures, and treated as his will, and not as the fundamental constitutions of the Land; which treacherous advice proved the ruin of the King; and for which all these evil Interests were brought in Justice. In his late Majesty's time, his misdeeds were occasioned chiefly by the corruptions of the Lord Robt; his Judges by an extraordinary opinion gave the King power to raise money upon an extraordinary occasion without Parliament, and made the King Judge of such occasions: Charity prompts me to think they thought this a service to the King, but the sad consequences of it may convince all mankind, that that every illegal act weakens the Royal Interest; and to endeavour to introduce absolute Disunion in their Estates, is the worst of Treasons. It casts a stain on the face of friendship to the King, and designs to be his ruin; whereas, it ever has, and of the contrary effect.

It is the two main pillars of the Government, are Parliament and Justice. It is this power to the rule of ancient Bosphorus. For my nation of England is this, as it is governed by Laws of their own making, and their own of the Law, combined with themselves. The two great and restricted privileges of the people, have been lately abused by the Judges that now sit in Windsor, and they have abused. Proclamation against Laws, they have discontinued and opposed several legal Acts, that tended to the lifting of this venerable House; they have galled the legislative Power into the same basis, as in that instance of Printing, the Parliament was considering that matter, but they, in the interim, made their private opinion to be law, to beset the parliament of this House: They have discharged Great Juries, on purpose to quell their processness, and flatter great Criminals from Justice, and when Juries have protested their opinion for the lifting of this Parliament, they have in disdain thrust them at their feet, and told them they would be no suffragers to such a rich Parliament; and yet, in a few days all will be concluded all that would give the crown against the Government, they have taken the great and arbitrary power, and sent the messengers of submission to the crown.

[illegible]

Then the House agreed to the following Resolutions.

Resolved, That the charging of a Grand Jury by any Judge, before the end of the Term, Adjourn, or Recess, while matters are under their consideration, and a postponement, is arbitrary, illegal, defective to public justice, a violation of the rights of the Jury, and is a cause to forbear the punishment of any of the Jurors.

Resolved, That a Committee be appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges in Westminster-Hall, and report the same, with their opinions thereon to the House.

Whereupon a Committee was appointed, and they for several days, and then made the following Report :

The Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to examine the Proceedings of the Judges, &c. Therein, Dec. 23, 1680*.

THIS Committee being informed, that as Trinity-Term last, the Court of King's Bench had given the Grand Jury, that served for the hundred of Middlesex, a bill against the said John, and that the said Master, Peter's, Clerk, had taken the same, and laid by the information of Charles Daffinshield, Esq. Foreman of the said Jury, Edward Peck, Henry Gerard, and John Smith, Gentlemen, all of the said Jury, That on the 21st of June last, the said bill attending the said Jury were found defective, as not presenting the facts as they ought, and therefore were adjourned by the said Jury to make further presentations of them on the 25th following, on which day the Jury met for that purpose; when several Peers of the said Bench, and other persons of honour and quality, brought them a bill against James, Duke of York, for not coming to Court; but some new reports being taken to flow bill, so that it did not appear that the said Duke in a Paper, signed of the Jury, attended the said process of quelling the revenue of the said Duke. In the mean time, about an hour after they had received the said bill, some of the Jury attended the Court of King's Bench with a Petition, which they desired the Court to present in their name unto His Majesty for the setting of the Parliament. Upon which, the Lord-Chief-Justice Sergeant raised many scruples, and on pretence that they were not all in Court (that twenty of the Jury had subscribed the Petition), sent for them, saying, He would discontinue them presently. The Jury being angry, and their names called out, they renewed their desire that the Court would present this Petition; but the Chief-Justice asked, if they had any bills? They answered, that they had, but the Clerks were drawing them into Court. Upon which, the Lord-Chief-Justice said, that he would not receive any bills of the said Duke and the Petition being read, he said that was no article of their petition; and was there any Act of Parliament that required the Court to deliver the Grand Jury's Petition. That there was a Proclamation about them; and that it was not reasonable the Court should be obliged to run on their errands; and he thought it much, that they should come with a Petition to alter the King's message declared on the New-Books. The Jury said, they did it not to impose on the Court, but (as other James had done) with all submission they desired it, but the Court refused, telling the Court even then their Petition. And Mr. Justice Yates told them, they had needed no motion of Seize, nor again their errands, but presented no bills of the said Duke, as in that case. They desired it because they were not all in Court, and that they were not all in Court. Notwithstanding which, the said Jury desired to deliver their names, and were charged from day to day service. But Philip Wood, the Clerk, that attended the said Jury, read out, No, no, they have no bills before them, for which the Court adjourned (as it is said to be) to Guarantee; a secret story, which the Clerk did not, reproved him, saying, if the Clerk were 10 p. - the rule there? The Court then told the Court, they would not receive their Pension. The Chief Justice had him let it go, so it was I there, and the jury consisted of 12 men, and there found several reasons why it was not a Grand Jury, and one of them, as the Judge had directed, was the first being, that could not now receive the defendants, being discharged, whereby such business could be transacted, that none of the 12 Informants were known to the Grand Jury, and that the 12th day of the Term, which was not till Sunday, and I and further agreement to the Constitution, by the evidence of Samuel A. Taylor, John Lusk, and Philip Ward, Clerks, that have long served in the Court, that they were much surprised at the first discharging of the Jury, so that it was not over in their ordinary way, and the rather, because the said Hefring, as Secretary, and only one or so on that Grand Jury paper, that the 12th day of the Term is given them to return the 12th day, as the 12th day, but one is given to the other two Grand Jurors of that County, which was in as full view.

Being the last day of the Term, and of all the other Term the Life day is given, which is seen to appear to this Committee, that they were not in truth deluged with not having their proceedings ready, but the Court had on it more a longer day, but why is obstruct this further proceedings, and it appears by the evidence offered to this Court.

For, after the failure of that Court we spoke of at the beginning of the last July, and it did not appear that any of them did differ the slightest upon the point whereof the Commerce came to this sad decision.

And that is the opinion of this Committee, that the only way to the Grand Jury of the hundred of Offshore, in the County of Wiltshire, by the Court of Exchequer, in Trinity Term last, before the Lord of the Treasury, and before they had finished their deliberations, was not to admit, and a high misdemeanor.

The Court, and a per se attempt to require into a rule of the Court of King's Bench, is given in support of the publishing of a Book, called The Fifth Part of the Decisions from Rome; or, The History of Piracy, and Sawney's Story. Gent, counsel for the defendant, informed the Court, that the Author of the first Book, Henry Court, had been informed of all the facts, and had provided to the Information; but before it was not a rule made on a motion, as he supposed, against the said Book, and the Judges of that Court (as he remembers) being present, and one difference. The copy of which rule he gave us to this Court, and is as follows:

Cat. H. Roris

Ordinances of public libraries. The Weekly Packet of Advice from Ramsay, or, The History of Popery, now almost everywhere sold publicly for a few pence. Perforated quinquaginta. Per Car.

And this Committee, admitting that Profranchise Judges should take offence against a Book, whose chief design was to expose the cheats and forgery of Poetry, enquired further into it, and was found by the evidence of Jos. Garcia, that the said Book had been licensed for several months, that his husband paid for the copy, and entered it in the Hall-book of the Company. But for all this, the could not prevail by these reasons, with the Lord Chief Justice Swaine, to permit it any longer; who said, 'Ye are a foolish London Livel, and against the King's Proclamation; and he would soon see if ever she got the primed it any more.' And soon after the was furnished with the fee, as the Author, and other Promoters were; and by the Author's evidence it appears, that he was taken and brought before the said Chief Justice by his warrant above a year since, and upon his coming he was put out of that Book, the Chief Justice called him rogue and other ill names, saying, he would fill all the gaols in England with such rogues, and pile them up as mountains; and he commenced him a prisoner, refusing to give him bail, and taking a great goal him, as possible; and he was kept in the said gaol, till he was paid a great sum of money, for his Liberty; which he was paid, and he was put out of prison, to come him to his Arrest Corps, and then taking the same had him confined before a Bench, which the Committee came in to this resolution.

Replied, That it is the opinion of the Committee, that the sale made by the Count of King's Bench, in Trinity Term last, against printing a Book, called, The Weekly Pocket of Affairs from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary.

And the Committee proceeded farther, and upon information that a very small latitude had been taken of late by the Judges, in shipping fares on the persons seized guilty before them, caused a transmittal of all the fines imposed by the King v. Arabi since Esfor Term, in the fifth of his Majesty's Reign, to be brought before them, from the Old Court, by Sheriff Esfor, Gent. By perusal of which, it appeared to this Committee, that the quality of the offence, and the ability of the person seized guilty, have not been the only factors that have determined the quantum of the fine, which brings in a very narrow case, and the Committee refer themselves to those Records as to the general, influencing circumstances, and state the following particulars as follow :

W. SCROGGS.

Upon view whereof this Committee came to this Resolution:

Resolved, That it is the Opinion of this Committee, that the said Warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

And this Committee being informed of certain scandalous discourses, said to be uttered in public places by the Lord Chief Justice Scroggs, proceeded to examine Sir Robert Adams, late one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, concerning the same, by whom it appears, That at a Sessions-dinner at the Old-Bailey, in the Majority of Sir Robert Adams, who was then present, the said Chief Justice took occasion to speak very much against Parliament, condemning it as retarding, as tedious and tending to Rebellions, or to that effect, to which the said Sir Robert Adams made no reply, supposing he wanted for some advantage or other. But the Chief Justice continuing and pressing him with the said discourses he began to justify himself as the right of the people, especially for the fitting of a Parliament, which the Law requires, if it be done with modesty and respect. Upon which the Chief Justice fell into a great passion, and there is little reason to believe, that soon after he made an ill representation of what the said Sir Robert Adams spoke, unto his Majesty. And this Committee was further informed, that the said Sir Robert Adams being in circuit with the said Chief Justice, at Summer Assizes was twelve-month, at Macclesfield, (Mr. Adams, Mr. Price, and Mr. Bull being then in company) the Chief Justice fell verbally, in public, upon Mr. Adams, taking off the credit of his evidence, and alleging he had over-did himself in it, or to that effect, very much to the disparagement of his testimony. And the said Sir Robert Adams, Mr. Adams, in evidence and credit, he grew extremely angry and loud, saying to that effect, That he would never Langdon did accompany. To which Sir Robert replied, He wondered how he could think that who had committed him himself, and had not moved the King for a remission for him. All which matters of discourse, this Committee humbly submit to the wisdom and consideration of this House, without taking upon them to give any opinion therein.

And this Committee proceeded further to inquire into some passages that happened at Law Adverses left for the County of Somerset at the trial of Thomas Dore, Great, there, upon an Indictment for saying falsely and seditionously, That the Subjects had no power to resist their governors, as by testimony, the other by relation: and found, that though by his other discourses, when he said by, that it appeared plainly he had no rebellious intention in that he said, That God forbid there should be a rebellion, he would be the first man to be the sword against a Rebel, yet he was proceeded with great violence. And having pleaded, Not guilty, he moved Mr. Justice Jones, (who then sat Judge there) that he might try it at the next Assizes, L. that Mr. Serjeant [who was by] in the speaking of the words, and a material witness for his defence) was not then to be had, and an affidavit to that purpose was made and received, but the said Justice Jones told him, That was a favour of the Court rules, and he had not delivered any favour, and he forced him to try it presently. But the Jury, appearing to be an extraordinary one, provided on purpose, being all of persons that had highly opposed themselves for the fitting of this Parliament, he was advised to withdraw his plea, and the said Justice Jones, concerning him to do so, he denied the words, denying any evil intention, and gave the said Justice an account in writing, of the truth of the whole matter, and made a submission in Court, in which he was directed by the said Justice, who promised to recommend him to his Majesty, but imposed a fine of 5000. on him, and to be bound to good behaviour for three years: Declaring also, That he was turned out from being a Common-Councillor of the Corporation of Taunton, in the said County, on pretence of a clause in their Charter, giving such a power to a Judge of Assize. And the said Thomas Dore remains yet in prison for the said Fine, in which manner of the Trial aforesaid, this Committee doth intend to refer itself to the judgment of this House.

The Rebellions of the House of Commons upon the said Report.

1. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the discharging of the Grand Jury of the hundred of Offlow, in the County of Middlesex, by the Court of King's Bench, in Trinity Term last, before the last day of the Term, and before they had finished their proceedings, was arbitrary and illegal, destructive to public Justice, a manifest violation of the Oaths of the Judges of that Court, and a means to subvert the fundamental Laws of this Kingdom, and to introduce Popery.

2. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the rule made by the Court of King's Bench, in Trinity Term last, against printing of a Book, called, The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, is illegal and arbitrary, thereby usurping to themselves legislative power, to the great disadvantage of the Protestants, and for the countervailing of the Popery.

3. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the Court of King's Bench, in the imposition of fines on offenders of late years, have acted arbitrarily, illegally and partially, favouring Papists, and perverting public justice, and executing opposing his Majesty's Protestant Subjects.

4. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the refusing sufficient Bail in these Cases, wherein the persons concerned were detained by law, was illegal, and a high breach of the Liberties of the Subject.

5. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the said expressions in the charge given by the said Baron B. Jones, were a scandalous Reflection, and tending to cause discord in the said Majesty's Subjects, and to the subversion of the ancient constitution of Parliament, and of the Government of this Kingdom.

6. That it is the Opinion of this House, that the said Warrants are arbitrary and illegal.

The Petitioners of the Commons, for the Impachment of the said July 4.

Resolved, That Sir William S. Serjeant, Knt. Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the said Report, and the Resolutions of the House thereupon.

Resolved, That Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Justices of the said Court of King's Bench, be impeached upon the said Report, and Resolutions of the House thereupon.

Resolved, That Sir Richard Wilson, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, be impeached upon the said Report, and Resolutions of the House thereupon.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to prepare an impeachment against Sir Francis North, Chief Justice of the Court of Common-Pleas, do prepare impeachments against the said Sir William Scroggs, Sir Thomas Jones, and Sir Richard Wilson, upon the said Report and Resolutions.

Ordered, That the said Report, and several Resolutions of this House thereupon, be printed; and that Mr. Speaker take care in the printing thereof a-part from this day's other Votes.

January 5. 1681. The Articles against Sir William Scroggs, Chief Justice of the King's Bench, were read as follow.

Articles of Impeachment of High-Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanours, against Sir William Scroggs, Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, by the Commons in Parliament assembled, in their own Name, and in the Name of all the Commons of England.

THAT he the said Sir William Scroggs, then being Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, hath traitorously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental Laws, and the established Religion and Government of this Kingdom of England, and uttered thereof, to introduce Popery and an arbitrary and tyrannical Government, against Law, which he has declared by divers traitorous and wicked Words, Opinions, Judgments, Practices and Actions.

2. That the said Sir William Scroggs, in Trinity Term last, being then Chief Justice of the said Court, and having taken an oath duly to administer Justice, according to the Laws and Statutes of this Realm, in pursuance of his said oath, purposed did, together with a cleft of the said Justice of the same Court, several days before the end of the said Term, in an arbitrary manner discharge the Grand Jury, which then served for the Hundred of Offlow, in the County of Middlesex, before they had made their Proceedings, or had found several Bills of Indictment which were then before them; whereas the said Sir William Scroggs was then fully informed: and that the time would be tendered to the Court upon the last day of the said Term; which day then was, and by the known count of the said Court both always heretofore been given unto the said Jury for the delivering in of their Bills and Preferences: By which false and illegal discharge of the said Jury, the course of Justice was stopped unlawfully and illegally, the Proceedings of many Persons and other offenders were obstructed, and in particular, a Bill of Indictment against James Duke of York, for abetting himself from Church, which was then before them, was prevented from being proceeded upon.

3. That whereas one Henry Gorr had, for some time before, published every week a certain Book, intitled, The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or, The History of Popery, wherein the superstitious and abusive of the Church of Rome were from time to time exposed, L. the said Sir William Scroggs, then Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, together with the other Judges of the said Court, before an illegal conviction of the said Gorr of any crime, did at the same Trinity Term, in a most illegal and arbitrary manner, make, and cause to be entered, a certain rule of that Court, against the printing of the said Book, in these Words:

Die Mercurii proximo post festum Septembris Sancta Trinitatis, Anno 2a Car. II. Regis.

Ordonation of good Lord Intendant: The Weekly Packet of Advice from Rome, or, The History of Popery, was otherwise imprimer and published for aliquam personam quocumque.

Per Cur'

And did cause the said Gorr, and divers Printers and other persons to be served with the same, which said Rule and other Proceedings were most apparently contrary to all Justice, in condemning not only what had been written without hearing the Parties, but also at that night for the future be written on that subject, a manifest countervailing of the Liberty and countervailing of Protestants, an open invasion upon the right of the Subject, and an encroaching and assuming to themselves a legislative power and authority.

4. That the said Sir William Scroggs, since he was made Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench, hath, together with the other Judges of the said Court, most notoriously departed from all rules of justice and equality, in the imposition the public being more concerned in their actions; and therefore the custom of Parliaments hath made that treason in them, which is not so in other persons. The words of Judges and Privy-Councillors, in some cases, are Quæritur of themselves, I think it will become the wisdom of the Nation, to make all the defence and provision they can, against the corrupt designs of Men in such places: And I do not see what danger can arise to our posterity by such proceedings. Is it not with the Parliament we entrust this power? Who can imagine that a Parliament can ever be so corrupted, as not to be carefully concerned in their proceedings as to life and death, and only to contrive themselves therein, when some extraordinary exigencies in which the Government is much concerned, requires it? What Man would desire to live after he was thought worthy of death by such an assembly? And notwithstanding what hath been said to extenuate the crimes mentioned in the Articles, I think, the Order that was made in the King's Bench about Printing, by the Judges, was making as them a legislative Power, which hath formerly been judged treason: And I think we live now in as dangerous times as ever, and stand as great a necessity to have a care of the mischief that may happen to the Nation by ill Judges, as ever. And I see no reason to doubt our being able to make good these Articles, and therefore I say that the Articles may be engrossed as they are.

Mr. Pym.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I agree that it will become this House very well, to be very cautious how they make precedents in cases of treason, which are the Stems of life and death: as also how they make parliamentary proceedings, that are necessary to preserve the Government. And I hope that nothing but the true merits of the cause will lead us in a matter of so great importance, and neither will any orators, nor my forced explanation of the laws. I see it agreed by all, that Parliaments have a power of declaring treason. The question is, whether the most sufficient and securest, to have it done by Bill, that the King, Lords and Commons may join therein: or whether by an impeachment from the Commons, the Lords being only the Judges: or whether any thought ought or can be declared treason by Parliament, which was not felony by some known law before?

Sir, I am of opinion that it is safest and most agreeable to the policy of this Government, that the declaring of any thing treason in Parliament should be by Bill, that King, Lords and Commons may join therein, that so such a precious thing as the life of the subject should have the greatest security imaginable. However, it is not to be doubted, but it hath been practised otherwise, and that many persons have been condemned in Parliament upon impeachment from the Commons, for facts which were not treason by any known Law. And the reason may be, thereby to prevent the danger that might arise from some Ministers of State growing so great with the King, as that they should be able to secure him from ever giving his consent to a Bill. In such a case, by giving ill counsel and other secret counsels, (happily as far as treason, yet not known by any law) they would be secure from punishment, if this way of proceeding against such a person, where the King's conscience is not necessary, were not allowed of. And the preserving of this right is so far from being contrary to the wisdom of our Ancestors, that it is very agreeable to all their proceedings in the constitution of this Government, in order to balance it the better, and preserve it against the designs of great ill Men. And as to the other objection, whether the Parliament can declare any thing treason that was not felony before by some known law, I am quite of another opinion, and do believe that the practice hath been otherwise. The Judges in Sir Rich. the 11th's time were condemned for giving extrajudicial opinions, which, I think, was not felony by any Statute-Law. A Knight of Clare was condemned in Parliament, for conspiring the death of the King's uncle: an Earl of Northumberland, for giving liveries to so many persons as were judged a little army; and many other cases which I have read of, in which persons have been condemned in Parliament, when their crimes were not felony by any known law. But I do not take any delight in ripping-up old Statutes or Precedents about treasons. I am sorry the misfortune of our times should make it now necessary. But if the Parliament, as I conclude, have often declared such things as their treason, and the Commons have impeached persons guilty of such crimes as they are drawn. For notwithstanding what hath been said to mitigate the crimes contained in these Articles, I am of opinion, that the order made in the King's Bench, about Printing, their Warrants for printing of Books, their dismissing of Grand Jurors, did tend to the subversion of the Government; and hath been, and ever ought to be, in Judges, judged High-Treason. And therefore, there cannot conflict with the prudence of this House, nor the security of the Nation, that this person should be impeached of less than High-Treason: And therefore I move you, that the Articles may be engrossed.

Mr. Paul Foley.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, we are not going about to declare any thing treason, but to offer our Articles, and leave it to the Lords; therefore most of their arguments would be more proper there: for we only impeach, they are to be the Judges, whether the matter be treason or no. It is true, or ought to be cautious what we do in it, because it is not proper that this House should impeach a man for treason, without having good grounds for it. But is not the Order about Printing a kind of an Act of State to serve instead of a Law? Is not the will of Grand-Jurors a very essential part of this Government? And is not the dissolving of them, as this Judge did, a way to render them useless? Are not his Warrants to seize Books and Papers arbitrary? And doth not all tend to the subversion of the Government? and what better grounds should we have for our proceedings? I think the Articles are well drawn, and ought to be engrossed as they are.

Sir Richard Temple.

Mr. Speaker, Sir, I cannot admit that Parliaments, by impeachments before the Lords, can make any thing treason, but only such matters as were treason by common law, before the Statute of Edward the Third. And, I think, we ought to be so cautious of our posterity, as not to press for such precedents, left you put into the hands of the Lords a power, for which we may have cause to repent hereafter, but never get back again: For the Lords do not use to part with those Powers they once get. There are precedents by which it appears, that the Lords have attempted to make declarative treasons also, without any impeachment from the Commons. Have a care how you give them encouragement to proceed therein, better keep to the other way of making no declarative treason but by Bill.

The Articles were read, and Question put:

Resolved, That the said Sir William Scroggs be impeached upon the said Articles; and that the said Articles be engrossed, and carried up to the Lords by my Lord Goodrich.

Ordered, That the Committee appointed to examine the proceedings of the Judges in Windsor-hall, and to prepare impeachments against Sir Francis North, Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas; Sir Thomas Jones, one of the Judges of the Court of King's Bench; and Sir Richard Wilmot, one of the Barons of the Court of Exchequer, do bring in such impeachments with all convenient speed.

After the Articles were brought into the House of Lords, the Lord Chief-Justice put in the following Answer; viz.

The Answer of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench, to the Articles of Impeachment exhibited against him by the Commons of England, in the late Parliament assembled.

"THE said Sir William Scroggs, by, and under protestation, that there is no manner of High-Treason, nor by any Over-Act of High-Treason, imputably alleged nor expressed in the said Articles of Impeachment, to which the said Sir William Scroggs, or is bound by Law to make any answer unto; and saving to himself, (and which he prayeth may be saved to him), both now and at all times hereafter, all, and all manner of benefit and advantage of exemption to the insufficiency of the said Articles, in point of Law, as well for that there is no overt-act of treason expressed therein, as for all other the defects therein appearing; for the Plea thereof be faith, That he is in no wise guilty of all or any the crimes, offences, or misdemeanours, of what nature, kind, or quality soever, by the said Articles of Impeachment charged upon him, in manner and form, as in and by the said Articles is expressed; which he is ready to aver and prove, as this honorable House shall award; and humbly beseecheth himself, and the justice of his cause, to this most honorable House: and prayeth to be discharged of the premises, and to be hence defended and acquitted of all the matters, crimes, misdemeanours, and offences, in and by the said Articles of Impeachment charged upon him, &c.

"W. SCROGGS."

After this, a Petition of Sir William Scroggs was read.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, in this present Parliament assembled, The humble Petition of Sir William Scroggs, Knt. Chief-Justice of his Majesty's Court of King's Bench; sheweth,

"THAT your Petitioner, the last Parliament, was impeached before your Lordships, by the House of Commons, of several Articles filled High-Treason, and other great Crimes and Misdemeanours.

"To which your Petitioner hath now, with the first opportunity, put in his answer to this honorable House.

"Your Petitioner humbly prays, that your Lordships would be pleased to appoint the House of Commons to reply, that in a convenient day may be appointed for the hearing of the Cause; that your Petitioner may no longer lie under the reproach of the word High-Treason.

"And your Petitioner, as is duty bound, shall ever pray, &c.

"W. SCROGGS."

Ordered, That the copy of this Answer and Petition shall be sent to the House of Commons.

But the Parliament being soon after prorogued, this affair was dropped. However, the Lord Chief-Justice was removed from his high Station, and allowed a pension for life.

XXXV. The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed by the Honourable House of Commons, to consider the Petition of Richard Thompson of Bristol, Clerk; and to examine Complaints against him. And the Resolution of the Commons in Parliament upon this Report, for his Impeachment of High Crimes and Misdemeanours; Friday, December 24, 1680. 32 Car. II.

The Report from the Committee of the Commons in Parliament, appointed to consider the Petition of Richard Thompson, and to examine Complaints against him.

As the Committee appointed to take into consideration the Petition of Richard Thompson, Clerk; and to examine the Complaints against him.

IN the first place, the Committee read unto the said Thompson, the heads of the Complaints against him; which (for the most part) he denying, desired to have his answers brought face to face: Whereupon the Committee proceeded to the examination of witnesses, to prove the said complaint.

The first Witness examined, saith, That there being a great noise and rumour, that Mr. Thompson had prepared a sermon to be preached on the thirtieth of January, 1679, the said witness went to the said Sermon, and did hear Mr. Thompson publicly declare, that the Presbyterians were such persons, as the very Devil blusht at them; and that the villain Hampden grudged, and made it more scruple of conscience, to give twenty shillings to the King, for supplying his necessities by Ship-money and Loan, which was his right by Law, than to raise Rebellion against him: And that the Presbyterians are worse (and far more intolerable) than either Priests or Jesuits.

The second saith, That hearing a great talk and noise of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompson, on the 30th of January, 1679, he was minded to hear the same, and accordingly did; as which he saw from notes among which, he saith, that Mr. Thompson openly preached, that the Devil blusht at the faith; and that the villain Hampden grudged more to give the King twenty shillings, which was his just due by Law (Ship-money and Loan), than to raise Rebellion against him; and that a Presbyterian Brother, qua tutor, was as great a Traitor by the Statute, as any Priest or Jesuit whatsoever.

That he heard, that Mr. Thompson said, that he hoped the Presbyterians would be pulled out of their houses, and the Gaoles filled with them; and will tell their houses burnt.

The third saith, That he was cited to the Bishop's Court, to receive the Sacrament last Easter, but being out of town at that time, did receive it at a place called Parl in Wiltshire; and that a month after he came home, was again cited to the said Court; and he did accordingly appear, and told the Court, that he hoped his absence and business might be accepted for a lawful excuse; upon which Mr. Thompson immediately said, that they would proceed to excommunicate him. Upon which, this Informant produced his certificate, of which the Chancellor approved, and said it was lawful. Whereupon Mr. Thompson said, that his receiving the Sacrament from any other Minister, than the Minister of the Parish wherein he dwelled, was damnation to his Soul; and that he would maintain this Doctrine.

The fourth saith, That being at Bristol-Fair, he heard a great talk and noise of a Sermon prepared, and designed to be preached by Mr. Thompson against the Presbyterians, on the 30th of January, 1679; and that very many referred to hear him: in which Sermon, the said Mr. Thompson declared and said, that there was a great talk of a plot: but (says he) a Presbyterian is the man; and further added, that the villain Hampden scrupled to give the King 200. upon Ship-money and Loan, which was due by Law, but did not scruple to raise Rebellion against him.

The fifth saith, That Mr. Thompson, in a Sermon preached the 30th of January, 1679, did say, that the Presbyterians did seem to our vile Mariage, and that Calvin was the first that preached the King killing Doctrine; and that after he had quoted Calvin often, said, if this be true then, a Presbyterian Brother, qua tutor, is as great a Traitor as any Priest or Jesuit; and that then he commended all the Proceedings of Parliament.

The sixth saith, That he the said Mr. Thompson, had uttered many scandalous words concerning the Act for laying in Wiltshire, affirming, that the makers of that Law were a company of old Priests and Fanatics, and that he would bring a School-boy should make a better Act than that, and convey it when he had done.

The seventh saith, That Mr. Thompson in a Sermon by him preached (while Petitions for the fitting of this Parliament were on foot) speaking of a feared Rebellion by the Dutch, who had framed a formidable Army, and came as far as Dorchester, to deliver a Petition forthwith; and that they seemed rather to commend than petition their Sovereign to grant; and comparing that Petition with the late Petition on foot, greatly inveighed against it, and scoffed much at it.

The eighth saith, That Mr. Thompson (when the Petition was on foot for the fitting of this Parliament) was at the Funeral Sermon of one Mr. Worship these words (pointing at the dead, say), that he was no Schismatical pettinging Rebel, and that by his indignations, the Grand-Jury of Bristol made a judgement of their delinquency against petitioning for the fitting of the Parliament; that the said Mr. Thompson had told him, that he was Governor to Mr. Norfolk, when he was beyond Sea; and said, that he had been very often (and above one hundred times) at Maid, in the great Church at Paris, and usually gave Half a Crown to get a place to hear a certain Doctor of that Church, and that he was like to be brow-beat over to that Religion; and that when he went beyond Sea, did not know but that he might be of that Religion before his return. That he is very conscientious, and frequently calls evil aspersions against several Divines at Bristol of great note, viz. Mr. Clerke, Mr. Stansfeld, Mr. Griffin, Mr. Palmer, and others, saying, that such as went to their Lectures were the brans of the Devil.

The ninth saith, That Mr. Thompson in his preaching inveighed bitterly against falsifying Petitions for fitting of this Parliament, saying, that it was the feed of Rebellion, and like to Forty-one; and that the Devil set them on work, and the Devil would pay them their wages; saying, that before he would set his hand to such Petitions, he would cut it off, you and cut them off.

The tenth saith, That about two years since, being in the Chancel of St. Thomas's Church in Bristol, where Queen Elizabeth's Effigies is, Mr. Thompson pointing his finger to it, said, that she was the worst of women, and a most lewd and infamous woman, upon which this Informant replied, he never heard any speak ill of her: thereupon Mr. Thompson said, he was no better than a Church-scurler, and that Mex. VIII. began it, and that the Smith's it.

The eleventh saith, That in the year, 1678, he waited on the Mayor to Church, and that Mr. Thompson, who was there, called at Mex. VIII. saying, he did more hurt in robbing the Abbey-lands, than he did good by the Reformation. That after dinner, Mr. Thompson comes to the Informant, and claps his hands on his shoulders, saying, Hah, boy, had Queen Elizabeth been living, you needed not to have been sword-bearer of Bristol. The said Reverend asked him Why? He replied, he loved such a lolly Rogue (so well) as he was; and he would have been very fit for her drudgery at Bristol.

The twelfth saith, That he heard a great noise of a Sermon to be preached by Mr. Thompson on the 30th of January, 1679, to the second part of the same Time; and that he was present at the same Sermon, in which Mr. Thompson said, there was a great noise of a Popish Plot, but, says he, here is nothing as it is but a Presbyterian Plot; for here they are going about to petition for the fitting of the Parliament, but the end of it will be to bring the King's head to the block, at they have done his father.

The thirteenth saith, That in January last, or thereabouts, there was a Petition going about for the fitting of this Parliament, when Mr. Thompson, in Redhill Church, in his Sermon said, it was a foolish and rebellious Petition, and rather than he would sign it, his hand should be cut off.

The fourteenth saith, The 8th day of April, he going to hear Mr. Thompson his discourse, speaking concerning the Measures in private; Mr. Thompson said, he would lead them out, and fill the Gaoles with them, and hoped to see their houses a-fire about their ears in a short time; and this he, the said Thompson, desired again and again.

The fifteenth saith, That about December, 1679, Mr. Thompson came to visit his mother, being sick; and discoursing of Religion, Thompson said, if he went as well furnished of other things, as he was of justification, auricular confession, penance, extreme unction, and such as he says, he would not have been so long separated from the Catholic Church. And further affirmed, that the Church of Rome was the true Catholic Church. He further endeavoured to prove extreme unction, and auricular confession, as well as he could, out of the Epistles. Further, he hath heard him say, the King was a person of a mean and soft temper, and could be led easily to any thing, but yet a Solomon in wits; but that the Duke of York was a Prince of a brave spirit, would be faithful to his Friends, and that it was our own fault that he was a Roman Catholic, as that we forced him to fly into France, where he embraced that Religion. About the same time, he the said Thompson said the Church would be militant; but greatly commended the decency of solemnizing the Mass in France; and that it was performed with much more reverence and devotion than any other Religion doth use. He further heard him say, in a Sermon, about the time of petitioning, he would rather cut off his hand than sign it, and had many bad expressions of it; that it was the feed of Rebellion, and his Forty and Forty-one. And further, the said Mr. Thompson, at one Swadford's shop-door in Bristol, speaking of Bell, said, that he was not to be believed, because Bell had fed his meaning Mr. Thompson, was at St. Over's, where Mr. Thompson said he was not; and that Bell was of a bad life, and in many Places, and not to be credited in anything he said. And that in another discourse he commended the Romish Clergy for their single life, and it himself to; and did at the same time vilify and rail at the English Clergy for marrying; saying, it was better for a Clergyman to be girt than to marry; and that the Colombians in France were idle men, and could scarce be two years a French without a wife. About the same time, after the Election of Sir John Knollys to this Parliament, Mr. Thompson said, he was not fit to be believed, and as bad as any Fanatic. He further said in the Pulpit at St. Thomas's, that after excommunication by the Bishop, without absolution from the Spiritual Court, such a one was surely damned; and he would pawn his soul for the truth of it.

Evidence added: Mr. Thompson, after the Evidence given by every particular Person, Face to Face, was asked to every one, if he had any question to say before they called another? Who answered, he should not say any thing at present. While the Witnesses before-mentioned were all examined, Mr. Thompson being desired to make his defence, and declare whether he were guilty of the matters laid to his charge, did for the greatest part contain words spoken to that effect; and in other things endeavoured to turn the words with more favour towards him.

proviso that the Statute of Monopolies should not extend to any Company for the ordering or managing of trade, tho' I think the words of the Statute did not reach this case, yet they were so careful, that they would have a proviso to last this and all other Companies. And, my Lord, there is a Statute, 2 Jac. cap. 6. by the preamble of which Statute it appears that the King had granted a Charter to divers Merchants to be a Company, and to have the sole trade into Spain and Portugal, excluding all others that were not members. The Statute recites the mischief of liberty to all the King's Subjects to trade there: I observe, the Parliament did not condemn the Charter to be unlawful, but took it to be good, and that no such liberty than an Act of Parliament could refuse the liberty of trade to the subjects against the Charter, for they do say, notwithstanding the Charter had given the sole right of trade to the Company, yet it should be lawful for all people to trade thence, notwithstanding that Charter. Now, my Lord, I do think that practice and usage is a great evidence of the Law: I shall show your Lordship some precedents of 14me Chartres, that have been granted to persons of a sole trade exclusive of others. 6 Ed. 2d. 25. Elton granted to Abraham Gifford and his associates the sole trade into China, prohibiting others. 6 Ed. 2d. 25. Elton there is a Patent to Richard Baskin to distribute new Countries that were hitherto and under Indulgence of a King of the Romans, there was a Patent to divers Tiering Merchants to have the sole trade to Turkey, excluding all others. 12 of Nov. 25th of the Queen, a Charter granted to the Turkey-Company. 5 July, 27th of the Queen, there was Letters Patents granted to certain Newcomen and Gentlemen to trade into Barbary, and that during twelve years more should trade there, but they, David Agnew and Alphon, 20. Eaz. a Patent made to the Merchants of Amster to have the sole trade to Rivers of in Guinea 14th of the Queen, another Patent to Gregory and Pape, to have the sole trade to Guinea. My Lord, all these I have now quoted, I have taken to be examined on the Rolls, and are to be found there. 2. Bowditch, 15th. there it was held by my Lord Coke, that no subject is able to trade in an Inhabited Country without licence of the King, for first of being persecuted from the Christian Religion; this my Lord Coke says, and he says he had seen an ancient precedent of a licence. Mors, 6. 5. Davis and Alston. Judice Doodridge (that I think was only then beginning) agrees against the Patent, but he did give that a Grant to a Company to have the sole trade with Indies is a good Grant, and the King by his prerogative might restrain his subjects from it: he admits a Patent for sole Printing was good; why, because the Publick was concerned. My Lord, the Parliament of late time have been so far from looking upon the East-India Company to be a Monopoly, that they have declared it to be for the good of the Kingdom, 14th of this King, chap. 24. in the preamble 'tis recited.

Now, my Lord, I have made good, that the King has this power by his Statute, by authority, and opinions of Lawyers, and also the judgment and the opinion of the Parliament; and that it was never condemned, and I conclude this first point. The second point, my Lord, at the next place, which I shall be very short upon, for that it will be consequential to what I have endeavored to prove here; that is, supposing it to be a good Grant, whether if any person do trade to the damage of the Company, 'tis a good ground for an action.

Now, I do think the Company have, and 'tis very plain they have an inheritance, and 'tis a franchise and liberty they could not have, unless they had the King's Grant, and others excluded from it, then it does agree with all the cases of this nature, whenever the King grants a franchise to one, and another person violates the franchise, the King's Prerogative may have an action of trespass, against the person that does offend or violate the franchise. 11 H. VI. 26. 14 H. VI. 24. supposing the King grant a man a Fair or Market, if any man sell on another Fair or Market, tho' with the licence of the King, yet he that has the Grant shall have an action. Now the East-India Company are to be at great charges, nay, there is a trust reposed in them, that they shall trade, and carry on this trade for the good of the Company, so that they are put upon a trade, and are obliged to carry it on. The Defendant hath no right; if they have a right, they shall have a remedy against any that invade it. And for these reasons

I pray your Judgment for the Plaintiffs.

Sir George Treby, afterwards Lord Chief-Justice, his Argument.

The Governor, and Company of Merchants of London, trading into the East-India, against Thomas Sandys. Trin. 35. Caroli Secundi Reg. Rot. 22b.

My Lord, I pray your Lordship,

I AM of Counsel in this case with Thomas Sandys, the Defendant. The Cause arises upon a Charter set forth by the Plaintiffs, and a Statute pleaded by us, and it is as Mr. Holt has opened it. Only I shall, for my part, open it a little more than he did.

It is a special action on the case, declarative, wherein the Plaintiffs declare, that King Charles II. our present King, by his Letters Patent, bearing date the 24th of April, in the 7th year of his Majesty, reciting that the Governor and Company of Merchants trading into the East-India, had been of long time a corporation, and enjoyed divers liberties, privileges, and immunities, by virtue of divers Letters Patents, and Charters, granted to them by Q. Elizabeth and King James; and the King being informed, that divers disorders and inconveniences were then lately committed, to the great prejudice of the said Company, and interruption of their trade. Whereupon they had humbly besought the King, to grant and confirm the said Charter, with some alterations and additions, tending to the advancement and benefit of their trade.

The King gives assent to these terms, that they shall be a corporation perpetual, to have succession and capacity, &c. And further, willed and granted, that they, and every one of them, or should be of the Company, and their heirs at their several ages of 21, and their apprentices, factors, and servants employed by them, might and should freely traffic, and use the trade of merchandise by sea, by each way and passages then found and discovered, as they should think fittest, into and from the East-India; and into and from the Islands, Parts, Havens, Cities, Creeks, Towns and Places of Asia, Africa, or America, or any of them, beyond the Cape of Good Hope, to the Straights of Aden, as by the Court of the Company shall from time to time be limited and agreed, without any molestation, impeachment or disturbance; any Statute, usage, diversity of religion or faith, or any other cause or matter whatsoever notwithstanding, to have the sole trade by sea, not by land, or by Indulgence, to any Country, Island, Port, Havens, City, Creek, Town, or Place, already in the lawful and actual possession of any such Christian Prince or State, as at this present is, or at any time hereafter shall be an league or amity with the King, his heirs or successors, and who doth not, or will not accept of such trade.

And further grants, That they and their successors, and their fellows, servants, and assignees, in the trade of merchandise for them, and in their behalf, shall for ever hereafter have, use, and enjoy, the whole, entire and only trade and traffick, and the whole, entire, and only liberty, use and privilege of trading and trafficking, and using the said trade and trade of merchandise, and to have the said East-India; and to and from all the Islands, Parts, Havens, Cities, Towns and Places therein.

And further grants, that them, that the said East-India, or the Islands, &c. shall not be void, impeached or haunted by any of his Subjects, during the time that these Letters Patents remain in force, contrary to the true meaning of the said Letters Patent, and the virtue of the prerogative Royal. Charging also and commanding, and prohibiting all other Subjects, that none of them sell, haue, frequent, or trade, traffick or adventure by way of merchandise more or less any part of the said East-India, &c. unless it be by and with the licence and agreement of the Company, in writing set forth and observed under the common seal.

Here Sir declarator makes a break, or stop, and so it would seem as if the restraint and prohibition were absolute and general; but upon your prayer of the Letters Patents, they being set forth in these words, it appears to be, for made, under the following proviso, viz. Upon pain that every such other person or persons, that shall trade to or from the East-India, shall incur the King's indignation, and forfeiture and loss of the goods, merchandise, and other things whatsoever, which he shall be brought in to this Realm of England, or any the dominions of the same. As also the Ship and Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein such goods, merchandise and other things, shall be brought or found, the one half of all the said forfeitures to be to the King, his heirs and successors; the other half to the Company. And further, all and every the said offenders, for the said contempt, to suffer imprisonment during the King's pleasure; and such other punishments as to the King, his heirs and successors, for so high a contempt, shall seem most and convenient, and not to be in any wise delayed, until they and every of them shall become bound to the Governor, in the sum of 1000. lib. at no time then to fail or traffick into any part of the said East-India, &c. And further grants, That the Company may grant and give licence under the common seal, to any persons to sail and traffick to the East-India; and that the King, his heirs and successors, will not, during the Letters Patents, give licence to any person to fail or trade there.

By virtue of which Letters Patents they allege they have been, and are a corporation; and have had, established and managed, and do still manage a great trade of merchandise to the said East-India, with the inhabitants there; who at the time of making the said Letters Patents, or since, were not Christians, nor subjects to any Christian Prince or State; but were, and are infidels and enemies of the Christian faith; and have spent and laid out many and great sums of money on that occasion.

And further say, that the commerce and trade thereof cannot be established, managed or carried on but by Incorporated Companies, by such a Corporation; and that they ought to have and enjoy the sole trade there, according to the form and effect of the said Letters Patents.

But the said Thomas Sandys being a subject of the King, and a member of the Company, not an alien, apprentice, factor, servant, or officer, sufficiently knowing the premises, and desiring to prejudice the Company, contrary to the form and effect of the said Letters Patents, after the making the same, and after the Company had settled their trade, on Jan. 25. 1600. did trade into the East-India, within the Parts, Regions, and Places above specified, beyond the prerogative of Good Hope, on that side the Straights of Mozambique, in certain Ports and Places, called Aden, Malabar, Malabar, and Porta Nova, with a certain Ship, called the Expeditio, without the licence, and against the will of the Governor and Company, and to the prejudice, impeachment, and manifest grievance, and against the form and effect of the said Letters Patents; to the damage of the plaintiffs 10000.

The Defendant prays Oyer of the Letters Patents; whereupon they are set forth in these words.

And thereupon the Defendant pleads the Statute, 13 Ed. III. Cap. 2. whereby 'tis enacted, That the Sea be open to all manner of Merchants, in pay unto their merchandise where it shall please them.

Upon this the Plaintiffs answer.

My Lord, I do not differ with Mr. Holt in the issue of the controversy, but make the same two points, viz. 1. Whether this Patent, as it purports an exclusion of all other Subjects from this trade, be good or void? 2. Whether here be an apt case brought?

In the first place, I shall not question but the Patent is good, to make these persons a corporation, and all the privileges and benefits they can derive from being a body corporate, they may enjoy, and apply them to trade if they will. Yet as to this particular, I shall observe thus much, that when such Charters of Incorporation were first taken notice of in Q. Elizabeth's and King James's times, they did not escape the censure of learned men, who foretold the ill use of them. Co. Mag. Off. 540. Three things which have far pretences are mischievous: 1. New Courts, 2. New Offices, 3. New Corporations trading into foreign Parts, or at home; which use for the furtherance of trade and government, an exclusion then to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies.

Deliberate says nothing of foreign trade; dies and affirms the Law of Monopoly, cap. 30.

Millicott's case is in 2d Brimble 296, and it is in these words: 1684. 7 Jacobi, in the Common Bench, upon a motion made for confirmation, upon a prohibition awarded, it was said by the Lord Chief, that no subject of the King may trade with any Infidel without licence of the King; and the reason of that is, he may relinquish the Catholic Faith and adhere to Infidelity. And he said, he had from a licence made in the time of Edw. III. where the King recited, that he having a special trust and confidence that his subjects will not decline from his Faith and Religion, licensed him as follows, and this did arise upon a recital of a licence, made to a Merchant to trade to the East-Indies.

For, To this tender authority I answer, If the Law had been according to this conceit, there would have been proceedings against persons that had traded to Granada, (of which the Affairs left the Dominions within these 200 years) to Barbary, to Turkey, and other Infidel places in Asia, Africa, or America; but we never heard or read of any till now.

Secondly, 'Tis an apocryphal case, that Book, called Brimble, is of little authority; it is printed without approbations of the Judges, or any legal persons.

And the conceit is of less authority, it is reported as ad idem aliter, upon a motion, a casual saying of the Judge; which the Cleric took, and likely misheard, for it is an ancient law in my Lord Coke's own Books, though they are very common. And the ground of his saying (if he did say) it is, that he had been a licencer in E. 6. III's time, but I cannot learn that it has been by any since. Neither Mr. Holt nor I can find it, nor does my Lord Coke tell us where it was; perhaps it was taken upon truth, and misheard, perhaps not authentic, and perhaps a sufficient answer to it would have been found in it, however, it was but one, and certainly, if the Law had required it, there would have been more than one licence from the beginning of our Records till that day.

Use His words, &c.

Thirdly, The reason there given makes strongly against this Charter, the reason is, lest men should decline from the Faith, to which it seems there is a special trust in the King, that he should suffer none to go into Infidel parts, but such as are orthodox, found and firm in Religion; each of whom the King is specially assured that they will not fall from the Faith, which is to be executed by the King only, and he is to grant licence to particular and known persons of whom he has this confidence, the King cannot grant his royal care to the Company.

But now this Charter would have this trust bestowed and transferred, for it contains a licence not only for the ten Members of the Company (who were twenty-two or twenty-three years ago), but their unknown successors, and to their true heirs, said to be begotten, and their Servants, Factors, Apprentices, &c. in perpetuum.

Mr. Holt also gives a reason for this trade being unlawful, namely, That the Law has judged Infidels to be perpetual enemies, for which he relies upon another singular saying of my Lord Coke in Calver's case, fol. 17. and returns two authorities cited there, namely, the Regis, 281. and 28 ff. VIII. 4.

And he takes notice that the children of Israel were persecuted from the true Religion by converse with the Nations round about them. And he cites Genesis de jure belli & pacis, lib. 2. cap. 25. par. 21. where he says, Convivens quod ex animo concordes contraxerunt adversam legem.

As to this singular opinion of Infidels being perpetual enemies, it is not easy to understand what my Lord Coke means by it, his words are these:

All Infidels are in Law perpetual enemies, for between them, as with the Devil, which subjects they are, and the Christian, there is perpetual hostility, and can be no peace; for as the Apostle says, 2d Corinthians 13. Inter agreement is interit of Christ with Belials, or what part has the Believer with the Infidel?

It is not by these words, that it is to be understood of a spiritual discord in respect of Religion, and not a temporal between the Nations: for he says, 'he because they are the Devil's subjects, and he relies upon the Texts of Scripture, and if this perpetual hostility be taken as a political and proper sense, and the Law be so, it destroys the licence and privilege of the Company, and their actions brought, and all possibility of such a thing for them. There is not nor can be any peace, treaty or intercourse between the English and the Infidels, but a constant never-ending state of war, and especially if it is founded upon a Divine Precept: for whatsoever peremptory the King may have, he cannot have a peremptory to dispute with the Canon of the Scripture.

But my Lord Coke himself does much clear this matter, Jur. Co. 155. where he says, that there may be peace and leagues of commerce with Infidels. All that the Regis & Calver's case, is that the Hostilities were admitted for defence contra Christi & Christianos in common; which is an expedition of the enemies of Religion, not of the State. In the book of Henry the VIII. he said indeed, that a prince outlawed, a Traitor, or a Pagan being seized, shall not have an action; it is true in case of an Out-law, or a Traitor, it may be pleaded in abatement; but not other Book says, nor can any man maintain that the Law is in case of a Pagan.

A Pagan, Turk, Jew, may maintain an action of debt or battery, or other personal wrongs; &c. were it otherwise, there could be no trading of the Jews here, nor of the Turks, the country whereof is implied and admitted in the Act of Navigation, 2d Charles II. cap. 18. paragraph 18.

By the like reason, there could be no trading with Infidels, where there ought to be an intercourse at all, for there is no Country where the Religion does not differ in some or other from the religion established in the Church of England.

And whatever be Elys of the Children of Israel, I think there may be some influence in the Old Testament of commerce with the Heathen, though I am not resolving such use of Divinity here, as nor is well furnished.

As to the citation out of Gratian, it is by way of caution only; but the whole drift of that chapter demonstrates, that commerce and leagues with Infidels are lawful, and he expresses that text of a Cur. which my Lord Coke borrows upon, to refer only to joining with them in idol-worship. And so there clearly the mind of that Author, he has sent a whole Book, intimated, Mare Liberum, to manifest the right and lawfulness of trade to the Indies; and he says, that God in nature appointed all people to resort to, and trade with others, for that he hath given several commodities to fence, which others stand in need of.

I must leave here to say, that this notion of Christians not to have commerce with Infidels is a conceit absurd, monstrous, phantastical and phantastical.

'Tis a kin to Dominion founder in Gratian.

The Indians have a right to trade free, and use them, and this is a right natural and human, which the Christian Faith does not alter.

I agree with Mr. Holt, that an Act of Parliament made against the Christian Religion is void; but I think a Charter against natural and civil right is as certainly void.

Mr. Holt further says, that public safety and policy are concerned in this trade, and therefore it should be reformable by the Common Law; and he cites Carver's case, fol. 270. where several Merchants were punished for buying and transporting great sums of money, because (the Book says) it was against the State-Policy and safety of the Kingdom; and so punishable, and not permitted by the Common Law; and Mr. Holt says, that trading with Infidels is in like manner against the State-Policy too.

Ans. That was in the Star-Chamber, and perhaps it was one of the errors for which that Court was dissolved, 2d Cor. 1. cap. 10. in which Act it is said, that the Judges of that Court had undertaken to punish where no Law did warrant.

If transporting of money had been prohibited by Common Law, the Statute of R. III. cap. 1. and 5 R. II. cap. 2. (as had been actually) before these Statutes every man might dispose of his own private money as he might think fit, and Carver's case the offence seems to have consisted in sending great quantities of money, and so it more fully appears in a contemporary report of the same case, in the fifth case added to Peppin, 149 and 250. where it is said, that as one shall be punished for ingrossing commodities, so another for great quantities of money, all other commodities being thereby ingrossed. And this point of Carver's case is a good authority against the privilege claimed by the Company, which in truth is nothing else but to entitle to themselves all the commodities of India, &c.

But if the Common Law would have all the treasure kept within the Realm, it does not follow that we must keep all other commodities, and have no trade at all; at least without special licence, I know no State-Policy or Law for that.

In the next place, Mr. Holt considers foreign trade, and says, the subjects have not a right to trade abroad, or ad extra.

Ans. This is against the former argument and the ground of the Plaintiff's declaration, for that was, there should be no trade to these places, for a special cause, (viz.) because they were Infidels; but this argument imports, that these ought not to be said to be at all abroad, so not with Christian countries, without the King's licence.

The reason which he would support this argument is, because trade depends upon treaties, and upon the accidents of peace and war, which the King has the power of.

But this shows the former argument, for Infidels he says are perpetual enemies, and if so, there is no place nor treaty with them, and therefore no trade to be (as not by the Company) with them.

Besides, allowing there may be peace and treaties with them, I cannot see how this consideration can conduce to the present question; for it cannot be pretended, that the King must league with Indian Princes, that one part of his subjects should trade thither, and the rest should not, or that the King is or can be in amity with them, as to one part of his subjects (namely the Company), and in enmity with them, as to the other of his subjects.

The King has, and it is to preserve, the highways, but it is to keep them for the passage of himself and his people; not so that them up against any of his people at least, except as a case of war.

He cites the Statute 12 W. III. cap. 6. where the Merchants-Adventurers say, they had commerce with Spain and Portugal, and other places in leagues and amity with the King.

No doubt they had, and beyond this it truly said in the same Statute, that of right they ought to have it, which shows that it was not by the King's grant or licence. And in like manner the Defendant of right ought to have trade with the Indians, there being no war betwixt this Realm and them.

He cites out of Roll's Abridgment, 2 Pars. 212. a note of Rot. Parl. a H. V. an. 22. where the Commons say that all Merchants may export and import to and from any place, any goods at their pleasure, pay no the customs and other dues, any proclamation notwithstanding; the King answers, that he will be served by his Council.

And Mr. Holt takes this to be an acknowledgment by them of the illegality of the Proclamation.

Ans. It is not so, for it was the custom then, to propose and pass declaratory and confirming (as well as other) Laws, by way of Petitions to the King; and though they thought the proclamation illegal, yet it was more proper for them to endeavour to obtain redress by prayer than contest. But their Petition was a Petition of Right, and the Proclamation (especially if there was no war a-foot) was void, being a void the Common and Statute Law. And to cite and to say such a Proclamation, is to sit up presence to the Law; and yet I take it there was an extraordinary occasion at that time, Hen. V. having occasion to lay an embargo on his ships, in order to his proceeding to his great war in France.

He says that foreign trade may be mischievous, it may be a nuisance, for the importing of French cattle and French goods have been declared to be by the Parliament, and the King may restrain such evils.

Ans. The Acts of Parliament were making, and they enact it shall be adjudged a common nuisance. They did not find and declare it to have been one before.

If it had been so, there had been no need of these Acts, and we know the reason of that clause was to make the matter dispensed with.

If the importing East-India commodities be a nuisance, it is not licentious, and the Company cannot maintain their trade, much less their action; unless it should be thought that the bringing in or taking commodities by the Defendant is a nuisance, but the bringing in the same by the Plaintiff is not.

He infers this with a reason, that there may benefit result from the abundance of the importation exceeding our exportation, and resembling to what is laid on Rep. 12. And by the Common Law the King ought to save and defend his Realm as well against the Sea as against enemies; that it should not be drowned nor wasted, and as the King may prevent inundation of waters, so he may as to trade.

Alfo. This is a frivolous in words, but not as to the nature of things, and if there be any force in it, it is against the Plaintiff, for therein not in their Charter any limitation, the Company may bring in as much as they will, only, it seems by their allegation, that this trade is to be managed most largely by means of the Company, and therefore tends to the danger of the State.

Mr. Holt makes it a great argument to maintain the Charter, that it is a necessary regulation of the trade, and that the trade could not have been settled but by such a Company; and says, if it should be laid open, it would ruin the trade both of the Company and the Defendant.

And it is asserted in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed, but by lawful Corporate Corporation.

Alfo. This contradicts Michelin's case, for that was upon a licence granted to a single Merchant to trade to the East-India and it is known that this trade has been managed by persons previous before, and since there was a Company.

And this is to fix up convenience or pretence of convenience against the Statute, which we have pleaded, says, that all trade shall be open; the Plaintiff says, it shall be open to them only, because they can manage it best.

If other men should find that they could manage it better, the pretence were as fast for them to exclude the Company from the trade.

But I except against this argument, it is a frivolous and impossible argument, no issue can be taken upon it, unless issue should be taken upon a similitude, (viz) by lawful Corporate Corporation.

If a licence were granted (as it is laid to be in Michelin's case) to one man to trade to the East-India, and he should bring such an action, and aver that the trade could not be managed but by such an one as he, it would not be good, and yet as good as this is. In an action for words, it is not allowable to allege that the Defendant spoke such words, or say such words.

Moreover, the declaration, as it is penned, contradicts itself, for it says, that the trade could not be managed but by the Company, and yet charges the Defendant that he did manage a trade there; which is not possible, and it is penal enough upon the Defendant that he attempts to manage trade where he cannot.

Mr. Holt objects, that the Statute we plead, ought not to be taken universally, that the Sea shall be open to all Merchants; for then it would extend to give liberty of trade to the King's enemies who are Merchants.

Alfo. True it is, neither this, nor any such Law extends further than to Alien Armies and Subjects, there are pure belli, as well as pure pacis and it is understood, that countries who are foreigners may be taken and proceeded against according to Martial Law; but the Defendant is a subject, and cannot be as enemy.

He says further, that this Statute should not extend to this trade, because that in Edw. III's time, when it was made, trade was driven with Christians only, and not with Infidels.

It is this he, it defrays the only authority he has (viz) Michelin's case, where the only ground of the opinion is, that there was a licence granted to trade with Infidels, in the time of the said Ed. III.

But this Statute must be taken as it is penned, universally, and not confined to those countries, places and persons which were then used; the Statute does not distinguish, Et ubi lex non distinguit, nec auctoritas, otherwise no man must trade, but to those few places that he can pass were traded to before, 18 Ed. III.

He says (as g. v. h. 35.) that the King may refrain men, by Non Est Respon. from going beyond Sea; and cites Devin, g. h. that one reason of the King's being intitled by prescription to the great custom, was for his leave to Merchants to go and carry goods out of the Realm.

Alfo. It is true, that Book of Devin does say so, but he cites to prove the opinion, Devin, 163. And the Statute, 18 Ed. III. which we have pleaded; is that that Book is of no further use, than the assertion upon which it is founded do warrant; which if we examine, we shall find that in Dor it is, among other things, trade a power, in a case referred to the Judges concerning a new imposition set by Queen Mary on Merchandise, whether by Common Law Merchants were, or might be restrained from going out of the Kingdom, without leave of the King or Queen; to which the Judges give no refusal: which shows, they thought the Law was, that there was no such restraint or need of leave, for when Judges give no refusal, in the case of the King, it is a sign that at that opinion the Law is against him; and for the Statute, 18 Ed. III. which we plead, is against him.

N. N. B. 3. g. v. h. is a statute, that by Common Law, every subject may go out of the Kingdom for Merchandise, or Travel, or other causes he pleases, without leave, F. Co. M. Co. 180.

g. v. h. 36. A Refrain people putting out, but it extends Merchants, and even that Statute is repealed, 4 Jack. cap. 1. 'tis clear that the King may refrain his subjects from going out of the Realm, by his Writ of Non Est Respon. But that Writ was originally for the Clergy only, and a properly granted for manner of State only; and the words of it are, Quoniam plures sunt de Clerico Angli prelati et alii quodam prelati. Of force indeed it has been extended to continue a prelati to abide the Justice of a Court here, but that is no further. It is always to restrain a man from something unlawful, and against the duty of a subject, never to restrain from a lawful Act, to trade.

Neither is it general or universal, but always particular, and granted upon oath, made concerning a particular person; and since there needs such a special Writ to restrain an obnoxious person, it proves the Law to be, that all other persons are at liberty to go.

And there was no Non Est Respon. against the Defendant, nor cause for any; and if there had been, and he had gone against it, though it was an offence to the King, it would not give cause of action to the Plaintiff.

He cites Co. L. 1. g. v. h. That no subject can build a castle or a fortress without the King's licence, and it Rich. 2. v. Co. Magna Charta 109. that no man can put a prison without the King's licence, and 11 H. VII. 13. that the King may licence, where it sits kill another, it is no felony.

Alfo. These influences are in our case; a man may go build castles without the King's licence, any more than raise towns, or dig private havens, which are jure regis, and the King's grace; a man, but take away the lives of the King's subjects; but there is no private reason, that a man should not sit an innocent trade.

It is more suitable thereto, to suppose, that a man may without licence build a house, or erect a bridge, and include a garden or field, and thereby prefer the life of himself and his family.

In the next place, Mr. Holt says, there's a great deal of difference between trading in a Company, and trading out of a Company; that this Charter is good because it gives the trade to a Company, and being a Company, and Christians, they will take care that their Agents and Factors keep up to the Christian Religion; but other people will converse only with Infidels, and cannot have Divine Offices.

Alfo. It is not required by the Charter, that the Members taken into the Company, should be Christians, and their sons, friends, and others may be so Christians, not as they bound to his Divine Offices. And the Defendant and others are themselves Christians, and may have Divine Offices as well as they; and in this trade, the Defendant and others will converse with the same persons, as the Company and their Agents will; or, as it is, then it is no interfering, so cause of complaint.

He observes out of the Journal of the House of Commons, 14 Ed. 3. that the House of Commons laid vigorously upon Monopolies, and then, was brought in a catalogue of them, but there is nothing of the East-India trade, that there was such a Charter then in being.

Alfo. I know not whether there was such a Charter then in being; but if there were, possibly it was not taken notice of, or possibly its grievance then appeared from it, and likely that Company was better advised, than to misadvise to restrain others from trade.

Further, I have heard a Vote of the House of Commons cited sometimes, but never knew the date of the House of Commons cited for authority before; doubtless in that Parliament, as in other, the Members complained of those grievances, which then affected the Boroughs and Places they served for; they undertake not to commend all the Monopolies, that were or might be, and it is most modest, in order to obtain redress, to limit their complaints to the present occasion.

Mr. Holt mentions three Statutes, 3 Hen. 6. cap. 6. three having been a Charter obtained by some Merchants for sole to the Dominions of Spain and Portugal. It is answered, that it shall only be lawful, for all subjects to trade thither, notwithstanding that Charter of any other; and therefore he says, that the Parliament takes the Charter to be good, and therefore not to it the trade shall be laid open.

Alfo. There is no ground for this instance.

Edw. 3. It seems a strain to bend the Plaintiff's own former plea, that it related to a trade to Spain or Portugal, which are Christian Countries.

Secondly. The preamble of the Act 15th relates enough to deny the Patent at Common Law, (viz) that all subjects ought to enjoy equally the benefit of peace and free trade; that whereas the subjects of England would be in a worse condition than that of Scotland and Ireland, that it was intended with the improving of Merchants, Manufacturers and Manufacturers, lessening the price of their commodities, and increasing foreign, &c.

Thirdly. The Act calls it a common trade, and does not only say it shall be lawful, but that there shall be free liberty to trade there, in such sort and manner as is accustomed; that the Act did not make the Charter illegal, but found it so, as being an innovation against what is used and ought to be.

Alfo he mentions the Statute of Monopolies, at Jack. cap. 3. where in he observes, there is a proviso to give the Companies or Societies of Merchants. And the Statute 14 Carol II. cap. 25. which in the preamble declares the putting in or Stock into the East-India Company to be for public good.

Alfo. That last Statute indeed in the preamble says, it is for public good, but it is the public good of the Company; and the time presently says, that diverse Noblemen, Gentlemen, and other persons of quality, have by trade or merchandise, had put in Stock there; and enacts, that they shall not as that respect be taken, that the Statute is to be a Commission of Bankrupts; whosoever I might observe, that this Company is not to be reckoned a Company of Merchants, and therefore not within the proviso, at Jack. above-mentioned.

But I give this further answer concerning that proviso: the words of it are, Provided also, and it is hereby further intended, that declared and considered, that this Act, or any thing therein contained, shall not in any wise extend, or be prejudicial to the City of London, &c. or to any Companies, or Societies of Merchants within this Realm, except for the maintenance, enlargement or settling of any trade, or merchandise, but that the time, and their liberties, privileges, powers and immunities shall be, and some of the force and effect of which, as they were before the making of this Act, and of more effect; any thing before in this Act to the contrary in any wise notwithstanding.

Now gives this a but a general saving, and supposing, as Mr. Holt does, that there was such an East-India Company then in being, if the Statute had had as favourable an opinion of their Charter, as they had of Monopolies or Manufactory, or the other clause mentioned, they would have loved it by particular mention, as they did those, which would have been more convenient to such a Charter.

Secondly. Admitting it loved generally or particularly by the proviso, that does not make it better, the proviso only says, it shall continue as good force and effect, as it was before of the making of the Act, and none other; if notwithstanding the body of the Act, it was a Monopoly and void before, it shall remain so; and if it were good before, it shall remain so, notwithstanding the proviso.

If it is asked, in what purpose the proviso was made, it is answered clearly that, the Statute giving an additional penalty of treble damages and double costs against any person, that should, after forty days, after the end of that Session of Parliament, hinder, grieve, disturb or disquiet any person, or any ways seize, attach, distress, take, carry away or detain his goods, by licence or pretence of any Monopoly, or of any such Commission, Grant, Licence, Power, Faculty, Letters Patents, &c.

Now the proviso appointed that nothing in the Act shall extend to any Society or Company of Merchants; it does profess that their hinder, grieve, disturb or disquietment; by seizure or pretence of such a society or Company from that penalty; so that the Plaintiff have this advantage own the prohibition or restraint, and stop there, as if the prohibition were absolute and general; whereas it is sub modo, under a special penalty of forfeiture.

And this appears upon Oyer, and therefore for this variance, judgment ought to be for the Defendant, if there were nothing else in the case.

But waving this concerning the form of the Suit, I insist upon the main matter.

There is a natural necessity that every man that will live must eat, and thence a necessity and obligation to labour; and there is a property in this means of livelihood as well as in life.

The King's power and prerogative is to establish and preserve this to all his Subjects.

Trade is one of the honestest and justest sorts of industry, and is more especially proper for an Island.

The King cannot prohibit merchandise, nor lay a penny imposition upon it; therefore our Kings have received tithes and payment from the Grocers of Parliament: whereas if they had such a power (as the Plaintiffs Counsel speak of) over all trade, they might by the means of that, have made an unsearchable rule to fish a revenue, without the consent of the Lords and Commons.

Restraint of trade (though but for a time or place) is one of the great things which has been always referred to, and exercised by authority of Parliament, as we find almost in every Session.

This which is now before your Lordship, is the greatest Monopoly that has been attempted. It monopolizes Africa, Asia, and America, it holds on the South; it devours above half the trade of the Nation, the trade of Linens from Holland, Flanders, and Heland; Silks from Italy and Turkey, and when the prohibition exports, from France; and affects our Manufactures at home, upon all which the livelihood of many thousands depends.

It is against the Common Law and many express Statutes.

No man was ever punished, at any Court, for using foreign trade; no, not in the Sier-Clanier, which extends the prerogative much. It is Case pro me in premissis, although there has been occasion to have had precedents, if any such accident could have lain.

But as this is the first that has been brought, I shall presume to be receptive that just discouragement from your Lordships, that it will be the last.

And

I pray your Judgment for the Defendant.

Mr. Solicitor-General Finch (afterwards Earl of Nottingham) his Argument.

De Tera. Pasch. Ann. Regni Rici Caroli Secundi XXXVI. Die Sabbati xix Aprilis, Anno Dom. 1684. Bona Regni.

'Tis the Eng-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

MR. Justice WILKINS. Mr. Solicitor-General, do you argue that case to-day?

Mr. Solicitor-General. Yes, Sir.

Mr. Justice WILKINS. Mr. Paley, do you argue on the other side?

Mr. Paley. I do, Sir.

Mr. Justice WILKINS. Then, Gentlemen, let him come down to the Bar.

Mr. Solicitor-General. My Lord, this is an Action upon the case, brought by the Eng-India Company against Sandys; wherein they do set forth that the King, reserving former Letters Patents granted to this Company to incorporate it, did grant a Charter to such particular men, and made them a Corporation by the name of the Governor, &c. and did grant to them the sole trade in all the parts upon the Coasts of Africa, Asia, and America, in the Case of Good-Hope to the People of Madagascar. And further, that he did likewise grant to this Company and successors the sole trade; and granted likewise to them, that no other of the King's subjects should trade within those limits, and did expressly prohibit his subjects, to trade thither, nor being of the Company without a licence from them. Then they say, that Mr. Sandys, being one of the King's subjects, did take upon him to trade within the limits of those Letters Patents, to wit, at Madagascar, not having a licence from their Company, or any other authority to do it. And thus they lay to their damage of 1000*l*.

Mr. Sandys to this, after he prayed Oyer of the Letters Patents, which are set forth in two orders, pleads the Statute of 18 E. III. which says, that the Sea shall be open, and all Merchants shall go with their merchandise, where they please. To this Plea we have demurred.

Upon this Record, the Questions will be these two:

First, Whether the said Patent to the Eng-India Company, which prohibition to all others to trade within their limits, therein set forth, be a good Patent? The next is,

Secondly, Whether, admitting it to be a good Patent, this action will lie; that is, whether it be a bare licence to the Company, or whether it pass such an Interest to the Company with that licence, as will entitle them to an action against any that shall intrude or encroach upon their trade?

First, My Lord, I am to prove that this Grant is good, and here these considerations will fall in.

First, Whether the King had power at Common Law to have made such a Grant?

Secondly, Whether that power be in any ways abridged by any Act of Parliament, as it is much insisted upon by the other side?

First, My Lord, that the King had such a power at Common Law, I conceive is plain, for these reasons:

First, Because no subject at the Common Law had a right to trade with Infidels, no nor to go thither, without licence from the King first had and obtained.

Secondly, No such trade can be established without precedent treaties, and no such treaties can be made by subjects, without licence from the King to make them. If therefore this Patent does not contain any natural liberty or right that the subject had, but is introduction of a new one, they had not before; it will not fall out to be within the definition of a Monopoly, in which it is one essential part that it takes people from that liberty they had before.

Now that no subject had a right at Common Law to trade with Infidels, or go into an Infidel Country, without licence from the King, will be evident thus. And,

First, It will be very considerable, before we enter upon that Question, particularly, to see how all right in general to trade stands circumstantiated; and there it is plain.

First, That there is no trade, but what depends upon the good-will and pleasure of the foreign Prince with whom it is, whether he will admit or no; that is pretty clear.

Secondly, This may be restrained by a total prohibition of any commerce with that Prince or Nation, by the King here.

Thirdly, Tho' every man now, and Merchants always were at liberty to go abroad without licence, yet the King may restrain any man by the Writ Nulla Regum, from going out of the Kingdom; and that without showing any particular cruel way, or alleging any manner that is unreasonable and suitable with the King. And,

Fourthly and Lastly, If any foreign Prince, upon concluding any league or treaty with the King, should restrain trade to any number of persons, or any particular qualification of manner of proceeding in it; I do not know any man can pretend to a right, to act contrary to that, in breach of such a league or treaty made with the King by such a foreign Prince.

Then we lay further, by the Statute of 3 and 4 Jack, which opens the trade to Spain and Portugal, that does show plainly that that trade was before inclosed; and it does not show that the inclosure of it was illegal, but gives a right that was restrained before; and yet I am far from affirming that the subject has no right to trade, tho' it has been objected that this elaps in, and makes it as none; and therefore, they held it absolutely necessary to establish that power and prerogative, which the Law, for the public good, does reserve in the King, and that upon reasons that will not hold, nor are to be urged in decency: for I take it, the possibility of the abuse of power, is no objection against that power. For by this argument, tho' the King has a power and prerogative by Law to restrain subjects from going beyond Sea, by a Nulla Regum, so, by law, he cannot; for those he may restrain all his subjects from going out of the Kingdom, and so imprison and hinder every one from going out of the Nation. It is the same argument with this, that they urge the King claims a prerogative to restrain such trade upon occasion; they say this argument cannot hold, for by this rule he may restrain all commerce and trade whatsoever; to that end way of arguing does strike at all power, and I need give no other reason for it, for there can be no power at all, which is not accompanied with some trust; and there is no trust, but it possibly (mocking speaking) may be broken. So that this is no argument against the right of the subject to trade on the one side, nor against the prerogative of the King on the other, in whom the Law has reserved a trust to regulate and qualify trade.

But, My Lord, in this case the question is not of so large an extent, nor so general as this: not only here it is a question, how that right stands with respect to Infidels, and that is the question before your Lordship.

And I cannot but observe, in my entrance into the question, that unless the Law had once been held clear in this matter, this could not have come to be any subject of debate now, for no such trade as this, could ever have been granted to the Nation, for none could have ventured upon to hazard an enterprise, or to chargeable a project as this was, if it had not been any doubt whether those that ran no such adventure should be admitted to carry the first fruits of it.

So that this question, as it tends to overthrow this trade, if the Law be taken to be as they would have it, so it overthrowes the Turkey trade too, which stands upon the same foundation, with respect to the prohibition by Letters Patents as this does: for the question is not, upon how early terms the privileges are to be obtained, as it is contended the terms are easier in the Turkey Company, than in the Eng-India Company; but whether any terms at all are requisite; so any terms can be imposed upon it, then this case is all in one, when that will overthrow the Turkey trade, and all the trade of the Nation. And surely if they can prevail in this question, the subjects, for whose right they pretend to march to stand up, will have little cause to thank them for standing up for a right, as they call it, against the very Interest of the Nation. But to return to our argument:

The subject can have no such right to trade with Infidels without licence from the King; for they are looked upon as enemies, not only in a spiritual sense, as they are of a contrary Faith and Religion, but they are in treated in Law; and the religiousness of the Law are such as we may see in Calvin's case, and the 12 H. VIII. which is a Book they cited, and was quoted here before, upon the first argument of this case; where it is held, that a Pagan, tho' he be known, cannot have or maintain any action at law, because he is perpetuus inimicus: for an Alien Enemy can neither maintain a real or personal Action, as it is said in the 15th 15th 129. B. 4. as a Jewess, though here before, and marrying a converted Jew, shall not be endowed; and so in the same Book 32. so that they are look'd upon no more than common Aliens; for we see that tho' they are born here, yet they have not the capacities as much as of Denizens, for they shall not be endowed, as Denizens may. And tho' my Lord Cok, by the way, says, in that Book, no Alien can be endowed; yet I find in the Parliament Rolls a Petition of the Common, it is in 14 E. V. m. 16. they pray that Female Aliens may be endowed, and the King's answer is, Let it be as is intended. But I mention that only by the bye, for it is not at all relating to our question, but for that the other relation goes to it, as I have said, it is always to be considered as an Enemy.

But, My Lord, further, that all Infidels be likewise Aliens and Enemies, in respect of their properties which they gain here; it is to be gathered from what I find in Rot. Juian 50 H. III. m. 9. the King releases a debt, that was owing to a Jew, and in the same Roll, 49 H. III. Rot. Juian, there are divers pardons of debts owing to Jews, Lene in recompence for service done, and others in expiation of the pecc, that they had drawn in to be engaged for great sums to them.

Rot. Parl. 13 E. I. m. 4. A Jew died, and the King granted away his goods, and his Widow received them for 1000*l*. and the King granted to the Jewess, that he would not discharge any debts, that were owing to her. This shows their properties were all at the King's mercy; and hereafter the King grants licence to them, and gave them leave to assign their debts, Rot. Parl. 3 E. I. m. 6. which recites that it was granted by King H. III. that no Jew should sell his goods without licence. The King grants a licence to Jude Nighe to sell a debt of 20*l*. that was owing him from the Bishop of Bath and Wells; and dissolved the reason of that Law in Hen. III's time, was, that the King might prevent any mischief, that might follow upon an unlicensed commerce between his Subjects and their Infidels: and that appears plainly by considering, that by the ancient Law of the Land, so few could inhabit where within the Kingdom, but where by custom they were permitted to dwell; and so in Rot. Clauf. i. E. 1. m. 7. in duple, they had gone and inhabited at Winchester; but they were removed thence, and the Record tells you the reason why, devoid, &c.

Bishop

They had particular Justices assigned over to them, to determine their causes, and that you see Rot. Clauf. 49 H. III. m. 4. the King constitutes two Justices at Cyrtel, Ydsarven, and gives them power to determine their Pleas in the place, where they were accustomed to inhabit.

And there is in R. v. Parl. 13 E. 1. m. 7. a very remarkable Record to this purpose, Res Adito, &c.

My Lord, I had another Record like this in the Patent-Rolls of that year, for we for what cause the Law took, that Christians should not be circumvented by the Jews; and the Government had an eye upon them, that they should not have commerce one with another; that recognitions should be entered in the presence of Christians. That Record is thus, Res adito, &c.

We see for a man, that deals with a Jew, and buys things of him without Licence, and the King grants that he would not trouble him, or proceed against him by Law for that offence.

By the ancient Law it appears, that if a Christian married to a Jew, it was felony, and the party offending was to be burnt; so in the 3d Edw. 1. fo. 10. and there is my Lord Coke cites Plow for his authority in it.

From all this it appears, that Infidels have no right to trade and traffic here, and surely there no Subject has a right to trade with them in their country; for the restraint certainly must be mutual. And, my Lord, for this, I must remember you of a case that has been cited in this case, and that is Michell v. the King in Edw. III's time, where my Lord Coke declares the Law to be that we say, and that he hath seen a Licence in Edw. III's time; and that he says was for the safety of Religion.

And surely, my Lord, it is upon some such grounds as this, that the Law provides that no excommunicate person shall bring an action, no not in astrud, because no person must converse with them; therefore, they cannot sue, or be sued by any person. Then if the Law be cautious for the safety of Religion, as to restrain converse in our country; I foresee it may restrain the Subjects liberty of trading in an Infidel country, where they must be under the Laws of the place; and the inconveniences in the one case are sure much greater than in the other.

For we see in Colin's case, if the King conquers an Infidel country, their Laws actually cease till the King gives them new ones. But 'tis otherwise of a Christian country, for there the Laws remain till the King is pleased to alter them.

Another reason, my Lord, is this, the King's prerogative in making leagues and truces, is sure as large and unlimited as the Subjects right to trade; and yet in the case of Infidels that is restrained, as to some sort of leagues that a Christian Prince cannot make with them, &c. For that you may see in the 4th Edw. 1. 155. where my Lord Coke says that the Law of England is so, that the King can't make Feder made amici et admi, with an Infidel Prince. And there he reckons up four sorts of leagues, three of which he says may be had with Infidels, that is, Feder Pacis, Feder Co-operativitatis, & Feder Commercii; but Feder mutui Amicitie, he says, by Law is not allowable; and hence these leagues are grounded upon the Law of God.

Therefore, my Lord, the Law surely does not give the Subject an unlimited freedom to trade, but it must depend upon such cautions and security, as nothing has such leagues can provide for; which leagues I am sure none but the King is capable of making.

This then, one would think, were enough to clear our Patent from that objection, that 'tis a Monopoly. But there are no other things, that make it yet more evident it is not so. As first, in all the complaints that have been made of Monopolies, that Patent was never counted to be one among them, nor thought to be illegal; if it ever had been thought so, the Statute of 21 Jac. 1. cap. 3. which is a Statute made for regulating of trade, would never have been made.

In the next place, I say either the first Patent for this trade was a Monopoly, or this is none: the first was none, not only for the reasons I gave before, but because it was a new trade. Patents for new Inventions are not made good by the Statute of 21 of King James, but left as they were before, only they are restrained to a number of years, and were always good, because they were for the encouragement of trade, and of useful inventions to increase them.

As for the second in this case, what is of much greater consequence to the Nation is a point of trade, than any little slight increase of a revenue to the Nation is; must be allowed to be good; then I say, sure if the first Patent be not a Monopoly, then neither is this Patent a Monopoly; for there is no Law that hath declared how long such a trade as this may be inclosed, as the Statute of 21 of King James sets limits for, as new Inventions.

And again, this Company is for the advantage and benefit of the Nation, which a Monopoly can never be; and that it is for the benefit of the Nation, appears by the Statute of the 13th of King Hen. 8. cap. 34. which recites it to be of great advantage to the Publick, and for the encouragement of the Publick Trade and Navigation. Here then, my Lord, is both the Judgment of the Parliament concerning Companies of this kind, and an encouragement of this particular Company by the whole Parliament.

And again, they are taken notice of in another Statute, made in the 20th of this King, ch. 6. where they are taxed 20s. for every 1000 l. capital Stock in the Company.

Another reason in this, because of the absolute necessity of a Company to manage this trade, not only in respect of the Indians themselves, but also in respect of other foreign Nations, who are rivals to us in this trade, and are ready to take all advantages against us about it. But this part of the Case is much more fit to be discussed by Merchants and Statesmen, than Lawyers.

Yet thus far the Law falls in to consider this matter, as they are a Corporation under Statutes and leagues with other Countries for the corrying on of their trade; and so are in the nature almost of foreign Plantations, under a regulated and Christian Government among themselves, whereby these merchants are prevented, that would have fallen upon an unlimited and unregulated trade with Infidels, that are enemies to our Religion and Nation; which the Law, as I have already shewn, takes so much care to prevent.

For other considerations, whether this trade be driven to the full extent of it, or may be more advantageous to be enlarged, as it is proper here to be discussed in a Court of Law, to the Application for that must be made elsewhere; for I do not know any Law that hath made the Defendant a Reformer among us.

My Lord, in the next place, the next question is, whether this prerogative of the King is abridged, or restrained by any Act of Parliament, as is insisted on by the Defendant's Counsel; I think not. For,

First, In general, the chief trade of this Nation consisted anciently mostly in Wool, Wool-Fell and Leather, and with our neighbouring Nations only, and yet,

Secondly, Even that trade was restrained in the exercise of it; for some men buy and sell, but he must do it at the Staple, as appears by a 2d Ed. III. chap. 4. that obliges the people, and afterwards it was enacted again. And then in the Third place, there was no such trade as this or any other ever established with Infidels in those days, and so there was no occasion for such a Law to restrain them.

The best rule therefore to interpret this Act of Parliament, will be to apply it remedy to the inconvenience and mischief that was before it. If then there was no such inconvenience as the complaint of the restriction of the trade with Infidels; then all may easily conclude and infer upon it, there was no such remedy as the laying open of a trade, as they alleged, intended to be introduced. But if we consider the Act itself, we shall see some particular reason for the making of it, rather for the taking off some clogges, that were upon the trade then in use, or the providing some remedies which were introduced to obviate the poeple's inconveniences and mischiefs.

First then, for Mogea Charta, which hath been cited chap. 30. that gives liberty to Merchants, Quod nisi publici antea prohibiti fuerint, habeant liberos & forem conditione civitatis Anglie; it is in Anglie, & it is in Anglie & it is in Anglie, non per terram quam per equos, ad omnem finem; it is in Anglie, non per terram quam per equos, ad omnem finem; it is in Anglie, non per terram quam per equos, ad omnem finem.

This helps Merchant-Strangers in this particular, because before that they could come but at four times in the year, and now they have forty days at a time; as my Lord Coke observes in his Comment upon that Statute, and cites the Statute of Taylor for it. And if the Law gives any thing relating to this question, it is, that before that Act, Merchants could not go out of the Kingdom, and shall they may be prohibited publicly; which, tho' my Lord Coke says must be by Act of Parliament, yet he cites no Law for this opinion; and with submission, no word Publick doth not necessarily import that it should be by Act of Parliament. My Lord, that Law that comes nearest in words to this case here-into you, is that of a E. III. which is pleaded by the Defendant, that is part of the Act, the latter clause of it, that the Sea be open to all manner of Merchants, to pass with their merchandise whither they please.

This is part of that Law; but, my Lord, the meaning of this Law is quite and clear another thing, as I shall shew with submission most plainly; and I will beg leave, my Lord, a little to introduce it, by giving you a History of this Law, how it comes to be made; for it is but a short one, and 'tis only the last clause of it that is pleaded by the Defendant. By the Statute of the 13th of Edw. III. it was made felony to transport Wool, and this my Lord Coke observes in his Comment upon Mogea Charta, upon chap. 30. King Edw. III. took advantage of it, for excluding mercy of the Merchants, for dispensations with the Law, and for licences for transporting of Wool. Hereupon several complaints were made in the Parliament, and particularly, in the 13th year of Edw. III. Parl. 1. cap. 28. the Commons complain, that the Grant of such a licence by a Back of Wool made by the Merchants only was not to bind the Commons, and therefore pray it may be revoked. The King answered, This cannot bind to charge the Commons; for that there was let a certain price upon Wool to every County, which the King would should stand; and that all Wool sold under that price should be forfeited in the hands of the buyer.

This was in 17 E. III. and this matter, my Lord, among other things, was represented to the same Parliament, by the same Merchants, by way of advice, as a thing fit, 17 E. III. in duple cap. 58. of the Parliament-Rolls of that year. And they set forth, Whereas they were summoned to Warrington, to inform the price of Wool, which they did not, regarding the times to come as they lay, and that was abused, they pray liberty to buy Wool as freely as any merchants, and as they can agree between buyer and seller; and that all Indemnities and Proceedings contrary to this Law might be stayed; and further they add their advice, that the King would send in the Staple in some place in England, rather than beyond the seas.

Then comes the 18 E. III. Parl. 1. cap. 12. among other Petitions of the Commons, there are three which refer to the first part of the Act of Parliament. That the prices set upon the form of Wool in every County, which run more to the damage than advantage of the people, might be pulled, and that every one may buy freely, as he can agree with the seller, and none be accused for doing the contrary.

This, my Lord, explains the first part of that Act of Parliament; that the ordinances before this time made upon taking forms of Wool, which was printed in Rolls, and all the Statute-Books; (for the Roll is, per prius) and declared, and that every man, as well Stranger as Danish, might purchase Wool as he can agree with the seller, as they were used to do before the said ordinances.

Now, my Lord, you shall see the latter part of the Act, which is that they plead, among the Petitions of the Commons in the said Roll, there the 5th Petition is, reciting, That whereas the King had granted to them of Flanders, that the Staple for Wool should be held at Bruges; at the time of which Grant, all manner of Merchants, that is, Lombards, Greeks, Catalunians, Spaniards, and others, who used to buy the greatest part of the Wool, and carry them out of Flanders by land and sea, where they would, to the great profit and increase of the price of Wool, rather coming yet the Towns of Bruges, Gent, and Ypres, have late obtained,

That

That no wools coming to the Staple, be sold to strangers, nor carried out of the said Country of Flouder, as they used to be, to the damage of the merchants of England, and of all the commonalty; and therefore they pray remedy hereof.

I am informed by the King, that they may buy wool as they were wont to do; and that a Writ should be sent to the Sheriff to make Proclamacion accordingly. Then they pray, that the effect of these answers may be put into writing, in the manner of a Patent under the Great Seal, and this is done, in which there is this very Statute of 18 E. III. in verbum, as it is printed. And this plainly shows, that the Sea being to be open, and Merchants to pass wherever they please, was only in answer to their petition and representations, and to redress the mischief; that they might buy here, and go where they would, and not be necessitated to go and buy at the Staple; which was to be abused by those of Bruges: And this is likewise pursuant to the advice and petitions of Merchants before the 17th E. III. That the King would establish a Staple somewhere in England, and not in parts beyond the Sea.

My Lord, for the rest of the Acts of Parliament that have been cited on the other side, I shall not enter upon them particularly; but this every body at the first sight may see, they carry their own answer along with them, and the occasion of their making does appear in themselves, that they did not, and very few of them come up to this Question now before us, or of any thing like it, as will appear plainly upon the bare reading of them.

The only Question then, my Lord, that remains, is, whether the action lies for the Company? For I think I have made it out, that the King had such a prerogative at Common Law, and so Act of Parliament hath taken it away. I then I say, the Question is, Whether an action lies for the Company; that is, whether it be a bare licence, or coupled with an Interest? And as to that point, I shall be very short, for to me it seems to be no Question at all. For,

First, They are at a great charge and expence to support this trade, and therefore surely they ought to profit by it.

Secondly, They are looked upon by the Parliament to have an interest in this trade, or else they had never been raised to high as twenty Shillings for every 100 l. in their Stock. Then if they have an interest in the trade, this trading of the defendant is an encroachment upon that interest, and then here is domestice & against, which will suffice them to an action.

For so it is in other things: A Fair, in some towns, is but a licence to hold a market at such a time, in such a place; but because of the profit that tends to this liberty, and the charge that the party is at in keeping of it, an action does lie against any Man that sets up another Fair, to the prejudice of him that had the full Grant.

In the common case of Patents to new inventions, an action lies for using the invention without licence, because of the interest conveyed by the Grant, and the charge that the party that invents, is at. So that I think, my Lord, with submission, we have here an interest in this trade; and an interest, I say, as well as a licence, well founded upon the King's Letters Patent; which the King had power to make by prerogative at the Common Law; and that power not restrained by any Act of Parliament. And therefore I humbly pray your judgment for the Plaintiffs.

Mr. Pollexfen, (afterwards Lord Chief Justice) his Arguments.

De Terra Petito. Ante Regni Regis Caroli Secundi XXXVI. Die Lunæ XII. Aprilis, Anno Dom. 1684. Bene Regis. The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

Mr. Pollexfen.

MAY it please your Lordship, the Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East-India, they are plaintiffs, and Thomas Sandys is the defendant. If your Lordship please, I will open a little more of the Record than has yet been opened: And the Case upon the Record stands thus:

The plaintiffs bring their action against the defendant, and do declare, That the King by his Letters Patent, in the 13th year of his reign, did grant to them the sole trade, between the Cape of Good Hope and the brightness of Madagascari, in the East-India. And did also grant unto them, that they, and nobody else, should come thither, nor trade there; and they do say, the defendant did come thither, and did trade; and that this is to the plaintiffs damage.

This defendant has prayed Oyer of the Letters Patent; and there are some things that are not mentioned in the Declaration: but not being upon the Record, and appearing upon the Oyer, I crave leave to open them, that I may make use of them in the discourse I am to make; and I desire your Lordship would please to take notice of them.

In the Letters Patent, when they come to the Prohibition and Restraint, the Prohibition and Restraint is in this manner, which they have set out in their declaration. The Letters Patent do prohibit the trading without a licence, upon pain that every such person that shall trade to or from the East-India, shall answer the forfeiture of his merchandise, and also of the Ship; one moiety to the King, and the other moiety to the East-India Company.

And then there follows another clause, which is omitted all out of the Declaration; and that is a clause of Grant to the Company, that for any consideration of benefit to their own use, they may grant licence to strangers or others, to trade to and from the East-India.

And then there is another clause that is omitted also, and that is this, That the King grants to the Company, that the King will not, without consent of the Company, give licence to any persons besides the Company to trade thither.

And there is likewise another clause which I would take notice of, That nobody of the Company should have a vote in the Company, unless he have a stock of 500 l.

These clauses now being in the Letters Patent, and the Letters Patent being set forth upon the Record, they are become parts of the Case. The defendant has pleaded the Statute of 18 E. III. and thereupon there is a demurrer.

My Lord, the Questions that are in the Case are only these two:

4

First, Whether or no this Grant of the sole trade to the plaintiffs, be a good grant or not? And next,

Secondly, Supposing it should be a good Grant, Whether or no the plaintiffs can maintain this action, as now it is brought?

My Lord, in the argument of this Case divers Things have been said in which I shall differ from the other side, but only take notice how far they may be of force in point of argument, to make the Questions that are in the Case to turn, as to the Law, one way or other.

My Lord, it is no Question but that the King, by Law, can restrain any of his subjects from going out of the Kingdom: For the King hath a particular interest in the services of his subjects; and therefore it is most reasonable and an undoubted Rule, I think, in the Law, that the King may restrain any particular subject pro his re nata, as the King takes it to be most necessary and convenient for his service to restrain.

Next, my Lord, I do not deny, but think it also to be a Law, That the King may restrain all his subjects from a trade to such a particular Country or City, upon some reason or occasion; as in times of war, and times of plague, that I need not the Question in our Case, for the Law is, that the King may restrain any of his subjects from going out of the Kingdom: For the King hath a particular interest in the services of his subjects; and therefore it is most reasonable and an undoubted Rule, I think, in the Law, that the King may restrain any particular subject pro his re nata, as the King takes it to be most necessary and convenient for his service to restrain.

Then,

[illegible]

There are three things that I think are important, that they are to the opposition or to the King's party, and I think, that has known any thing of late years about the opposition, that knows their dealings with, and handling of their affairs are friends, that get any thing in the way, as; and other people in their employ, will find influence enough in the opposition; and that will be enough to satisfy any man, what kind of people they are: for what a work is there, when they have any thing to forward, or any body else that has got any thing in their favor? If their things moved are not upon the Record, but they are consequences, that are visible to every body; and the truth of it, in all Patents for sole trade, to it will be. So that if the evils and mischiefs, which the Common Law forbids, and endeavours to prevent, by judging all Monopolies, Infringings and sole Trade unlawful, be to be avoided, the evils and mischiefs attending these Patents and sole Trades are perhaps the greater, because

My Trade is the greatest that ever England knew.

My Lord, in Faustberg's Nature-Brevium, 222, there is this fable, and I give it for this reason, because if to be selfish are consequences or a sole virtue, it cannot be denied but she is offenders of all the King's people. Now there is no law, that every Grant of the King has a condition implied in it, Quod Patet per Divisionem in magis fidei interfecti per gratiam, to the Book of 23 d. IV. 14. Grant is Key, to the charge of justice of the Subj. 13; and therefore the King is deceived in this Grant; and the Grant is as well by the Common Law, as all their ancient Statutes, void.

City. Ay, but say they, this is not a Patent granted to the advantage of a few, or for the raising of the prizes and monopolizing of commodities, but for good government and order, and the preservation of this trade, that otherwise would be destroyed; and say they, there have been such Citizens as contribute to Turkey, Barbary, and other places.

Rep. It is true, my Lord, this is said; but that Patent does say, that it is for good order and government, and that the Advantage, concerning the Friends and Neighbors, is not set out in our Books. The Corporation raising, both the parts and at hand, the said Patent, the fair pretence of order and government, is in conclusion true to the hindrance of trade and traffick, and to the retail produce Monopolies. This is an old observation, for in the sixth Rep. 88. 5. in the end of the tale of Monopolies, there are these words: Privilegia quæ sunt contra Privilegia, Rip. magis tamen Privilegia contra Privilegia, id est publicum pretorium, quam bene de legibus Constituta, sed præsertim tunc ab eis abest voluntas. Those are the words of that Book; and there it is also said matter of, that Dary's Patent had a much plausible and Specious preamble, for there is mention'd, that the Subjects might exercise themselves in husbandry and lawful employments, and that Card-making had made Cards-playing more frequent, and principally among Servants and Apprentices, and therefore the sale mixing, and trade of Cards-selling, was granted to Dary. Otherwise, says the Book, what a glorious pretext and preamble this odious Monopoly had.

There is the copy of Henry and Wyn, MS. B. 2. 10, Cor. 11. Rat. 423. A Patent made three years after the Patent given to the Company, and in imitation thereof, the Patent in to the Gewery Company, and recites, that the trade to the Gewery was of great advantage to the King's subjects at that time; and by reason of so much excess in trading of subjects there, our most christianities were decreased in their value; so that the King's subjects were forced to carry Silver there to get Wines; and all this happened for want of regulation and good government, and therefore the Patent did constitute Sir Arthur Ingram, and about fifty private men by name. And all this, that the said Company should have power to carry out, for the space of twelve years, should be the Company and Body politic, to consist by and by of twelve men, should be a Governor and Body politic, to consist by and by of twelve men; that there should be a Governor, a Deputy Governor, and twelve Aldermen, and names them, but to be continued by elections; and should have the sole trade to these Islands; that no other flor'd or haunc or vice these Islands, and prohibits all others under pain of forfeiture and imprisonment; and indeed follows very much the frame of this Patent, with a non-alienage to the Statute of Monopolies. But notwithstanding this glorious preamble, this Patent was soon afterwards condemn'd, both in this Court, and afterwards in the Parliament for the abuse of trade, and of regulation; for the general good, in that the thing that is prohibited to all other men is, that they shall not interfere with that; and so now I can't but think, what is the real intention of this Patent under the name of regulation and government: to ingross all the trade of the town or two town into so small excellent regulation and government.

My Lord, as to the other Companies and Charters that have been granted, supposing that all such Grants were such as this, and used and practised as this is, it is no argument that they are legal, or that this was good. For, my Lord, it is well known, both by the ancient Statutes that I have cited, and by common experience, that there have been in all ages and times Patents granted, that were not by Law grantable, but the King was deprived in them, and those Patents were void and of no force; and therefore it is no argument, because there have been many such Grants and Patents in former times, that this should be good.

I agree, my Lord, if ever this Grant, or any Grant like this, had come in question, and had receiv'd any judicial allowance to be good, it had been something; but otherwise it can be no inference at all, because there are others this is a good one.

[illegible]

Secondly, I was they and further, and provided against, those that would be.

The Proviso in the Statute of 1834 Chapter 1, § 1, § 9 shows also that Monopolies were granted, but for a certain time, from receiving any allowance or appropriation, that that Grant that was made in the end of her reign, for confirmation of the Queen's Grants by a special Privilege, does except and provide that it should not extend to make good any Letters Patent that did concern any balance, powers or privileges, commonly called Monopolies.

The nature of Monopolies and this Statute sufficiently show, that there were such Grants, and that there were not allowed, as it is seen in Queen Elizabeth's time, and during a reign, divers such Grants it found had been made. But, say a Lord, if it be there had never been any judicial allowance in times past for any sole trade, or sole buying or selling, that there have been in all times such Grants made, yet this will be an argument that they were good, but on the contrary, and further the practices of these Companies have been to the contrary, not within late years; so sole trade profitable cannot there.

But, my Lord, the country, since that Patents have been so granted, since that there is an artificial increase of such, I would appeal to those to show whether this has been any prejudice of such things. I do not suppose, but that in Turkey and Bergerie, artificers have tried to do what have been denieth by the Companies, and that consequently all times, but yet I think nobody will and any judicial opinion that has been given against them to us, or that ever any such Patent was of force, to restrain the felicitous Freedom of trade in those places.

My Lord, I must so think, that the Grants to those Companies, that is, the Tortly-Company, the Barbary Company, and the Anglo-Company, are like to this of the Inde; but yet if it never has been published to the other others in this manner, it is rather an argument against them of the other side; but they have nevertheless thus, nor all the clause of prohibition as there men do. For, my Lord, whoever thinks to make any conclusion for the privation of such a sole trade by a Company, with a restraint of others, because such Patents and Charters have been granted to other men, will have, and little reason to do so, if he consider what a difference there is betwixt a sole trade and these sorts, for my Lord, these Companies do not ever let up for a little while, and therefore, such sole trades in the Patents, they never sold them, but have always sold them in the Country, and in another method in a commendable way, and I think in a legal way; but not so as to warrant any thing of this, that is here pretended. Therefore if your Lordship pleads to give me leave, I would observe the difference between the way of trading, that those other Companies have, and the trade of the Engl-Inde Company. The Company of Tortly, Barbary, Angla, Malabar and Humbergh, nor any other, till of late years, did ever trade with a Joint-Stock; but the Members of the said Companies, every man find out his own trade, bought and sold his own commodities, and did come to the said Companies, and the Companies took some care to send out a Consul, or factor, to the said Countries, to procure the trade, and by small imposts upon the commodities were made to pay for such Officers, which imposts or Allowances were made by By-Laws and Regulations among themselves. They take care the Markets shall not be over-clogged by the Commodities they find out, which they also by their own Orders and By-Laws that are made among themselves, they only order what Ships shall go, but leave the particular Members of the Company, every man to find what he will upon his own account, and, as appears to me, will to be his factor, and to bring over what commodity he desires to sell, and to buy what he desires to buy of the Body-Politic. If you do not say any Joint-Stock, or the Stock of the Body-Politic. If you do with say, that the said Members, the particular person you have to deal with, is a man is intended to be a Joint-Stock, that has a mind, paying him small fees of money for his freedom; and whoever is of the Company, has a Vote in ordering the affairs of the Company. But now you of the Engl-Inde Company import the sole trade into the Body-Politic; you have a Joint-Stock, every man whether Merchant or not, if he can buy such a share in their Stock, is of their Company. The Company receive money, and the rest must submit to their sale and distribution: those few of them which have the most shares, have the more say in the Company, and the Members make, buy or sell, or have any thing that be calls his own, but they have a share in the Stock; you suffer not the Members to trade with their own money, but by a discrimination, or to employ whom they please, thus you do more, you suffer men to have a Vote among you (and your Letters Patent have such a clause that none shall) but he who buys Stock, which goes, no man can give more, unless he pays 10*l*. or 20*l*. for it, two and a half per Cent or some great sum. So that by the very foundation, they can have no more power in their Company, than they that have good shares; and their shares being ingrafted into few hands, they have all, and call themselves the Company, and therefore they will not be deceived by words, but distinguish things different one from another, by their strength between one Company and Society, and another, and by the strength of the law.

The Family Company, and the still less it, may be truly said to be Managers, Regulators and Improvers of Trade. They have no Joint-Stock that they trade upon, they invest not, they admit every man that will to be free of their Company, to trade with his own money, his own credit, and buy and sell his own, and to employ when he pleases: and none among them, under pretence of government, regulation and preferation of trade, makes unreasonable advantages.

But this terrible Lepid-India Merchant, the Body-Pol tick, covers and countenances some few men among them to ingross, buy and sell at their own rates, and thus exclude all others for the great and excessive advantages of the few.

The other Companies, as the Turky Company, &c. have not any sole buying or selling, as is counting any sole trade or monopoly.

Every Member of these Companies, which are a multitude, and every one that is not a Member, as it will be, be a Merchant, and no man is excluded.

But the Company is a sole contrary, and therefore (if ever any was) are great Injurers and Monopolizers of trade. I do not argue nor speak against Companies, nor regulating, nor managing trade, which was the true intent of the Patent; but as I have mentioned, and it virtuously and commendably practised in the great Companies of Turky, Mafow, Holland, and others, where the Members of the Companies trade upon their own particular Stock and Estates, and no Merchant hindered or denied to be a Member, that defect it, paying its ordinary fee of admission: but against the invisible Merchant, this pollicit capacity trading in Joint-Stock.

Suppose a private Patent to any one, or two, or three men, Farmers or Partners in their private capacity of this sole trade, and they had the management of it, and becomers possessors of such vast wealth and merchandise:

What would this Pollicit Body (I mean the principal Members, for the Body cannot think or have sense) judge of this?

Perhaps yours is much wiser; there a man should know with whom he deals, who were his debtors, and how to come at them; but dealing with you is a kind of dealing with spirits, an invisible body, only fulfilling in Antidote's Logic.

Therefore being to unlike the other Companies, and so contrary to them, you have no countenance from them; but though they are good and commendable, you are Injurers and Monopolizers.

This shows the great and vast difference between the one and the other; thus shows that you, that are the East-India Company, have this sole trade as a Company, and wherever buys in many Stocks, has as many votes as he has good in the Stock.

There is no such thing in any other Company, but quite otherwise in all their respects; but hereby it comes to pass, that he that has in many shares in the Stock, has an absolute power, by having so many votes.

The invisible Body or Corporation perhaps trade for 2,000,000 per Ann. they get into their hands to sell for 800,000 worth of merchandise at a time; therefore sell-fables they made came to 2,800,000, if many hath these commodities but they. Is this trading, and so ingrossing or monopolizing? Is it their wonderful virtue then, hatred and contempt of riches, that makes them not to raise and increase values as prices, and be as rich as they please, if they do not do it. Never saw there such an influence of so great trade in England, but none of your Members buy or trade at all, any man among you, whether he be Merchant or not Merchant, Citizen or Gentleman, or what he will, if he has a Stock, his Stock goes on by his joint-trade; and it is a few men that manage the whole as they see best, no man employs ships or workmen as he thinks most convenient; but you are one great trader in this vast trade, which is indeed one quarter part of the trade of the whole World.

My Lord, this being then the great difference between this trade by a Joint-Stock, and in the Company as a Body Pollicit, which is but as one entire person, having the trade entire to himself, and the trade of particular Members, under orderly regulation.

It is quite a different and different thing from any thing, in any of the other Companies, that they would be blamed unto to sustain their own ends; nor is there any reason to make them like one another, for the whole matter is carried on different in both; the one is a sole trade by a Body Pollicit, the other dispersed through the Members, according to their own discretion and occasion, under regulation. No man, if he comes into the East-India Company, can trade among you, or vote among you, unless he have good Stock; and if he do not come in, (since it is according to your constitution, that every man should have as many votes as he has good) his vote is like to do him little good, if some few men in the Company agree against it.

And besides this, my Lord, in the Turky Company, where they trade by divided Members, every man knows his credit and his debtors, because they deal in their natural capacities, but you trading in capacity of a Body Pollicit, every man that trades with you has a creditor or a debtor, he knows not whom.

And it is a great mischief, when persons know not how to far or how to deal with them; for take them all apart, they are as soft and as good people to deal with, as can be; but take them together as a body, what more hard to deal with than a Corporation?

My Lord, we have seen the instance of these things in this Company, in a few days they having got great power, that none could contend with them, and then after to dissolve, as well as that no Dan can find to them. This we all know very well, my Lord; and the influence in this to show, that whereas they would be liable to give to Companies, which were created for the preservation and benefit of trade; and the Members of it are under the regulation and government of the Company, but not as you are, they are traders, your Members are none, you are only the Body Pollicit, the invisible Merchant, that no one knows where to find; and a Body Pollicit, in judgment of Law, has neither Soul nor Conscience, and yet forthwith are traders.

I only instance in these things, to show that signifies nothing which you did intend upon, that there are other Companies for trade; for I say, that they are good and regular, and not Monopolizers, for they do not trade in such a manner by sole buying and selling, but every one trades as a particular Merchant; but you are otherwise, your Body Pollicit is the sole Merchant, and none of your Members can trade, unless a particular servant, perhaps to face charges, give him leave to buy or deal in some little things, but all others are quite excluded.

My Lord, having thus showed you the way of their trade in sole buying and sole selling, I shall now, in the next place, come to the Statute of Monopolies, which is the Statute of a King Tenth, chap. 3. and I hope I shall please you, that they are within the words and meaning of that Statute.

By that Statute, my Lord, it is enacted, that all Monopolies, Commissions, Grants, Licences, Charters and Letters Patent granted, or so to be granted to any particular persons, Bodies Pollicit or Corporate, or for the sole buying, selling, making, working, or using of any thing within this Realm; and all Proclamations, Injunctions, Restraints, Warrants of Affiliance; and all other matters and things whatsoever, tending to the inhibiting, erecting, strengthening, furthering, or countenancing the same contrary to the Law of this Realm, are and shall be utterly void and of none effect.

And that all Persons, Bodies Pollicit and Corporate, which now use, or hereafter shall use, shall stand and be disabled to have, use, exercise, or put in use any Monopoly, or such Commission, Grant, Licence, Charter, Letters Patent, Proclamations, Injunctions, Restraints or other matter, or thing tending as aforesaid; or any liberty, power or faculty, grounded or pretended to be grounded upon them.

Then, my Lord, there follows the clause of forfeiture of treble damages to the party grieved, by the using of any such Monopoly; thus comes the clause about new Inventions and some other things; then comes the Proviso concerning Corporations, of which I have been made in this title, I shall have leave to consider it distinctly.

Provided also, and it is hereby enacted, that this Act, or any thing therein contained, shall not in any wise extend or be prejudicial to the City of London, or any Corporation, Company or Fellowship of any Art, Trade, Occupation or Mystery, or to any Companies or Societies of Merchants, within the Realm, erected for the maintenance, enlarging, or ordering of any trade or merchandise; but that the same Charters, Corporations, Companies, Fellowships and Societies, and their Liberties, Privileges, Powers and Immunities shall be and continue of like force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and so other, any thing in this Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

The next Proviso extends to Patents granted, or to be granted for Printing, making of Salt-Petre, and Offices, which do not concern the public quality.

By the definition of a Monopoly, which I have before, out of my Lord Coke, stated and explicated, this sole trade granted to you, and the exclusion of all others, is a Monopoly within that definition, as I have before shown that their Charter is directly contrary to this Act. My Lord, first, that they are within the enacting clause of this Act, then, I think, by comparing what they claim with the enacting clause, will plainly appear. I need not now stand so much upon the word Monopoly, whether by what I have said, I have proved them a Monopoly or no; but by the other words of the Statute, supposing that word Monopoly was out of the Act, yet they are within it: for the Act of Parliament having the words of sole selling, or sole buying, or sole using of any thing, if they have the sole buying or sole selling, or sole using of this trade, then they are most plainly, I think, within the enacting words of this Act of Parliament.

Now, my Lord, that their Charter is directly contrary to the enacting words, I must also therein refer myself to the words of the Charter, which has sole buying; for all others are prohibited so much to come and go from and to the East-India without their licence. It has also sole selling; for all others are prohibited to import any commodity from thence into the Realm; and they cannot sell them, except they import them. They have likewise the sole using; for they have granted to them the sole trade, which includes all buying, selling, sole using, that appropriates all to themselves, and excludes all others.

Now then, my Lord, can any man read the Act of Parliament and their Charter, and compare them together, but he must at the same time conclude, that their Charter is contrary to what is enacted therein: for the Act of Parliament does say, "That all Letters Patent granted to any Person, or Body Pollicit, for the sole buying, sole selling, or sole using any thing, and all Proclamations, Restraints and Injunctions to the contrary, and all other matters and things touching themselves, are contrary to law, and utterly void, and of none effect, why then they have by their Grant, the sole buying, sole selling, and sole using of this trade; therefore they are quite contrary to what is in the enacting words of this Act of Parliament." Then, my Lord, if they are contrary to the enacting clause of the Act, then their hopes must be, that they are saved by the Proviso.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Act, in 3 Inst. lib. 2. does say this Act is forcibly and vehemently penned for the suppression of all Monopolies; and the word sole usage, is there said to be in general, so no Monopoly can be raised but will be within the reach of this Statute.

The word, any thing, shows also the general scope and intent, that nothing should be excluded that was a Monopoly. For Monopolies, in times past, were ever without Law, but never without friends. And if it be proved for the suppression of all, it ought to have a large and general conclusion.

Obj. But then let us see whether they are in theaving of this Proviso. The Proviso does not extend to any Corporation or Societies of Merchants within this Realm, erected for the maintenance, enlargement, or ordering of trade or merchandise.

Ans. This Proviso extends not to this Charter, or any Letters Patent that were not at the time of the making of this Act; and that is the first thing that I offer, why they are not within the reach of the Proviso. Because this Proviso does not extend to any Letters Patent after the Act of Parliament made, but only the Letters Patent before. For the Proviso says, It shall not extend, or be prejudicial to any Town Corporate, concerning any Charter granted to them, Libs. or Customs used by them, or to Societies erected for the maintenance, enlargement or ordering any trade or merchandise. This does extend to those that were granted or erected at the time of the making of the Act; and there are no words of saving, for what should hereafter be erected. And the word hereafter would as well have been in the clause of saving, as in the enacting clause, if it had been inserted. But the following words, concluding this Proviso, show it further; for the Proviso goes on, and says, That the same Charters, Customs, Corporations, Fellowships and Societies, and their Liberties, &c. shall be and continue of like force and effect, as they were before the making of this Act, and no other. This shows, that that which is within the Proviso, was that which was before the making of the Act only; and this governs and concludes the whole Proviso. Now that only extending to those that then were, and to leave them as they were, because these Charters and Companies, their Powers and Privileges, in the same time and condition as they were before the Act, can never have any assistance to what should be after.

So, my Lord, taking it upon what I have said, I do hope that the words of the Act shall plainly be carried to bodies politic, and to inhibit the ingrossing trade by bodies politic. Their say themselves, and it appears they are a body politic, and they have this sole trade; and so the standing clause extends to them.

Next, I say, the Privilege extends to Charters granted before, not to Charters to be granted after the Act of Parliament: and as to those Charters that are excepted, it leaves them just as they were before; but if their statute takes place, then it is, in a collective, with subordination, most palpably contradictory and repugnant to the Act; and then it is as lawful as this to grant to any Corporation any sole trade or manufacture, yes, down-right to grant them a Monopoly, as it is to make any other Grant; and so this would be rather a countenance, than an Act made against them.

But then, my Lord, they come to another thing; this is an Infidel Country, this is a sole trade with Infidels, and such a trade the subjects never had any right to have without the King's licence; and now being free, that defrauds the King; and to prove it, they cite Archbold's Case, in 2 Brom. 296. wherein Mr. Bromley being Prothonotary, recites what my Lord said in that Case, That no subject might trade into Infidel Countries without the King's licence; and his reason was, because he might relinquish the Catholic faith, and adhere to Infidelity: and that he had been a licence in the time of Ed. III. wherein the King recites the confidence that he had in his subject, that he would not recede his Religion, and licenced him; and that this did sit upon the recital of a licence made in trade to the East-Indies.

And they do cite Cala's Case, in 2 Rep. 67. p. 17. wherein it is said, That Infidels are, in law, perpetui inimici, and between them and Christians there is perpetual hostility, there can be no peace; and 12 H. VIII. fol. 4. where it is holden, that a Pagan cannot have or maintain any action at all, nor have any thing within this Realm; and to prove this, Regis 281. and 12 H. VIII. fol. 4. are there cited.

My Lord, I have the more fully noted what this is, because I hope I shall give very full answers to it: But, my Lord, before I do answer these Books;

First, Let us for what the consequence of it will be: Supposing the Law to be as these Books say, and as these Gentlemen would have it, and the consequence will be, that the plaintiffs cannot maintain their action, but the Charters granted to them will be void.

Next, Upon the reasons given in these Books; for if the Books are of authority, the reasons there given must be of authority (says that Book of Bromley's). The King has the care and preservation of Religion, by the Law vested and reposed in him, that the subject should not trade with Infidels without licence, then they may use violence their faith; and the King will take care to give licence to traffick, to such only as he can have confidence will never waver from their profession.

Supposing this to be true, then these Patent must be sought; for then it is only granted to persons in whom such confidence may be. My Lord, then let us how this will stand with their Charter. Their corporation and body politic is indefinite, as is persons; and the members changed continually; some fall their stocks, and go out, or die; others buy their stocks, and come in that way to be members of the company, or as successors to those that die, and many new members are every year. I doubt they do not much examine, or take care to be satisfied, how fixed these are in their Religion they daily take in; and how then can there be confidence in a body politic, which the law says has another soul nor confidence? What confidence can be reposed in such a person whose Religion?

Secondly, Besides, it is not only the members of the Company, that at the time of the incorporation were incorporated, and their successors, that at that time lived; but their sons and apprentices, their fathers and servants have licence by this Patent to trade there; and what security can there be, that such may not (by conversing with Infidels) change their Religion? If this Licence be a truth and prerogative in the King, to be given to such persons in whom the King can have confidence, that they will not, by converse with Infidels, change or prejudice their religion, &c. this cannot be granted to a body politic and their successors, which may have continuance for ever; and to their sons, fathers, apprentices and servants, persons altogether unknown, not born, nor to come away when these Letters Patent were made.

Suppose such a licence to you, to trade with enemies, and supposing that the Law has established such a power and prerogative in the King, in the prerogative of religious licence; the King cannot grant this prerogative to you of the East-Indies Company, that you should have a power to grant licences to whom you will: yet all this is done by your Patent; for you have thereby power granted you for your sons, apprentices, fathers and servants, which are persons that you yourselves nominate and appoint at your discretions, and undoubtedly very religious, and others that you bring into your Company.

Next, besides this power that you have expressed for those that are your apprentices, &c. which are at your discretion, to make whom you please; there is another express clause, That the Company for any consideration, or benefit to themselves, may grant licence to any servant, stranger or other, to use this trade. So the more they desire what the meaning was at the word Consideration, by adding the Words, or benefit to themselves, and that the King, without consent of the Company, will not grant licence to any other to trade there.

Can this then be a good Grant? Can the King grant from himself his kindly care, and the trust in him reposed for the care of Religion to you, to manage it as you will, and that he will not use it himself without your consent? Surely, you cannot say so. So that supposing by law there is such a trust reposed in the King for preservation of religion, as you would have, to give licence to his subjects to trade with Infidels; and that none without his licence can do it: yet this grant to you will be void in itself, and then you have no more right than we, and can maintain no action against us.

But thus a little to consider the authorities upon which this great matter relies, to prove this religious point or piece of law.

First, That Book of Bromley, is a Book that was printed in the last time, and not licenced by any Judge or Parson whatsoever; but truly I have got a copy, and a note of the Roll of the Case there reported, and Vol. VII.

It is this, Archb. v. Reg. B. C. R. c. 350. Mich. 1679. against Archb.; it is in a production, setting forth, That the King had granted to the plaintiffs his commission to go with their fleet to the Indies, to spoil and suppress the Infidels, and to take from them what he could; that the plaintiffs, in the Prohibition, having this commission from the King, did enter into Articles with the defendant, to give him a share of what he should get in the adventure; and thereupon there was a bill in the Admiralty by the defendant, against the plaintiffs, and he comes and moves for a Prohibition, suggesting that the articles were made upon the lady and not upon the high sea; and to the Court had no jurisdiction. Now upon the debate of this Case, it did appear, there was a kind of Letters of mart, a commission from the King, in a warlike manner to spoil the Infidels, and get what he could from them. But now, how this would come in debate to make a restriction about the business of trade, I do not know; probably it might be as it there related; but what is on the Blood is only an occasional saying of my Lord Cra. upon the motion for this prohibition. So that a man that will lay any great stress upon such an authority, will be mighty willing, for it is only an occasional saying, and nothing relating to what was there brought in judgment, which was about a commission to take away goods, perhaps from enemies, by Letters of mart, not about trade; and so I hope there is no great matter in that Report.

The next Case, my Lord, is that of Cabot, where it is said, that an Infidel is perpetui inimicus, can maintain no action, or have any thing; and that there is perpetual hostilities between Christians and such, and no peace can be made with them.

My Lord, 'tis true, that this is said in Cabot's case, but I must also say, as there was no occasion in the former Report for saying of that, so more is there in Cabot's case for saying of this; for it made nothing to the matter as question about the Prerogative, or were they any wife led to it, in the debate of that case; there was nothing there in judgment that gave occasion for it, so that I cannot think it was much considered of before it was spoken.

The Books that are there cited, I have looked upon, to see if they would prove any such thing as they are there cited for, and I think they do not by any means.

There is one in the Register 281. and that is I find there is, that in a writ of prohibition granted to the Prior and Brethren of the Hospital of St. John at Jerusalem, and their agents, it is said, That that Hospital was founded in defence of Holy Church, against the enemies of Christ and Christians; but truly, how to conclude out of that Book this, that Infidels should not have any property in trade, or be perpetui inimici, upon whom no peace can be had, I know not, or that Cra. mentions us when.

Then 12 H. VIII. fol. 4. they also cited, that it only this, The original call in an action of trespass for beating his servants, taking away his dogs called a blood-hound: And there it is said, If a Lord beat his villain, or an husband beat his wife, or a man beat one out-land, or a waiter, or a Page; they shall have no action, because they are not able to sue an action; I must needs say, this comes in very oddly from a digress to a Page, and there is nothing to lead to it in all Cra. case, that I can see, and yet this is all the authority that is cited in Cabot's case, to prove that they can have no action. So that all that a man can make of this is only discourse, and sudden thoughts and opinions, and sayings of Counsel, nothing of debate or judgment in the case.

It is true, my Lord, the Christian Religion and Papists are so contrary to one another, that it is impossible they should be reconciled any more than contradictions can be reconciled; but because the religious cannot be reconciled, that therefore there should be a partition-wall between us, as to property and commerce, perhaps as doctrine as irrelevant as can be; and the desire for all means of coming to concord and reduce them to the faith. But now, besides their extraordinary and occasional sayings in these Books cited, which are of little authority, I cannot find any Books or Cases, much less judgment or authority, for such opinions in to great a point as this is: but on the other side, if a man considers the general cause and practice of trade and commerce, and legal proceedings in all times and ages, one would think my Lord Cra. could not be in earnest in what he has said in Cabot's case about Infidels. Let a man consider what a great part of the world we have commerce with are Infidels, at this day, as the Turks, the Portugals, the Morrs; and other places in Spain and Portugal were possessed by the Moor, who were Infidels, till about 300 years since: for till the year 1492, the Moor had possession of both the Spain and the Portugal for the space of near 800 years, and have us now always had trading with all those? Have we not leagues and treaties with the Princes of Infidel Countries? Do we not receive Ambassadors from them, and send Ambassadors to them, and Ministers trading with them? Have we not, from time to time, and this is all times and ages, and that is Q. Elizabeth's time, in the best and most religious time, for many hundred years? Have we not likewise war and peace with them, in like manner as with Christian Kings and Countries?

And let a man consider the consequences of this doctrine. If they are perpetui inimici, then we may justly killing of them, as those we are in hostility with, whatsoever we meet them, and justify the taking away what they have from them, as 17 E. IV. fol. 13. 14. it is adjudged, that a man may first take and kill his own goods, and the goods of an Infidel, whenever he can find them; for it is the price of his adventure to take them, and of his victory over his enemy, if he have taken him. And 2 H. VII. fol. 15. if an Infidel be an alien enemy, then any man may take away the goods of an Infidel, and have them to his own use; and this would be a good trade, if this be so; any man may kill and beat him, if this be so.

Archb. Prohibitor, in his argument, was pleased to use many ancient Rolls and Records of H. III. and Ed. I. and about those cases, concerning these Princes dealing with and handling of the Jews; and I believe he might have cited many more.

Mr. Prynne, in his Book which he calls The Second Part of a Short Discourse of the Jews, Discovered and Harshed Reviv'd since England's humbled in the year 1555, has a long treatise, in which I believe an hundred Records and Histories are cited to this purpose, That the Jews did exact and enrich themselves by usury, to the great impoverishing of the people; and that the Princes of those times policed them, taxed them, and took away the estates of the Jews from time to time; and thereby a man might think that these Kings aided them but as fiances, to make them grise what they could from others, and then squeezed it from them into their own treasury: and it might in all probability be so. The Story is true, my Lord, as he relates it, and in the Rolls there are a multitude of them cited to that purpose.

X x

But besides Mr. Prynne, there is a Statute of Merton, c. 5. made 20 H. III. my Lord Cole in the 2d Edg. 89. says, was principally designed against the uttermost Jews. The Statute de Judeis, 12 E. 1. relates, that the King's people had been dishonoured, much injured and impoverished by the usury of the Jews, and enacts, That as few thereafter should take usury upon Loans, Rents, or other Things. And in the 2d Edg. 307. my Lord Coke, in his Comment upon that Statute, says, That 15,000 Jews thereupon went out of the Realm.

So that, my Lord, we do not dispute but that the said alledge may be true; that the Jews were extortioners, and the King took away their estates: But the matter is the use and application of that fact.

For, first, I think if it be known, as, and taken to be according to any known law which we have, that they were as alien enemies, then as the King might take away their estates: for the subjects may take them away too; for there is no such use to be made of it as the other side would have; as I perceive. They say as Infidels the King would take away their estates, because they are perpetual enemies; and I say, if they were alien enemies, then the subjects might take them away too; for so the Book says.

But next, my Lord, I do use it another way; That all their dealings with the Jews shew, that they were not alien enemies, but treated as alien amies, as the King pleads. For, my Lord, if they were alien enemies, and the Book says they are true, as God's law enacts them, then all their contracts and dealings were all absolutely void, they could never have any property. How could they then be guilty of usury? How could any man living be extorted upon by them, to pay any money due to them upon contracts, or bargains, unless these men were treated as alien amies? How could they have the benefit of their contracts, as other alien amies have? So that I take it, that is a strong evidence that they were treated as alien amies; otherwise it is impossible that which you say could be true. That they could hurt the King's people by extortion and uttermost contracts; when, according to your law, they were not able to make any contracts, or have any property at all: Is it possible the King could take away their estates that had none? And they had some, if your doctrine be true. If any man owed them money, they could not recover it, because they could not bring any action; and the King could not have it, because it was a void contract made with one not capable of making a contract. So that, my Lord, the influences they make use of, are, I hope, influential and strong arguments against them, not for them. They were taken notice of as alien amies, capable of making contracts, which the King's subjects were never bound to perform, unless they were legal, and they obeyed by them by law. As for these ancient Records in general, time had hidden the knowledge of the laws, and traditions of those times. It is not possible to know what the laws and traditions of those times were, or rightly to distinguish between legal and violent acts.

And so being references from thence to conclude in judgment now, is not for against, or like dependencies, which unless latter times have concurred or agreed with, are only fit to make disorder and confusion.

Secondly, But that which is deducible from hence, is not, as I conceive, what has been endeavored.

That they had no property, because the Princes of those times took from them their estates when they pleased, and taxed them how or in what manner they pleased.

But perhaps the reason was, that these people being under the Turks, and being a vagrant people, without Head, Prince, Governor or Country, it was no difficulty to tax or take from them at pleasure, being hand of the people when they lived.

But it could not be as they would have it, that they should be amongst us alien enemies; for an alien enemy can neither make bargain nor contract, nor be capable of property.

But the subjects may, at will and pleasure, fall upon and take all that he has to his own use, as upon the King's enemy; and what he can take from him is his own acquisition, as the price of his adventure, and conquest over his enemy.

The Books cited 12 E. IV. 3. & 7. prove this.

But by what is alledged by them, that they were great usurers, and had great estates, it is evident, that they were here treated as alien amies: How could they live in such multitudes live amongst us? How could they be usurers, and get riches, if they could not make contracts? How is it possible they could preserve their bodies or estates against the King's subjects, unless they had the King's protection, and were treated as alien amies? And of latter times, how many of them have lived amongst us, driven great trades, have had, and have at this time, considerable estates?

Let it now be alledged, that any man thus will, may take away their estates: that they can have no remedy or action for their debts owing to them, but instead thereof may be beaten or imprisoned as enemies to the King.

And we shall probably see, what the success of such a judgment will be. My Lord, that they are taken notice of and handled as other aliens, without any distinction between alien enemy and alien Infidel, I would offer this as an argument. The question, I confess, is new, and to there is not much that I can find in our Books about it, but the Act of Navigation made in the 12th year of this King, a year before this Charter now in judgment before you, concerning trade, shews, that Infidels have the same liberty of trade as Christians; that Act being made for license of shipping and navigation (it is a. 18.) prohibiting goods to be imported by any foreign Ship, except those of that same Country where the goods do grow, and distinguishing not between Infidel and Christian Countries, but expressly says, That we overseas, our commodities of the growth, produce, or manufacture of any of the Christian, Infidel, Dominion or Territory, in the Ottoman or Turkish Empire: And does enact, That no goods shall be imported from that Country, but in our Ships, or Ships of the Country of which the Goods are, and doth say to be sailed by a Master, and three or more of the same Country. This must be an assistance and an allowance, that the masters and mariners of that Country have the same freedom and privilege of trade that other foreign aliens have; and then it plainly shews, that the Infidels of the Turkish Empire have liberty of trade here.

My Lord, the Act for coinage and pawnbroys has general and void impositions as upon the commodities of all Infidel Countries, without any distinction, brought in by, or with any manner of distinction. So that I think, that this opinion of a difference between alien Infidel and alien Christian, was not taken notice of, nor known, nor thought of, till now: For, my Lord, if it had, it is unlikely the Act of Navigation should provide and give allowance, for the masters and mariners of Infidel Countries to come hither with Goods, when by Law they could never come in, but were enemies, and to be knocked on the head if they did.

My Lord, pray let us consider of late times what a number of Jews have lived amongst us; should we declare thus for Law as this day, that the people ought to take them as alien enemies, strip them, plunder them, knock them on the head, kill them, and say them, what would be the consequence? What work would this make? For if this be true, what they affect that they are perpetual enemies, then we can have no peace with them; whoever owes a Jew any thing may play the Jew with him, never pay him; whoever has a mind to any thing he has, may take it away from him; if he has a mind to beat him, and knock him on the head, he may, there is no protection for him, nor peace with him.

My Lord, I do believe that 'tis true, that the Jews being under the Turks, and having been a vagrant people for so long a time, and having no Prince to defend them, it is probable, they have been made havoc of, and our Kings and Princes have made bold to do with them according to their own pleasures; though what is recorded of us, is so long ago, that it is hard to know the whole truth: But I think they are no precedents to be followed now, unless they had been followed by a sanction of practice and authority in our Books of Law: for otherwise many times a man might argue of old Books from dark things to darker, as long as he will, and never make any thing clear. In the case of Sunderland and Hesse, there was occasion for this to be taken notice of, if this opinion had been true Law. It is reported in 2 Cr. 2. 463. A man employed another to sell Jewels in Barbery for him, and the other person did sell them as your Jewels, when indeed they were counterfeit, and not above 1000 value to the King of Barbery for 3000. and the other person finding himself cheated, imprisoned the plaintiff that sold them to him, and he repayed him his money; and he brought an action upon the promise that employed him to sell them. It would have been of use in this case, if the contract and sale, and the lawfulness of carrying in trade by Christians with Infidels had been questionable, for the Defendant in that action had have urged against the Plaintiff, What reason had he to sue him? For what had he to do to go amongst the King's enemies? and he ought not to recover damages for any such thing. I say, it would have been of use, if any such point of Law had at that time been in thought of.

In that case, it was of all sides admitted, and but so much as objected, that this contract was void, because the King of Barbery was an Infidel.

So that this opinion, that Infidels are perpetual enemies, and in perpetual hostility, can maintain no action, nor have any property amongst us, has no authority for its foundation, but only some extraordinary sayings, without debate or consideration; and so it is against the constant practices of Princes and People at all times.

Perhaps it is an small part of religion, that men should speak, and deal plainly and uprightly one with another.

We know that religion too often has been made a cloak and veil for other ends and purposes. It should not be so, and I hope will not be so to us in this case.

My Lord, the Statutes that I have cited, they have made no manner of distinction between Infidels and Christians in manner of trade; and it is hardly to be thought, especially as to force of the latter ones, but that there was made with Infidels then: For it is scarce to be thought that our Princes should go thither only with forces in their hands, or make war upon them, and afterwards to make peace with them, and no notice be taken of the law about trade concerning Infidels.

The Statute I have cited of Magna Charta, cap. 9. E. III. 25. E. III. 2. and 12 E. III. all declare and enact the freedom of trade, in all general words, except only such as are in war with the King: In none of them is there any exception of trade with Infidels.

My Lord, we had no trade with Turkey or Barbary? Our Kings were with amity to the King of Spain, and Richard had made war and peace with the Turks: Had we no trade there but with our friends?

But to look nearer home, Spain and Portugal were Infidels, and in the hands of the Moor, in the year 1494, which was 14 E. IV. Can it be thought that in all their times between Magna Charta, H. III. and E. IV. we had no trade with Spain and Portugal?

Stat. 12. H. VII. cap. 6. was made in the year 1497, which was but 23 years after the Moor were driven out, and in that Statute 'tis enacted, that the Merchant adventurers, dwelling in divers parts of England, out of London, did desire, That whereas they had their free passage, merchandise, and return, with the King of Spain, and Merchandise, in diverse ways and ports beyond the Seas, as now into Spain, Portugal, France, Denmark, Lapland, and Friesland, and divers and many other Regions and Countries, in hope and amity with the King, that they were inspired upon by a Company of Merchants in London, and forced to pay duties.

I only make use of the motto, to prove the free passage there mentioned to Spain and Portugal, and to other Regions and Countries.

There is an distinction of Infidel Countries from Christian Countries, though Spain and Portugal had been so lately Infidels.

'Tis most probable the trade they had then was with Turkey and Barbary, as well as with Spain: The words after Regions and Countries seem to imply as much, and the freedom equal.

So that, I think, as to this objection, That Infidels are perpetual enemies, that we can have no peace with them, or they maintain any action, or have any property by our law; I think the authority to maintain it none at all. The constant practice, as well by Princes as People, is constantly against it.

The

The Charters that they have cited to Barbery and other places, none of them are before the fall of these Statutes, nor is the Statute of K. Henry, and yet there is no difference taken notice of there between Christian and Infidel Countries: So that, my Lord, taking all together the light, or at least the weak authority of their sayings and occasional difficulties, from this distillation of Infidel or Christian, in point of trade, will signify but little; and the constant practice of all our time, wherein we have any sort of trade; and the arguments drawn from the Records that have been cited of the Year having property and allowance to live amongst us, and our dealings with foreign nations taken notice of in our Acts of Parliament, without such distinction, seems to be a practice to quite contrary to their sayings, that are perhaps taken out of some zealous Catholic Authors of these superstitious times, rather than conforming to the rules of Law, that they can be no foundation for this distinction; especially considering that Spain and Portugal, as I said, 'till the middle of Edward VIth's time, were possessed by Infidels; and yet I cannot but think they must be traded with, and so men can find any thing of the distinction but only out of these occasional sayings in Cassia's case.

But be that point of trading with or without licence (which I mentioned before) how it will, yet I conceive that point will never be sufficient to ground this same sole trade, or to found a Monopoly upon; that cannot warrant a Grant of a sole trade, sole buying and sole selling, to be granted to you and your successors, your sons, servants, apprentices, factors, and such as you shall license for ever: There is a licence and grant in perpetuity, not as to those that then were, but to their sons and successors; and those whom they shall license, and this into a very great part of the World.

And by the same reason all Turky and Barbery, a great part of the West-Indies, and other places of the World, may be monopolized; and perhaps all Christian Countries.

The Statute of Monopolies has no allowance or exception for Monopolies to Infidel Countries; that is, against all sole buying, sole selling, or sole using of any thing.

And the Turky trade was used long before that time, as by Charter, granted 33 Edw. So was the Barbery trade, as by the Charter thereof; and I believe to the East-India also.

And the Statute of Monopolies being in general (the Prerogative not reasonably conceivable to except this Company out of the extent of that Statute, which all Patents that may be granted to Companies of Monopolies, are by that exception or Prerogative out of the Statute) and delivering for the suppressing of great evils as Monopolies are, and always have been accounted.

I hope it will not be avoided upon any imaginary difference in Law, between Infidel and Christian Countries to monopolize thereby the trade, perhaps of the greater part of the World, as Turky, Perfia, Barbery, East and West-Indies; for the West-Indies, I think, the greater part are Papists.

My Lord, I have looked over the cases that were here, and the debates that have been printed in 31 and 4th of King Charles I. about the King's Power of imposing rates and subsidies, and impositions upon merchandizes, in Dato's case in the Exchequer, 4 Car. I. 2. Id. 13. and Mr. Rymer's account of the debates in Parliament at that time about that matter: many things there had concerning the King's Power of restraining and prohibiting of trade, and the Writ Ne Exeat Regnum. And from their reason, they that argued for the King, upon reasonableness of impositions upon merchandize. That case arose from an imposition upon Cannons, and methinks if there had been known any such distinction, as they would here intimate, it had been of great use in that case as well as this; but throughout the Arguments and Reasons there debated, they did never make any distinction between Infidel and Christian, but native and foreign commodities; and did endeavour to have a prerogative in imposing rates upon them; and the reasons were these, and all the Arguments run thus: The King can prohibit and restrain any Merchant to go out of the country by Writ, Ne Exeat Regnum; the King can prohibit any foreign commodities to be imported; then none can go out without licence, nor import without licence, and consequently it is a legal thing, when this licence is granted upon the payment of such a duty or imposition, or under such a rate as can be agreed on between the King and the Merchant; and therefore such an imposition or rate is lawful.

These were the arguments in that case, and in these arguments it appears that a restraint in consequence does import a tax, rate or farm, for a disposition of what that restraint is.

For if licences be requiring, it is worth consideration, whether that will not introduce the imposing of rates without Parliament, or otherwise than as a parliamentary way. This, I say, is worthy consideration. Suppose it true, these have been licences to go into Infidel Countries to trade; so there have been to go beyond the Sea, and have been to other trade besides that: yet it does not follow as a true consequence, that it is unlawful to go or trade without licences; much less does it follow from thence, that such a Patent as to any one or few Subjects, or to such a Corporation, to have the whole and sole trade into any place, and power of licensing others, can be warranted by it.

I do not question, but that King Charles I. might have the privilege of Merchants and Merchandize in some cases, and to embargo Ships in some cases.

But there are upon special reasons; as,

First, In the case of War.

Secondly, In the case of such Merchandizes as are necessary for the defence or safety of the Kingdom, to restrain their Exportation.

Thirdly, In case of a plague from particular places to import, But then these prohibitions are general, and their particular reasons and grounds are apparent.

But if under any pretence any sole trade to some one person, Body Politick or Natural, be granted, excluding all others; that Grant, I conceive, is in deceit of the King, and to the prejudice of his Subjects, and void.

Never has such a Grant hitherto had any judicial allowance; nay, so far from that, that as far as I could observe, no opinion has been till within four or five years, that such Grants were good to exclude others, nor any action or suit ever advertised before now, to be brought upon any such ground.

So that, my Lord, as to this great point, both the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and the Statute of Monopolies, with submission, are against this Grant of the sole trade; and the distinction between Infidel Countries and Christian, is in this, and upon this a bottom, that I hope it will never be strong enough to bear the weight of to grant a conference as to this. For though at present Infidels be distinguished from Christians, yet from their arguments and kind of reasons, they must be reluctant of going beyond Sea and trading, Spain and Portugal may be brought in, and France too; and so the argument will run from Infidel or Christian at length, and I know not where it will stop.

So I humbly leave that point to your Lordship's judgment, whether such a Grant of a sole trade, appears to be such a Grant, as in good accordance to Law; and whether or no, notwithstanding what they have said, it does not appear by the old Common Law, and the old Statute Law, and by all our late Acts of Parliament, to be in Law a valid Grant?

The next thing, my Lord, I come unto, is the second point, which I shall be best thought to answer, I have taken up much of your time, and I beg your Lordship's pardon for it, because if I mislike not, it is a most weighty point in the consequence of it. But then supposing and admitting these Grants to be a good Grant, whether or no, can you maintain this action? If the Law should be so, that the Defendant ought not to have traded there without licence, then he may be punishable at the King's fall, by fine and imprisonment; but that you should maintain an action against him, what cause of action, what damage of loss to you, have you laid in your declaration? You say, in your declaration, that the Defendant Swam, and being a Member of your Company, not a Son, Father or Servant, not Agent of your Company, traded into the East-India in the places within the limits of your Charter, and has there brought various and bargained and sold merchandizes, and imported and sold them in England, against the will of the Company, and to their prejudice and impoverishment, against the form of their Charter, and to the Company's damage 1000 l.

First, You have not alleged in all your declaration, whether or no he had a licence from the King, and that is night: for I think, that the King is pleased to give in his Letters Patent, he will not grant licences without leave of the Company, yet he may do so, if he please, notwithstanding that Grant.

Secondly, Then you have not shewn any loss or damage you have had by his trading thither: did he buy so much of the merchandize of the country, as not to give them sufficient for you to furnish your Ships withal, so that they came hence empty? No such thing is alleged. Did he hence export to sell there so much merchandize, as not sufficient for you here to buy? Or, did he bring hence home so much, as that there were not houses sufficient for his Goods and yours all? There are no such things alleged; or in the truth so, as that hereby your importing your prices upon your commodities, selling at your own prices, and excluding what you thought fit, was hindered; and for this you would maintain an action.

I think it will be the first time, that ever a man recovered damages for being hindered from importing and selling his own price, or having the advantage of his Monopoly, or for trading for you to furnish your Ships withal, and under selling his own commodities and merchandizes lower than the Plaintiff can afford them.

You agree by your own declaration, that there are many others that are concerned as well as you: you say, you have the sole trade to yourselves; your Factors, your Servants and your Sons, as soon as they come to twenty-one; all that are of your Company, all that you grant licence to, all that you shall assign your trade to; all those have an interest, if you can maintain an action. Other people have trade there as well as you, can they maintain an action?

A Commoner may bring an action upon the case against a stranger, for putting his Cattle into the Common, provided so the Plaintiff do recover by the law; but the Commoner has not sufficient Common as before, and have a damage, otherwise he can maintain no action.

In Robert Mealy's case, 9 Car. II. it is there resolved, That for every feeding of the beasts of a stranger in a Common, the Commoner shall not have an action or action upon the case; but an action does lie, if the feeding be such, that the Commoner cannot have common pasture for his own beasts; and then it is the consequence, the loss of his Common, that gives him cause of action.

In an action alleged in the declaration, that your trade was anything the worse. No damage appears to you by it: What reason, that you should recover damages, when you have not furnished any loss? And you have it then contains to cause of action; how can your declaration be good?

You should now, if you would have made a declaration, that should have intitled you to a cause of action, have shewn how you suffered by Swam, a stranger trading to the East-India; that he bought up all, and you could have nothing; for if he left enough for you, what hurt have you? What reason is there you should recover damages, if you have not furnished any loss? And if you allege none in your declaration: How is your declaration, that there is no such loss, maintainable?

In the case of Monopolies, 13 Car. II. Robt. Mealy 1st part fol. 106. The last point in this case is a full authority in this point: That admitting the Monopoly to be good, for the making and selling of Cane, that was granted to Dewey for 13 years, yet no action would lie in that case, though the Defendant did, contrary to this Patent, sell Cane. Adjudged that it was a Monopoly, and Patent void: that if the Patent had been good, yet no action would have lain against the Defendant upon it.

My Lord, if that be so as it is declared to be in that case, in the last point resolved by the Judges, if that action would not lie there, this will not lie; supposing his Charter to be never so good, and the Defendant has done contrary to it.

My Lord, there is only one other reason for which the action will not lie; and that is grounded upon the Letters Patent, as they are granted to you. For by the Letters Patent, it is not absolutely, but Ad vasa granted; that you shall have the sole trade, and that no other person shall trade there, under pain of forfeiting ship and goods, or half to the King, another half to the Company. So that, my Lord, the words of restraint are not absolute, but only under such a penalty and forfeiture.

Now, my Lord, if I should suppose this Patent to have all the force and strength that they can desire; supposing that this Patent were in an Act of Parliament, passed in this manner, that did restrain all persons from trading to the East-India, except the Company, under pain of forfeiture of ship and goods; under favour, you that will have advantage of this refusal, much like it in that manner as the Act does give it; you shall not have any other penalty or punishment, but what the Act gives. If or when any new Law is made, you must take it as it is, and so otherwise, till another new Law be made. And so is the Rule in C. 7. p. 11. Co. 56. b. 59. Plowd. Com. 206. It cannot be altered without a new Law.

And I would but only suppose upon the Statute of Edw. VI. that gives the owner of either public damages against him that lets them out to third; a man brings an action upon the case, would that be well? No, he must take the Law as it is; such an action never was brought, nor if brought, could be maintained; yet here the damages are given to the party.

The like of all other special Statutes, a man must only follow the Peculiar Statute inflicts, so that this action cannot, as I conceive, be maintained. So that, my Lord, taking all together, admitting (who I hope it is not for) that this Patent is a good Patent; yet you are not the sole persons interested, there are others besides you, your Grantees, Factors and Servants, and Servants are to trade there. You have not laid any particular damage, therefore you cannot, by the reason of the case of Monopolies, maintain any such action as this.

And if you will take advantage of this Grant, it is reasonable you should take it as the Grant gives it, good for the furniture of ship and goods, but for the action of the case, your Charter does not give it; nor, if an Act of Parliament had been passed after this manner, would such an action have lain.

So that to conclude,

First, That that which this Company claims in this case by this Patent, to have the sole trade to the East-Indies in their policy action, excluding others, is a Monopoly, and impeding against the Common Law, and the ancient Statutes, and the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jacob. and therefore they have no right to have what they claim.

Secondly, That what the Defendant has done in this case, he has lawfully done, and therefore not to be punished.

Thirdly, That tho' the Company had a lawful claim to the trade in such manner, as in their declaration is set forth, and the Defendant done what he ought not, yet they cannot maintain this action.

And upon the whole matter, whether best for the Company to have judgment for them or against them, may deliver their thoughts.

But this being in great in the consequence, as the whole trade of the Kingdom depending upon it, I have laboured the more.

The ancient Laws, the ancient ways, is what I endeavour, and against new ways upon any pretence whatsoever.

And therefore, my Lord, I humbly beg your judgment for the Defendant.

Lord Chief-Justice. Do you intend to have another Argument in it, Gentlemen?

Mr. Solicitor-General. What your Lordship pleases.

Lord Chief-Justice. It is a case of great weight and consequence, perhaps, as ever any case, that has come into Exchequer. I must needs say, it has been extraordinarily well argued on both sides; and it must be necessarily taken notice of as a point of great consequence, wherein the King's prerogative, and the privileges of the East-India Company, and this joint trade, are concerned on the one side; and the benefit of particular persons, and the liberty of free, unobscured trading is concerned on the other: and it is fit these should be all the considerations, and all the deliberation upon a matter of this great moment, that possibly can be.

I cannot be so wonderfully captivated with the differences, that have been made between the Charter to the East-India Company, and those to the Turky Company and the others; and that I have seen much more in the defence of Charters and Corporations, than I am of opinion there is in such great matter of consideration due to them; but I take the Common Law to be the best Law in the World. For that Charter, that you Mr. Pelley defended here to be brought after judgment given against it; the Corporation became as voidable within a few days, as you say this way, so does could be it, tho' there were days that went to wait upon that Corporation, but came away as empty as they went; and I with the days were like to be as well furnished from the one, as they are from the other; and therefore there can be no great matter in that. But there is another thing that very much deserves consideration, it is a question wherein trade is highly concerned; we know we have a potent Neighbour, who has both experience and industry, and are our rivals in this trade; I wish we had as much industry, and were as diligent as they; they have found by long experience, that a Joint-Stock is the only way to carry on their trade, I mean Holland. And it is very well known, if it had not been for a Joint-Stock, the trade had never been so beneficial as it is. And Mr. Sandy would not have had such a desire to the trade, for it would not have been so well settled and fixed; and therefore, I take it to be a wonderful thing, and to carry a great consequence in it upon that account, that we should consider how this trade comes to be so great, and so desirable. Now that by the Joint-Stock, and industry, and experience of the Company, the trade is become facile and valuable; for particular persons as come and sweep away the advantage of it, that ought to be well considered. Mr. Sandy and his partners are very zealous now to reap the fruits of the Company's labours. But suppose this question should be asked, Will you be contented to come in and pay your proportion of all the charge these people have been at, to put the trade into this capacity it is in? But in fact, after they have reduced it into good condition, as a vast expense and trouble, for other particular persons to come and lay, let us have the benefit of it, that have had nothing of the burden and charge? And when there is another consideration of great consequence, peace and war, no one doubts, are actually in the power of that Prince and People with whom the trade is. I would desire to know, supposing an injury should be committed by any particular person to the Indies, and the ship get away, will not all the rest of the Company's stock, being of the same Nation, be in danger of following by it? Certainly it would, and therefore since they are likely to answer for the wrongs, it is not fit they should have the management of it? So we may, if we come to argue by consequences, easily find out a great many inconveniences on both sides; but they are not to over-rule the Law one way or the other, they are species precedents by way of argument, but the Law is a certain rule, and consequences are not one way or other to over-rule it. The main point truly is a point of great consideration and weight, perhaps as considerable as ever any that has come in debate here, and therefore it is fit, that all due deliberation be taken to have it debated.

Mr. Justice Windsor. Mr. Pelley, you seem to argue that the King's Grant to them is a void Grant, and against Common Law, as being a Monopoly in granting them the sole trade; then that does not come to the point in Albion's case, about trading without Licence with Indies; and therefore you go upon another ground, than what Mr. Sullivan did.

Mr. Pelley. I go upon the particular case here before you.

Mr. Justice Windsor. And you have not given any answer to the Petition of the Commons, cited by Mr. Sullivan.

Mr. Pelley. Truly, Sir, I think, it does not need any answer; for I go chiefly against this Grant, which is against Law, and void.

Lord Chief-Justice. Truly, Mr. Pelley, I am not much in love neither with your other point about the action; in what became, pray, of all the actions that have been brought upon that Statute of Monopolies, by the Patience of new inventions, as there has been multitudes in my Lord Hale's time, and at all times?

Mr. Pelley. In this case there is no body but the particular Grantee, that has that invention; and he brings the action. But here, of your own showing, you have intitled others to the trade, as the servants, and factors, and children; and therefore you can never have such an action.

Lord Chief-Justice. When will you have it argued again?

Mr. Pelley. We shall be ready for the Defendant next Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. That is a little too soon, there's but a very short Vacation, and thus is but a short Term; I think you had best have another argument in Albion's Term.

Mr. Solicitor-General. Yes, if your Lordship pleases.

Mr. Pelley. What your Lordship pleases, we shall be ready, if your Lordship pleases to hear us next Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. I know Mr. Sandy is in very great haste; but the seal and transport of any particular person must not think to oblige us to go hand over head in a case of this great weight and moment; there is great consideration to be had of the length of time that this Company has continued; there has been an East-India Company as King Jacob's time, in the last King's time, and in this King's time.

Mr. Justice Windsor. And here is a great trade settled, we must not destroy it presently.

Lord Chief-Justice. We must not gratify the seal and transport of Mr. Sandy, by being over-hasty in this matter.

Mr. Pelley. My Lord, we shall be well content to stay till Albion's Term.

Lord Chief-Justice. Ay, I know the Counsel well; but whether your Client will or no, I cannot well tell, nor do not much care. Well, we will consider of it, and hear another argument in Albion's Term.

Mr. Attorney-General (Sir Robert Saenger) his Argument.

The Governor and Company of Merchants of London, trading to the East-Indies, Plaintiffs. Thomas Sandy, Defendant.

De terminis S. Michaelis, Anno Regni Regis 36 Car. II. xxi. Anna Domini 1684.

IN an action upon the case brought by the Company against the Defendant, for trading into the East-India contrary to their Grant, in prejudice of their trade, and to the damage of 1000 l.

It comes before the Court upon the Plaintiffs' decurser to the Defendant's Plea of the Statute of 15 Edw. III.

The Record having been so often opened at large, I shall only put it as a Case upon the Record.

The King by his Letters Patent, 31st April, 23 Car. II. reciting that the Company had long been a Company, and enjoyed great liberties and privileges under the Charters of Queen Elizabeth and King Jacob, grants the Company the sole trade and traffick to the East-Indies, being an inland country; with a prohibition to all others of his subjects to trade thither, without the leave and licence of the Company.

The Defendant not qualified as the Charter directs, without the leave of the Company, and against their wills, trades to the East-Indies, to the prejudice and damage of the Company's trade.

Upon this case, the points which have been moved and argued, are two.

First, Whether the Letters Patent giving licence to the Company to trade into the East-Indies, and to exercise the sole trade there, with prohibition to all others to trade thither, be good in Law.

Secondly, Whether admitting the Patent good, this action will lie for the Company?

In debating of the first point, I shall not go about to maintain the validity of their Letters Patent, or any such of like nature, to bind up the King from granting licence to other of his subjects as he shall please; but shall content myself, to show that all the subjects not licensed by the King, nor authorized by the Company (as the Defendant is nor) are bound by these Letters Patent.

Where the question will be between the King's prerogative (and that in one of the highest points thereof, which concerns the defence and preservation of his Kingdom), and the intercourse with foreign Nations, on the one side; and the general liberty of trade, which is a tender point, and nearly concerns the interest of his subjects, on the other side.

It therefore being a question of great consequence, and of greater consequence than difficulty, as I hope to them; I shall, in examining into the point, use the utmost caution, by affecting the King's just prerogative in this matter, and not in deprecat the subjects true liberty of trade.

The subject matter of this question, only relating to a foreign trade with Indies, not in trade with the King of England, doth not necessarily oblige me to enter into the consideration of any other trade, trade, or of the King's prerogative, or the subjects liberty in relation thereto.

Which would much shorten my stay in supposing these Letters Patent, and the trouble the Court is like to receive thereby.

But because the great force of the arguments made use of on the other side against these Letters Patent, have been drawn from principles and precedents of Law, which concern as well the inland trade and traffick of this Kingdom, as with other Christian Nations in amity with the King of England, with whom leagues of commerce have been made by our Kings, or to whom a common trade hath been laid open by several particular laws:

It is made necessary for me, from the other side, a little to consider these trades, and how far the subjects liberty or the King's prerogative be concerned in them.

Whereby it will appear, that the arguments and authorities produced by the defendant's Counsel, will be of no great force to impeach these Letters Patent for the management of a foreign trade with India.

I shall therefore briefly consider the inland or native trade within the Kingdom, and then the foreign trade with other Nations.

The inland trade is either for manufactures or other kindred.

Under the name of manufactures falls in the husbandry, and all sorts of industry, who have full right by the Common Law, to exercise what, and as many trades as they please (so as no inconvenience happen to the neighbourhood). And with this right the King's prerogative is little concerned, it cannot set it out, it being their livelihood.

Nor is the public weal otherwise concerned therein, than that all its members should live by their honest labour and industry. As to the trade of merchants, or inland commerce, every man (generally speaking) might buy of any man, whether native or foreign, and of many kinds or sorts of merchandise as he pleases, which I take to have been the Common Law before 37 Ed. III. cap. 5. whereby all trading Merchants were restrained to one sort of merchandise.

But that Act continued not long, being repealed 38 Ed. III. cap. 2.

Yet that trade of inland merchandise by order several restrictions as Common Law. 1. Notwithstanding such general liberty of buying and selling, as man could ingo of any one commodity. 2. The ancient Common Law confined this sort of trade to certain places, as Towns, Cities, or other public places appointed by the King, Ch. 3. 1st. 19. 19. in the Chap. Prohibiting.

It was punishable to buy above the value of twenty pence elsewhere, or to asseign merchandise before they arrived at these places.

3. No abilities could be held for the traffick of buying or selling, without the King's licence, or for the free Haubers and Fairs are held by prescription, (the original Grants not appearing) yet these were derived from the Crown, by some royal licence before time of memory: they all depend upon the same Crown, and may be forfeited to the Crown.

This is so frequent in our Books, I need not cite the authorities. And here the prerogative of the Crown had a great stroke.

The inland traders, in buying and selling, might buy and sell in private places, and could not be restrained: But they could not hold assemblies for trade without the King's leave and licence; Fairs, Markets, and Bazaars, in their true notions, being no other than royal licences to assemble for trade and traffick.

And I take the Law to be the same, whether the Fair or Market be erected only, and not granted to any one; and where it is granted to a subject, all the King's subjects have a liberty and right of trafficking there, and cannot be prohibited by the Lord of the Fair or Market.

The reason of these restrictions of the inland trade of merchandise, and the King's prerogative therein, is from the concern the public peace and justice of the Kingdom both in this sort of trade, more than in the former; the manifold ways, and many manner of cheats by false weights and measures, corrupt merchandises, and too great enlarging of the prices, and breaches of the peace, occasioned by public concourses, tho' under colour of trade and traffick.

And upon this ground the Common Law provides, That to all such Licences for public Markets, which the King may grant when and where he pleases, being not to the damage of others before granted, a Court of Justice is incident of common right, for preservation of the public peace and correction of such debts which generally attend the trade of merchandising.

Finally, There was another restriction upon the inland merchandising taken notice of in our Books, which was more particular, and to certain places, viz.

The claim of foreign bought and foreign sold, by several Cities, Towns and Ports, some by custom, and others by Charters; and there is no great question to be made, but before 9 Ed. III. cap. 1. the Charters as well as Customs did prevail for that Liberty, but both were taken away by the Statute, and divers subsequent laws taken notice of in the case of the City of London, Ch. 8. 1st. 128.

And between that and 9 H. IV. there were great brawlings in Parliament between the foreign Merchants and the City of London, and other Towns, about this Custom.

Till at length, London prevailed for a private Act of Parliament for establishing of the Customs, which they have enjoyed ever since 9 H. IV. 30.

By an ancient Record of Henry III. it appears, that the abbots, and others the religious of the County of London, under colour of selling their Stann, which arose upon their demesne lands, turned Merchants, and bought up wools, and sold them with their own wools: They were prohibited so to do by a Writ out of the Chancery.

And upon this complaint of the Merchants of London, in the time of Edward I. the like Writ of Prohibition issued, Plu. Per. in the Appendix, cap. 10. By which it appears, that the inland traffick of the Kingdom, which was within the care and cognizance of the Common Law, was not unlimited, nor the subjects liberty therein never so large as it is now inflated upon, to all foreign parts whatsoever.

And that the managing of the principal part of the home traffick, which Vol. VII confists in the Ports, Fairs, and Markets of the Kingdom, depends upon the King's prerogative, and is managed under it, the Law having intrusted the King with that power for the benefit of his people, and the peace of the Kingdom.

In the next place, I will take a view of the foreign trade.

The Common Law, and our Law-books, take notice of but two sorts of Foreigners, alien friends, and alien enemies; Calver's Case, Ch. 7. 17.

Neither can there be any other sort of Foreigners, generally speaking, for if the question arise, whether alien Friend, or alien Enemy, it is as it be used by the leagues with the Prince, whose subject he is; which is, or ought to be enquired in Glancy. And tho' there be not actual war or fighting between the two Princes and their Subjects, yet they are plain ally, and may allege arms when they please, and seize the goods and persons of each other's Subjects.

I shall first consider what the Common Law determined as to the Subjects trade and traffick with alien Friends beyond the seas, and upon what foot that trade stands; and then particularly consider how it determines in case of Commerce with alien Enemies, and accidentally of Infidels.

I conceive the Common Law hath made no express provision, nor given any absolute right for the Subjects to trade with any Foreigners beyond the seas.

It will be of little use to discourse how far the Law of Nations intervenes in this matter: whether every Nation be obliged to entertain Trade and Commerce with another Nation.

And antecedent to all leagues and treaties for Commerce, little will be found besides the laws of Hospitality, which do not give any demandable right.

Bohm, in his Book de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 6. 7. says, Quo tempore non gubernator est inductus prohibere, tenet esse a Principibus voluntate.

And in his Book de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 6. holds, That it is lawful to forbid Foreigners from entering the borders, not only if a war be in fact, but in time of peace, these manners of the Infidels may not be corrupted by civility with Europeans.

And in his Book de Repub. lib. 1. cap. 6. 7. That the Laws of Commerce are contained in the particular compacts and agreements of people and Princes.

What Bohm declares to be the Law of Nations, exactly agrees with the Laws of this Kingdom; for all Strangers come either under safe-conducts, which contained both the King's licence and protection of them.

The King might inhibit Foreigners from coming into the Realm, and might restrain them where.

Magna Carta, cap. 30. which is a general safe-conduct to Merchants—It is the King's prerogative to the King, not public prohib.

My Lord Coke, in his Comment upon this Chapter, 2 Id. 5. 7. admits they might have been prohibited before this Statute, but constitutes the fixing of this Prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Which Constitution, as it is without any former Precedent or Authority, so it is against the constant stream of Precedents and Practice ever since.

Rat. Clauf. 23 H. III. 1st. which was after this Statute, the King sent his writs to several Mayors, commanding that all the Merchants, who came, should depart the Kingdom within a month.

And in the same Roll, 2d. there is another Writ to the Mayor of London, giving leave to Ramon, Bisconne, and some other Merchants, to buy till the feast of St. Martin in the year following.

And the constant practice in every King's reign since, hath both been by proclamation and orders of Council, to command foreigners to depart the Realm.

Besides, the construction my Lord Coke puts upon it, makes the clause idle and superfluous.

That one Act of Parliament should provide for a saving by a subsequent Act, which of itself would be repealed by the former.

So where an Act of Parliament prohibited foreigners to come in, the King by a private Council might have licensed them.

The Commons, in the Parliament a H. V. pray, That the Statute made by Henry IV. for avoiding of Strangers out of the Realm, might be put in execution. The King grants it, saving his prerogative so far as he pleases. The Commons reply, Their intention was not to abridge, nor ever should be by the Grace of God, a H. V. No. 15. Roll. Prolegation, 180.

This might further appear by the several Statutes made for the inviolable observation of the King's safe-conducts, which are in express words mentioned to extend to alien enemies, as well as alien friends; 2 H. V. cap. 6. and 30 H. VI. cap. 1.

It is held in Heve and Py's Case, Hill 21 and 22 Car. Swords, Bona Regis, Seymour. That as Common Law the King might prohibit the importation of foreign commodities, before the Statutes therefore made.

So then as the safe conduct at Common Law, foreign Princes and Nations might prohibit the subjects of England to trade with them, as the King might prohibit foreigners to trade here.

The King might inhibit any of his subjects from going beyond sea. And this might have been by particular Writ or general Proclamation.

Our Books and Precedents are so full in this point, that it was admitted on the other side, that there could not be produced any authority that renders it the least questionable, but undoubted as far it.

Rat. Clauf. 23 H. III. 1st. A Writ to the Sheriff of York, to seize the bodies and lands of such as had gone beyond sea, contrary to the King's Inhibition.

Rat. Clauf. 41 Ed. III. 1st. 24. 1st. Writs to all the maritime towns to take care that a Proclamation prohibiting all his subjects (except not 4 Merchants, and these unnamed) be put in execution.

Herby it is evident, that it was penal to go beyond sea, contrary to the King's Inhibition, before the Statute of 5 R. II. cap. 2.

All that that Statute adds to strengthen the King's Inhibition, is only a point of further penalty, viz. A forfeiture of the Goods of the said person, and of the Vessel of the Matter exporting: And tho' there be three sorts of persons excepted out of that Statute, viz. Lords and other great Men, rich and notable Merchants, and the King's soldiers; yet that Law gave those persons no other liberty than they had before, only leaves them out of the Penalty provided by that Statute.

Y y

That

What I shall add, I only concerning the necessary dependence of that trade upon leagues, in its continuance and regulation; if the league be broken, let the buyers right be what it will, to trade either singly by Grant, or by Act of Parliament, it is forfeited, and after Proclamation made, become unlawful and punishable, as trading with enemies.

The leagues and treaties with foreign Princes for trade and commerce, whereof the sole power is in the King, shall be the subjects of England.

They are the only Laws between Nation and Nation to direct their trade and commerce.

And by the said leagues, trade may be limited to certain places and commodities, or other particulars, as the two Princes shall agree upon, who are the only just rulers of these leagues.

A clear and full influence of this, in the license for trade with Flanders, and the Low Countries, between the Kings of England and the Duke of Burgundy, is hereby the first was settled in Bruges; and that no Wools should be sold in Flanders, but what came out of England; and that no English Cloth should be sold in Flanders, on pain of forfeiture.

22 E. III. Complaint was made in Parliament by the Merchants of several shires, even by the way of Bruges, in refusing our Merchants from selling their Wools to whom they pleased at Bruges; and pray'd remedy.

The King's answer was, that the ordinance of the Staple should be viewed, in that Gracia Regia was, with whom the Patent touching that ordinance was, he calls to him the same with him, and some of the Merchants of the country, who well understood this matter; and the King by advice of his Council would provide remedy; Res. Parl. 22 E. III. no. 10.

22 E. III. Another complaint is made in Parliament against the men of Bruges, for prohibiting the Merchants to buy Staple Wares here, and pray remedy.

The King answers that he will speak with the Flemish Ambassador about it, 22 E. III. no. 13.

8 H. V. A grievous complaint made in Parliament against the men of Bruges, that the English merchants abroad the ancient league, that no Wools but English should be sold in Flanders, and no English Cloth sold there; yet they permitted the Wools of Scotland, Castile, Aragon and Spain, to be sold there, and pray remedy.

The King answers, that he will be made for the alliance.

And upon like complaint, 9 H. V. the Commons pray, the King would please to meet with the Duke of Burgundy, that no other than English Wools should be manufactured there, or that the English might sell their Cloth there.

The King answers, he would treat that the English Cloth might be sold in Bruges, 9 H. V. no. 11, no. 12, no. 13.

But that in his case no little remedy, will arise the Acts of Parliament were made, 25 H. VI. cap. 1. (30 H. VI. cap. 4.) 4 E. IV. cap. 5. for excluding all the commodities of Flanders, until the Duke of Burgundy rescind his proclamation for banishing Cloth out of his Dominion.

These Statutes produced a firm league between the Kings and the Duke of Burgundy, who in the Record is call'd the Duke of Hain, or of the South-land, both the Merchants his subjects, who had long in England obtain'd those names.

By that league a free trade for Cloth was agreed upon for the English Merchants in Bruges, to continue for ever; and the King confirm'd to the Duke, as well the liberties granted by Edw. I. to Merchants-Strangers in general, by his Charta Mercatorum; as that granted by Edw. II. to the Merchants of the South-land in particular: which league was confirm'd in Parliament, 13 E. IV. no. 2.

These leagues may suffice to show the dependence foreign trade hath upon leagues, as to its continuance and regulation.

By this league the Staple in Bruges was taken off, and liberty granted to the English Merchants to sell their Cloths in any part of the Duke's Dominions.

Who these English Merchants were, I shall in this place only make a short remark. That they were the Company of Merchant-Adventurers, resident and located for the better regulation of trade for Wool and Cloth, beyond the Sea, by Letters Patent, 1 Edw. 3. H. IV. and confirm'd by other Letters Patent, 1 Ric. 2. 1 H. V. which I shall speak more largely to, when I come to show the constant position the Crown hath had of licensing Corporation in foreign trade, exclusive to others.

The other foundations, upon which all foreign trade stands, are royal Licences.

I before shew'd that the licence, which the Common Law gave to trade with foreigners, was no sure foundation of trade; because it might by Law be interrupted by the King, and did in its nature import no more than a bare impunity.

But where the King grants licences to his subjects to trade with foreigners, they gain a right of interest to trade according to such licences.

Which are either by Grant only, or by Act of Parliament. I will first consider those, that are singly by the King's Grants.

That as the King may as Common Law prohibit any of his subjects to go beyond sea, so that he may licence them to go for trade or otherwise, is unquestionable.

The Writ of Ne Exeat Regnum, and several forms of licences in the Register, shew, and the privileges of our authorities make it out.

The King may grant such licences, not only where himself may prohibit, but where the Common Law, and Acts of Parliament do prohibit.

Alien Enemies are prohibited by the Common Law to come within the Realm; yet the King may allow them to come by his sole conduct, as fully appears by the Statutes made for the observation of safe-conducts.

And it is observable, that such safe-conducts put the Alien Enemy into the condition of an Alien Amicus, as fully under the King's protection, during the continuance of his safe-conducts.

No subject could seize his goods on anyone his person, but he was punishable to it, both at the law of the King, and of the party.

For before the Statutes made, controversies for trusts and safe-conducts were appointed, appears by a Record of this Court, Polk 13 E. III. Mass Regis, Res. that which I shall have occasion to make use to another purpose.

And that such an Alien Amicus may bring his personal action for debt, or any other, appears by the case of Jake Draper, 3 Statutes, 20 E. IV. pl. 6 Pl. D. and Mass 431.

The King may licence his subjects to trade with enemies prohibited by Common Law.

And for licences to come, go and trade both within and without the Realm, against express Acts of Parliament, the influence are infinite.

But for the better merchandising of these, I shall make use of precedents and authorities, to make out the nature of the King's prerogative in all times, as to matters relating to Foreign Trade.

I shall reduce what I have to offer under three heads.

First, That the Statutes, which were the publick Means for all Merchants to resort to, were at first settled only by the Kings of this Realm, antecedent to any Act of Parliament.

Secondly, That after the Staple was established at Calais by Act of Parliament, the King gave licence to trade to other places, which no subject could do without such licence.

Thirdly, That the regulation and management of Foreign Trade in all cases, where Acts of Parliament have not particularly interposed, have been guided and governed by the King's prerogative, both as point of licence and prohibition.

First Head, As to settling the Staple in the Dominions of foreign Princes, as, in the influence of Bruges; that must be done by leagues, not can it otherwise be.

But the appointing of the Staples in England, or in the Foreign Dominions of the King, was at first by the King alone.

This is expressly to be declared in the recital of the Statute, 2 E. III. cap. 9. whereby Merchants-Strangers, &c. have liberty granted them to trade in England, according to the form of the Gracia Chancery.

By Merchants-Privy, distinguished from Merchants-Strangers, in this Law, are plainly intended the Merchants of the King's foreign Dominions.

The Irish, who by Ordinatio per Statu Eboracien, 27 E. 1. had liberty granted them to traffick into England, so the King gave licence not to go into, nor commerce with Scotland, nor other the King's Enemies.

And the Goygoyers, and other the King's subjects in France, who had direct licence to traffick and sell the goods granted them by the King; as appears by a difference between them and the Londons, decided judicially at Parliament, 20 E. 1. Parl. fol. 180, and 130.

That by Merchants-Privy is to be understood the King's foreign subjects, I collect from the reference this Law hath to Almagre Chancery, which concern'd only foreign Merchants; whereby the King's power to restrain them was refer'd, and consequently was refer'd by this Law; as is taken notice of by an Act not printed, 6 E. III. nov. 20. that the Staple was during the King's pleasure, and the King revoked the Staple, giving Merchants-Strangers liberty to buy any Staple-wares, 1 E. III. Parl. Res. part 2 and Adm. 21.

A Commission issues to the Mayor of London to put in execution the orders made by E. III. for establishing the Staple in several Counties of England, and for the rule and government of Merchants.

By 27 E. III. cap. 1, the Staple was settled in several Towns in England. But that Law had no words to bind the King's prerogative to remove it; and of that opinion was the Parliament, 38 E. III. where the Commons pray that the Staple may always continue in England.

The King answers, it shall continue till the next Parliament.

The first of April in the first year, as the King remitted it to Calais; but 43 E. III. cap. 1, because of a war that broke out with France, it is brought back to the old manner, that it had been removed to Calais by the King, for the profit of the Realm and sale of the Merchants of England.

47 E. III. no. 17. The Commons pray that the Staple may be only kept at Calais, and that no Grant be made in the contrary.

The King answers, that he will appoint the Staple, as by the Council he shall think best.

1 E. II. no. 93. The Commons pray to know where the Staple shall be, if Calais haply be besieged.

The King answers, as such places of the Realm, as were laid off.

By the constitution of these Staples, Merchants were not only licensed, but oblig'd to repair thither, and refin'd to export their Staple-wares to any other place.

And altho' many Statutes were made to fortify and strengthen the Staple, by creating a forfeiture of all Staple-wares, if carried to any other place; yet by the Records I have produced, it is manifest that the sole appointment and ordering of the Staples was in the King, and that by the acknowledgment of several Parliaments.

2 H. V. cap. 6. provides, that merchandises of the Staple shall not be exported to any other place without the King's licence, before brought to the Staple, on pain of forfeiture.

2 H. VI. cap. 4. provides, that all Staple wares shall be carried to Calais, so long as the Staple is there.

And 8 H. VI. cap. 17. provides, that if Merchants export the merchandises of the Staple to any other place, the merchandises shall be forfeit; except the Merchants of Town and France. And cap. 27. several licences granted by the King to export to other places are revoked.

What these Staple-wares were, is fit to be known, they comprehending the greatest part of the native commodities of this Realm, that were merchandisable in foreign parts.

By the Statute of the Staple, 27 E. III. the Staple-wares are Wools, Leather, Woolfells and Lead; to these are added by a Statute made 50 E. III. Tin, Woolsted, Butter, Cheese, & carbers, and many other commodities.

This Statute, tho' it is not printed, yet is taken notice of as a Statute and a Law of the Staple, by the Statute of 5 H. VI. cap. 4. whereby Butter and Cheese are recited to have been made Staple-wares by this Law.

The Record is 50 E. III. no. 20. (or 200.) where the Commons of the Town of Calais pray that the Staple may be holden only there.

Which the King grants, that it shall be holden only there, and no where else beyond sea; as well of all ancient Staple-wares, as of Tin, Woolfells, Butter, Cheese, & carbers, &c.

The Staple was several times remov'd by R. II. but from 21 R. II. it continued at Calais, till that Town was taken by the French.

By all which it is manifest, upon what slender grounds the Statute of 25 E. III. cap. 3. that the Sea be open to all Merchants to pass where they please, was urged and insisted upon to be a Law in force, or so have any influence upon this case.

That the Merchant-Adventurers enjoyed their privileges, and permitted none to trade within their limits, who submitted not to the rule of the Company, and who should not be contributors to their public charges, as is evident from the Stat. 12 H. VII. cap. 6. inflicted on by Mr. Pelregh; but was made use of by him, only for the fullness of part of it contained in the petition presented by the Merchants to the Parliament for their liberty of trade; which, by what I have already showed, could not be true as to the Staple wares, unless they have licences from the King (which in all probability they had) to certain places.

And what is it they pretend to in their Petition? Only freedom to repair, and trade at the four general Marts, which being innately held and proclaimed, was an invitation to all neighbouring Nations to repair thither; and all English Merchants, as well as others, if they had law under no restraint from the Company's Charter, or other Privileges of the King, might have repaired thither with their cloth or other wares, not being staple wares, without offence, so I before admitted.

In case there had been such a right to a free trade to all Nations in any, as the Petition suggests (for as yet the Merchants request force bodily, not to pretend to a free trade with aliens, not in amity, much less with Infidels, when the laws of all Christian Countries adjudge alien enemies):

I had been the proper time for the Parliament to have asserted that right, and adjudged the Patent illegal, as Parliaments have frequently done with Patents which have been against Law. But the Parliament knew no such right, and therefore by the ruling Chief, allowance is given to the Charter; only their unreasonable demands of assistance being refused, and the fine limited to 20 Marks. And accordingly in their Charter afterwards renewed by H. VII. they are obliged to take no more of any price admitted into their Company than to market.

By the Stat. 20 Feb. 1 of a P. & M. entitled a Corporation of Merchants-Adventurers to Wolfe, and Parts adjacent, with licence to trade, and prohibition to others, upon pain of forfeiture of 500000 Marks.

That this sentence might be effected, the Charter is confirmed by Parliament, & c.

The Act takes notice, that several persons, after the trade was found beneficial as the result of the Company, for their peculiar pain, wisely to decay the trade of the Company, contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, as great disorder traded into their parts, to the great detriment of the commonwealth.

Here is a full description (ex parte nomine) of the defendant and his interloping companions.

By the Judgment of the Parliament then, a limited trade, under the order and rule of a Company, as settled by the Crown, was thought most beneficial to the King.

And those that traded contrary to the tenor of the Letters Patent, are reprobated differently, in prejudice of the commonwealth.

So far was the Parliament from thinking all the subjects had a right to trade there.

After the taking of Calais, in the latter end of Q. Mary's reign, Q. Elizabeth and the English Merchants were no doubt in great straits what to do.

For by the Stat. 2 H. VI. all merchandises of the Staple were to be carried to Calais, where the Staple was there, which ceased by the taking of Calais.

But by 2 H. V. no merchandises of the Staple could be exported without the King's licence, till brought to the Staple.

The Queen had no place convenient left for erecting the Staple at, beyond the Wes. And though in R. II's time, when the Parliament demanded where the Staple should be, if Calais were besieged? The King's answer was ready (ver) at such place as England is not left.

Yet now when Calais was taken, such answer would not serve the turn; but the placing of it in England would be useless and ineffectual, and destructive to the Queen's revenues by her customs.

For by several laws made by E. IV. & E. III. of H. VII. most foreign merchandises were prohibited, and great discouragements put upon all foreign Merchants coming into England, but those of the Hear and Wool.

And few foreign Merchants would repair into England to fetch our commodities, when they can bring little to home with but ready money.

And to have granted to every Merchant a general licence, as it would be chargeable to the subject, so it might prove mischievous to the Kingdom, the subjects trading lawfully, without any rule or government, in foreign parts, upon the account of the general law of reprisals, which obtains in all Nations.

Whereby every subject and his goods are liable for the injuries and wrongs committed by any one; which, as the more barbarous Countries, is executed with great liberty.

And therefore Q. Elizabeth in the direction of foreign trade, instead of Staples, for the rule, order and government of Merchants, at certain places, followed the precedents of the Merchants-Adventurers and English Companies, by erecting Corporations of Merchants for the rule and government of the foreign trade.

Which Companies as they are preferred to have a better State to answer for injuries done in foreign Parts, than any single person can be preferred to have.

So in their very constitution are more responsible to the Law for their mismanagement, by Reu. R. R. R., whereby they may lose their liberty of trade.

It is very doubtful whether licences granted for trade to single persons, may be forfeited, they paying an interest, if the licence to go beyond sea, so trade or otherwise, is for a certain time; as most licences were. It is held by the Judges, 2 Ans. Dyer, 156. in the Case of Mr. Barnes and the Duchesse of Arundel, that the licence is not revocable.

The Queen, in her reply, erected many Corporations for foreign trade. I shall mention only some, which have been publicly taken notice of, and see in the following.

By 24 H. 7. Elizabeth, the Queen, by Letters Patent, incorporated several Companies of Wool, and gave them licence to trade into France; and that no sentence should be admitted of the Companies.

The Privilege was not general to her other subjects, but only to the men of Wool.

Vol. VII.

The Company enjoyed their liberties all the Queen's reign, and flourished under them till 4 Jan.

When by Act of Parliament the trade was opened, and general licence given to trade with France, Spain and Portugal, and the dominions thereof, Whereupon a question arose, Whether their Charter was not let aside by a general words of 3 Jac. and therefore 4 Jac. cap. 9. it is enacted, and declared, That the general Act shall not extend to any such licence, or impose any new taxes, or the said Charter, in any of their privileges, liberties or immunities, granted to them by the said Charter; any thing to the said general Act to the contrary notwithstanding.

This Act added no new force to the Charter, but enacted and declared it to be out of the provision of 3 Jac. for general licence to trade into those Countries.

Where, by the Judgment of the Parliament, the Queen's power to grant such Charters is admitted. For if the Patent had been made in Law before 3 Jac. to make an Act of Parliament only to declare it out of the provision of that Law, were idle and useless.

The Queen's subjects, for their licence to fish at Island, paid the Queen a quantity of fish, called compensation-fish, by the Act of Parliament made 5 Hen. cap. 5.

Whereby, for the encouragement of the fishing trade, the purveyors are prohibited to take purveyance of sea-fish, the compensation-fish, payable by the Queen's subjects travelling to Island, at seven pence.

The Patent of the Guineal Company to fish in Gu. uas hold goods, 15 Jac. 1. p. 5. in the Case of the *Taylors of *Island.

This trade, notwithstanding the privileges granted to the Company, was almost lost.

And therefore 23 C. II. cap. 7. that trade is opened, not only to the English, but to all foreigners residing in England.

The East-India Company was erected by Queen Elizabeth, 31 Dec. 41 Elix. and renewed to them and their heirs, 13 Jac. 7. Jac. with prohibition to all others to trade there, and confirmed to them by this King, 13 Apr. 13 C. II. upon which Patent the question arises about a foreign trade, which hath been enjoyed by the Company above 30 years.

In consequence contained the prerogative of the Crown, in all the Charters for foreign trade which have been granted.

Whereas I have shown, the small considerable part of the foreign trade hath in all times been managed under Grants from the Crown, in appointing the staples for Merchants to repair to, in licensing trade to other places, notwithstanding those Staples; and in licensing and prohibiting foreign trade in such Cases where Acts of Parliament had not made special provision.

I now proceed to consider of Royal Licences by Act of Parliament.

It will be infinite to take notice of the several Statutes made relating to foreign trade.

And therefore I shall at this time offer some general observations upon them.

Observ. 1. Upon examining into the ancient laws for foreign trade, it will be found that there are far more laws for restraining the exercise of foreign trade, by Englishmen, than there are for opening of it.

So much, that for a long time when the Staple was in England, they were prohibited, under severe penalties, not to export any staple ware; and when the Staple was removed beyond sea, they were confined to Calais, and such liberty of trade to other places as the Kings from time to time had granted.

And single persons were frequently taken off, though the King's prerogative to grant them was never yet impeached by any Statute.

The great discouragements to them by foreigners first begin in the reigns of E. IV. R. III. and H. VII. But in those Kings reigns, the English were directly held to the Staple, unless licensed by the Kings.

This observation is made out of the several laws I have touched upon, and many others, which are in the Statutes at large that are granted.

Observ. 2. There was never yet any Statute made, that gave a general liberty of trade to Englishmen to or with all Nations; but what were made in general and open manner.

The only law that had any resemblance to any such purpose, was 15 Ed. III. which obliged us, which has been sufficiently already shown to import no such thing; and the several attempts at Parliament to have introduced a greater liberty of trade with foreign Nations, in unity, and the particular laws that have been made for licensing some trades, do fully argue that the law was never understood so intend any such matter, as a general licence to trade every where.

Observ. 3. The several special statutes that have been made for liberty of foreign trade to particular Countries, or for particular commodities, are introductory of a new law, and not derogatory; and do plainly argue the King's right before to prohibit some of them as express terms, others by necessary implication.

I shall instance in some of them, the Stat. 17 Ed. I. Ordinatio Reu. R. R. R., opens the trade from Ireland to England and Wales, for the Irish commodities.

Whereby all Merchants have liberty granted them to import their Merchandises into England, but so that they give good security, that they shall not go unto, nor communicate with our enemies of Scotland, nor others of our enemies.

This law retained the subject of no liberty he had before; and therefore, if the Merchant had before such general liberty, or right to import those commodities, his right of trading would have needed him giving any security; which is not imposed by law, otherwise than as a precedent condition to a right conferred by the Statute.

This law opened the trade from Ireland to England, as well to foreigners as Englishmen; but it extended only to Irish commodities for the exporting of English commodities into Ireland, continued to be managed under the King's licence till Edward III.

And if any did so to the contrary, he was subject to fine and ransom for his contempt, as appeared by 34 Ed. III. cap. 17, whereby the trade is opened for English and other commodities into Ireland.

By that law it is accorded, That all Merchants, as well aliens as denizens, may come into Ireland with their merchandises, and from thence freely to return without fine or ransom.

This law extended not to the English Wool-traders, but only to the aliens and denizens.

In

In the next Chapter, cap. 18. the English are provided for, who had not so large a liberty granted them as the aliens and denizens had. The 18th chap. provides, that the People of England who have a privilege and privileges in Ireland, may bring their corn, beasts, and wools, to the best land of Ireland, and from thence to carry their goods and merchandise into England freely, without imposition.

The liberty of exporting wine Ireland, granted to the English, is restrained both to such English who have lands in Ireland, as also in the ports of the commodities, viz. corn, beasts, and wools only.

But the liberty to export from Ireland is larger, extending to all commodities, according to the latitude of Ordinatio Hibernica, which took in all Irish commodities.

§ 8. Ed. III. cap. 11. The King withs of his grace and sufferance, That all Merchants whomever, shall be at liberty, shall pass into Galicoun to fetch wares; and that the Galicouners, and other aliens, may import wares from the King, that it may be lawful to him, whomever it is adjudged by his Council, to restore of this statute, to his full grace in law for the profit of him and his Common.

This is expressed to be an Act of Grace, and contains a proving of the King's ancient prerogative, 18 H. VI. cap. 3. which I before mentioned: for liberty of exportation of butter and cheese, expressly gave the King's right, provided the King may refrain the same when it shall please him.

To pass by many ancient Statutes of like nature, the Act of tonnage and poundage, 12 C. II. which gives liberty of exporting divers commodities, which the Kings of England might in all times prohibit, as to gunpowder, arms and ammunition, expressly gives the King's right, to prohibit by Proclamation.

§ 7. cap. 6. which is the largest licence for foreign trade that was ever given to any Englishman in Parliament, by opening of the trade to Spain, Portugal, and France, and the dominions thereof, fully proves the King's prerogative in this matter, both in the rule and body of the Act.

The title of the Act is, As the King doth enable all his Majesty's loving Subjects of England and Wales, to trade freely into the dominions of Spain, Portugal, and France.

A very improper Title, if so be the King's Subjects were before enabled to do it, and had a right to do it by the Common Law, as is pretended, and would not be restrained from it by the King.

And no doubt can be made, if such right had been, but the Parliament would have seen it, being very inquisitive at this time into all the Subjects rights, and very jealous left any of the ancient rights of Englishmen should be invaded by K. James coming from another Nation, and would not have complimented the King with the title of an enabling law.

The reason from the body of the Act is fitting; the reason offered for such general liberty are only policy, none drawn from the right or any ancient usage the English could pretend to.

The Act in its several clauses, That by the Letters Patent for incorporating this Company to trade into Spain and Portugal, in which their Subjects were employed and disbursed from the free enlargement of ancient traffick into those dominions.

Which were not true, if the other Subjects had before a right to trade there, but the patent would have been void against them.

3. There are no declarative words of any former right, but only of enabling, and pre-fusion for a future liberty, viz.

That it shall, and may be lawful from henceforth.

4. The Act, in express words, provides only against the mischief and inconvenience which may grow or redound upon the Patent, and to remedy any injury done by the Patent.

5. The liberty granted, is restrained to be in such sort, and in as free a manner, as was at any time accustomed since the beginning of the King's reign, and before the late Charter of Incorporation.

Whereby it appears, that the usage to trade freely into these Countries without licences, was but from the entrance of K. James;

The Statute referring to no other free usage: And therefore this Act did not over-throw any Charter granted by Queen Elizabeth, as was afterwards declared in the next Parliament, 3 J. cap. 9. in the case of the Charter to the Merchants of Exeter, for the French trade granted 2 Ed. which I before mentioned.

Officer. 4. Thus all Acts of Parliament which grant licence of trade, do suppose the other foundation of foreign trade to have continuance, viz. according to leagues with foreign Princes.

For no Act of Parliament ever gave licence to trade with aliens not in amity, and if the league be determined, the liberty is suspended, till granted by Parliament, till the league be renewed.

Officer. 5. The last thing I shall observe upon the laws that give licence of trade, is, that where liberty of trade is given by Act of Parliament, without any reservation to the King of his ancient right, the King in such case hath no bound up himself, that he cannot generally prohibit or refrain that trade wherein he hath granted his Subjects an interest by a law.

For a general prohibition or restraint would amount to a repeal of a law, which the King cannot do without an Act of Parliament.

The law will be the same here as in the cases where Acts of Parliament do generally prohibit, where general licences would be void, because they tend to repeal a law.

Upon this ground the licence in Dargy's case, for that past which concerned the importation of foreign cattle, was judged void in law, because too general, not limited to any certainty.

But the King may in particular, and certainly, dispense and licence against prohibiting Statutes.

And so he may in particular refrain the persons of his Subjects from going beyond the seas, notwithstanding any of the laws which give licence of trade:

But cannot grant a restraint or prohibition generally, where Acts of Parliament have given a general licence, unless it be in special cases; and for a time, where the interest of the Publick requires it, as of the plague, and furnishing out of the King's Navies, in time of war with any Prince. And therefore I shall admit, that if any publick law can be produced, which gives liberty of trade for all the King's Subjects, to the Judges, that that Patent will be void, as a restraint of that liberty against law.

Upon this ground the Conary Patent was held void, because against the express liberty granted by 3 J. and thence forced; or of the Common Law Monopoly, by restraining the right of others against an express law, for the benefit of a few.

Upon the same reason, the Great of Ph. and M. p. that all sweet wines should be landed at Southampton, was against several express Statutes, and the rights of several free ports, before granted by the Crown to the City of London, and others, as 27 Ed. III. cap. 6. whereby by sea-chauffin-freemen had liberty granted to bring their wines to what Ports they pleased; and 23 Ed. III. whereby the English, Irish, and Welsh, had liberty granted to fetch their wines and bring them to any parts of England, Wales, and Wales.

And therefore was repealed in Parliament at 5 J. 2. Robt. 2. R. p. 122. whereby it appears, that the Parliament in the Queen's time, was vigilant enough to take notice of Patents against law.

The like in the case of John Pandey, for the sole selling of sweet wines by retail, 30 Ed. III. the Parliament set it aside, as against law. Upon that Grant an Inhibition under the Great Seal, issued, prohibiting all the Citizens of London to sell foreign wine in the City. The Inhibition was reversed, 30 Ed. III. Nr. 13. and Pandey punished for contumacy, by colour of the Grant, 30 Ed. III. Nr. 23.

This Grant was not against any express Statutes, some whereof have been cited in the argument in this Case, which gave the Merchant-Importers liberty to sell their wines and Merchandise to whom they pleased; and many express Grants to the Citizens of London, to whom they were confirmed in Parliament, but was against the rules of the Common Law, being a restraint and monopoly of an inland trade, as a thing of wines in London and other parts of England, unreasonably then was.

For when foreign Merchants are brought hither, to trade or traffick with, they fall under the rules and government of the Common Law, and the restraining of them here becomes an inland trade.

In Leachard, 4 Ed. III. Ad. 29. fol. 27. Pl. 31. it was ruled, That when foreign Merchants are brought in, a conspiracy to enhance their price is punishable.

At Common Law is like manner, as a design by false rumours, or otherwise to double the price of our inland commodities.

The making of these cases, which were the principal pillars to support the argument of the other side, prove nothing, yet so clear, till they can prove from clearer Statute than 15 Ed. III. the giving liberty of trade to the English Indies.

Having considered of foreign trade with aliens in error, and how it hath been managed in all times, I proceed in the last place to consider what the law determines of trade and commerce with alien enemies, in consequence with Infidels. Here the consideration is far different from what it was in the former; in that, the Common Law was silent, until an express Prohibition by the King.

But here the Common Law is a Prohibition of itself, and is at open war with alien enemies.

Whosoever the commerce with alien enemies without licence, be within the extent of aiding and comforting the King's enemies beyond the seas, within 25 Ed. III. I shall not at this time argue. But it may be worth while for the interpleger who traffick into foreign Nations, not in amity with the King of England, without licence, well to consider what penalty, but before the Statute at Common Law, it was criminal.

Page. 13. Ed. III. R. 13. B. R. in the Treasury, in an information against three persons for trading into Scotland, then in amity with the King of England, the Defendants pleaded a licence from Cardinal Beaufort, as the Masters of Scotland, which was held ought, since could not be by the King, thereupon they obtained and pleaded the King's pardon. Rolls Perpetual, de Curia Regia. 133. Pl. 3.

I need not labour to clear a point which was not applied by the Defendants' Council, but their endeavour was to exempt Infidels from being enemies; wherein they have a difficult task, in losing against the favour of the laws of all Christian Countries.

In the great Infidelity of the Jews, who have been expelled, and their estates seized, as of enemies almost in every Christian Country;

They call for authorities, but give none themselves; not so much as the opinion of any one learned man, as for consequence to the last army between the English and Infidels. I will not detract the memory of the Court to repeat the authorities which have been produced to afford the enemy between Infidels and the laws of this Realm, which are more than sufficient, after such solemn proceedings against the Jews in Edward the 1st's Reign.

All which have received a very short answer, that their Records are obsolete.

That none hath hid the Law from us, so that we cannot distinguish whether they were Acts of Law, or Acts of Violence.

And that the reason why Princes were advised to use them so, might be, because they are under no government to vindicate them.

But why the Records should be so darkened, and the Proceedings, in so eminent a case as that of the Jews, to obscure, since Edward 1. more than the Common Law, in the division of the right and properties of others, I could not bear any good opinion given.

For I take it, the principles of law upon which the Jews were proceeded against, are as clearly laid down in our Law-Books, as any point of Law we have.

For the sake of the Jews flood thus: They came over as Merchant-men, of several Countries in amity, both by civil liberties of several Kings, and under the general free-conduct of Alfred Char. whereby they were under the King's protection, and enabled to create all and sell, as any other Merchant-Strangers under free-conduct, which the King might grant, as I have shewn, to an alien enemy. While here, many of them were indoctrinated, others born here, and had great possessions of lands, as well as leases and personal estates.

Then they were banished by the King, by Proclamation, as well those that were never indoctrinated upon the account of their religion, as Infidels and enemies to the Christian religion.

To whom then will their lands, sales for years, credits, and such personal effects as they had not liberty to carry out, belong?

The Law adjudged it all to the King. And the controversies that arose about their estates, did not fall out between the King and the defendants Jews, as the Defendants' Council terms them; he they were gone; but the King and several Doctors of the Jews, who well knew the Law, and were all defended their right.

And the liberty to trade with foreigners in unity, was but a bare privilege, and the King prohibited.

Secondly, The other ground insisted on was, that all ingrossing of merchandise was unlawful at Common Law; and therefore a Patent tending to authorize an unlawful ingrossing is void, as a Monopoly at Common Law, and declared to be by 21 Jac.

Here I will join issue with Mr. Pelteson, and do admit, that if it be an unlawful ingrossing, whether by the Common Law, or any Statute in force, the Patent will be void.

And he must admit unto me, that if it be no unlawful ingrossing, it is no Monopoly at Common Law.

As he did in his argument ingeniously admit, that if it were no Monopoly at Common Law, it is not within the Statute 25 Jac. 1. in it the question between us will turn upon this single point.

Whether the ingrossing the foreign merchandise of Indies be unlawful?

Upon what I have already said, it appears it is not. For I have shewn that the Common Law regarded, and made provision only for, merchandises within the land, and though when foreign merchandises came thither, they fell under the rules of the Common Law, yet the ingrossing, or sole buying of foreign commodities beyond the seas, and selling re-gross, or by the Merchant-Importer, was no offence at Common Law.

Neither is there any statute that makes it an offence at this day.

It is true, the Statute of 3. E. III. cap. 5. prohibited English Merchants to buy foreign merchandises.

But the Merchant-Stranger was not bound by that Law; and that Statute was the next year repealed, as to the Export Merchants, 28 E. III. cap. 2. And that at present the Law is, that any Merchant may buy in gross, and sell in gross, appears by the resolution of all the Judges, Mich. 23. 24. Elix. 6. 7. 1691. in the chapter of ingrossing.

And the resolution goes a step further than the Merchant-Importer.

That any person may buy in gross of the Merchant-Importer, and sell by retail.

And it follows by a clear consequence, that if English Merchants in such places, where by Law they have a right to trade, may ingross the commodity of the place without offence, the ingrossing foreign commodities of any place, where the subject cannot trade without licence, can be no argument to invalidate such licence.

Because ingrossing of foreign Merchandises by any Merchant-Importer, is no crime, but lawful for every trader.

And then the consequence of all ingrossing will be the raising the price of the commodity.

Yet it being a commodity of foreign growth, and not such as the Law hath any where determined necessary for the support of life, as victuals and such like.

The Common Law hath no regard to the price, but leaves the Merchant free to make his advantage of his dangerous adventure.

The advantage that some subjects may receive by the trade, and others may be debarr'd from, which are alike hazardous, and depend upon a multitude of accidents, are no measures of right or wrong, to put a legal judgment upon.

But if the Company have a right to trade, and others have not, as I have argued, whenever their advantage may be, which cannot be estimated till they have found out their bottom.

The ingrossing of the Indies commodities cannot be inflicted with the taint of a Monopoly, which always supposes something done against common right, which is altogether inconsistent with having a right due to the King.

For it is not the essence of a Monopoly, according to the definition thereof proposed by Mr. Pelteson, and taken out of my Lord Coke, viz. that it tends to restrain such liberty and freedom the subject had before, or to hinder him in his lawful trade.

So that every sole buying and selling a commodity, if it be lawful, can be no Monopoly, as the legal trade of the wool, which is evident in several kind commodities, where the sole buying and selling is coupled with a right.

The King may grant to form his pre-emption of this, whereby the Grantee hath the sole buying and selling, if he please, of the whole commodity.

Such a grant to Tindus a foreigner was complained of in Parliament, 21 E. III. and prayed by the Commons, that no such merchandise be sold, but to the commodity of Merchants.

The King answers, that it was a profit belonging to the Prince, and every Lord may make his profit of his own; 21 E. III. see 10.

That this sole right of buying and selling was ever enjoyed, appears by the case of the Statutes, 4. 7. Ch. 12. fol. 10. & c.

So of all gold and silver dug within the Realm, and of all royal fishes taken by the King and his Grantees shall have the sole disposal, or right of selling them.

It is no just answer to these instances, that they are inheritances and rights vested in the Dukes of Guise and the Crown:

Which they may dispose of when they please. So is his prerogative of licensing foreign trade. And as to the question of a Monopoly, which import is a wrong in nature, the rights of others, there is no difference between having a right ceiling, which may be granted, and having a power or prerogative to confer a right on others.

For to the having the right to do the thing that makes it no Monopoly.

And therefore, if the King have a right to license some of his subjects to do a thing, which other of his subjects cannot do, or are rightfully prohibited to do, whether the thing granted were before it ex officio considered, it is all one to the validity of the Grant. This is proved by the instance of Fairs and Markets.

Whether anciently in the Crown, or de novo created and granted to any subject, the sole will be the same, as to the subjects sole right of holding the Fair and Market exclusive of others.

And rights conferred by the King's prerogative, are every where as strong as any rights granted out of the Crown, which was before in officio there.

So that the Petition of an unlawful Ingrossment and Monopoly being removed, by Mr. Pelteson's admission, 'tis not within 25 Jac.

And it is plain, it is not within the words of the concluding part of the Statute, without the aid of the Proviso, for it is expressly limited to grants made, or to be made, for the sole buying and selling, or using of any thing within the Realm. So that it was only the liberty of the inland trade and traffick, so which the subjects had right before, that was fenced and secured by this Statute. And this Petition is not the sole buying of a thing within the Realm; and the reason thereof, be here, yet such sole selling was, as in wool, notwithstanding any new or Statute made, as I have shewn.

And the Lords were only so, to manifest the plain intention of the Parliament, not to interfere with any just prerogative of the King, which he might, and lawfully had exercised and used for the benefit of his subjects.

Besides, to put it still all single, this Company is within the express words of the Proviso.

It was a Company in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, as is noted in the 6. charter.

And by their Charter 7. Jan. had the sole trade granted, with the exclusion of others.

And if the Parliament had not adjudged this Company to be for the maintenance and enlargement, or ordering of that trade, as well as the other Companies, they would undoubtedly have made a difference between them, as in that Charter of 7. Jan.

For our very Parliament was inquisitive into all illegal Patents, which in the last session it towards a Monopoly.

And if they had thought that Charter such, they would not have borne trouble of the point at that time.

Ingrossing made for the different managery, by joint and separate stock, is a crime, as it is right, because it touches not the question of right, who are a Company may have a sole trade granted, exclusive to others.

For every Company draws a charge with it, which those not of the Company are not liable to.

And if the subject have a right to trade without being of the Company, he can be no more compelled to be of the Company, which manages and trades upon separate stocks, than of one which trades upon a joint-stock.

And the objection, that ordering of trade within the domain cannot be intended of licensing of force, with exclusion of others, is of no greater force, 'tis so could not be intended of any other.

All the Patents for foreign trade before that time, and then in being, were Patents of exclusion of others than the Company.

And if it be well considered, all the authorities that allow these may be Companies created for well-governing and ordering foreign trade, do admit, they may be exclusive to others.

It is not being possible that a foreign trade can be under any rule or government, by any Letters Patent whatsoever, if carried on by persons not subject to that rule and government.

And it is evident, that no rule of any Company binds farther than those of the Company; and if every man, not of the Company, may trade, such trade will not be under any rules made for the Company, or by the Company.

So that such Patent will be only for keeping some few persons within rule and government, but not to all of the foreign trade.

Which of necessity must produce the ruin of the Company, and in all probability of the trade itself.

For if others trade without limitation, discharged of all the rules of the Company, and not be liable to the charges and expenses, whereby the trade must be supported; they may and will both undo the Company, and themselves, and mismanage the business, than which nothing can tend more effectually towards the destruction of a trade, of that great concern both to King and Kingdom.

Besides, the Patents and Stock of the Company in foreign parts are absolutely and liable for all injuries committed, either to the Natives or Government of the place, by any Intelliger trading without rule, by the general Law of reparation.

I will not further pursue the arguments of convenience or inconvenience, but do rest upon the right, which I have endeavored to make out by these steps.

First, That the subject had no right to this trade at Common Law as a foreign trade, but might be prohibited.

Secondly, That no league or royal licence hath introduced or given such general right.

Thirdly, That foreign trade hath in all times been licensed and managed by the undoubted prerogative of the Crown, in licensing force, and prohibiting others. And that in all cases not provided for by Act of Parliament.

And that such Grants and Licences have received allowance in several Parliaments.

Fourthly, That no Act of Parliament ever gave a general liberty of trade, much less to trade with Infidels.

Fifth, That the Common Law prohibits this trade with Infidels, as with Asian Enemies.

Sixthly, In the last place, I have applied answers to principal authorities and arguments made use of to impeach the Company's Patent.

Upon all which, I conclude the chief point of the case.

First, That the Grant to the Company, of the sole trade to India, exclusive to others, is good in Law.

Secondly, As to the second point, whether the said will be, admitting the Company have a right to the sole trade there, by their Letters Patent,

I shall spend but a little of your time about it.

Because if the Company have by Law the sole right to the trade, the Law will give them a remedy to redress injuries done to their trade, for recovery of their damages.

Which is properly by an action of the Case, they having no other remedy to redress themselves. For a prosecution for a contempt to the King cannot be in satisfaction of the Company's damage.

I shall therefore rest that point upon the authorities already produced by the Plaintiff's Counsel.

I shall only apply answers to the objections made by Mr. Pelteson.

Obj. 1. 'Tis not alleged the Defendant had no licence from the King.

Ans. The Complaints case is sufficiently set forth, that they had the sole trade to the Indies granted to them; and that the Defendant had notice thereof, and yet traded contrary to their Grant.

If the Defendant had had the King's licence to come on his part by Plea, then the validity thereof, as against the Plaintiff, would have come into question, but he relies upon the licence, by Statute of 15 E. III.

Obj. 2. They have shewn no special loss or damage.

Ans. Neither need any be shewn, no more than in all other actions of the case, where the right of any person is injured, 18 R. 2. Mary's case.

of a Commerce who hath no share in the trade, nor the sole right in the profits thereof, comes not to the case; he denies such Commoners licence of bringing his wares, without a special licence, to prevent a multiplicity of actions, which upon the same ground every Commoner would be intitled to.

But otherwise it is, where any hath the sole Privilege or Profit thereof; after letting forth the special case, and wherein his right is intitled, a general declaration to his damage is sufficient, and the examination of the particulars will belong to the Jury.

Obj. 3. That the action is grounded upon the refusal in the Letters Patents; and that refusal is not absolute, but upon pain of forfeiture of Ships and goods.

Ans. The first part is sufficient; for the action is grounded upon the grant of the whole, entire and only trade and traffick to the Indians, inforced with the King's command, not to grant his no, or any others.

And besides this clause of the prohibition, there is a distinct clause of Grace, that none of these countries or places shall be visited, imported or burdened by any of the King's subjects, during the continuance of the Patent, which hath no penalty annexed to it.

Upon these Grants the action is grounded; and if there were no clause of prohibition, the trading to these Indians by others without licence from the King, is enterprising a trade not only against the prohibition of the Common Law, but the King's express prohibition.

But the action is not founded upon this clause, but upon other clauses of conferring a right to the sole trade.

The authority cited by Mr. Pollexfen, as an authority in point, against the action out of Ex Reg. 38. and R. v. Darcy, fol. 106. no. 6. in Darcy's case, that admitting the grant or dispensation to Darcy were good, it is surmounting Statute Cap. 5. touching the Statute of Ed. IV. yet the action would not lie, because no one case of a right conferred by the King's prerogative, and not of any dispensation from a penal law.

But the Statute of Edw. VI. every Subject might import foreign Goods; the Statute intitles that liberty under penalty of forfeiture.

The difference of one Subject from the Law, works no latitude but a bare exemption from the penalty.

Which is the case of Shaw and House, was held could not be assigned over; and therefore Grants that are merely dispensations, convey no interest against any other Subject, who is no otherwise restrained from doing the thing, than by the Statute under a penalty.

But where the King by his prerogative may grant the sole use of a thing, (as in case of new Inventions) the Grantee hath an interest sufficient to support an action upon the case, as R. v. Innes is of opinion. The next paragraph, fol. 106. no. 17. That if the King grant that none shall use such a thing (whereof the King hath power to grant), but the Grantee, receiving a rent, if another use it, an action upon the case will lie.

Which is a stronger authority in point for the action, than that of Darcy's case of a mere dispensation, is against it.

And therefore having proved the Grant of the sole trade to be good, the action is well brought for damages.

And pray Judgment for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Williams's Argument.

Determines S. Michaelis, Asses Regis Regis Cas. Sessis XXXVI. Asses; Decree 1684.

The East-India Company against Thomas Sandys.

THE Questions in this Case, are two.

1. Whether this Grant of sole trading to this Company, excluding all others the Majesty's subjects who are not members of this Company, or within the qualifications of this Grant, be a legal Grant?

2. Admitting it a legal Grant, if this action be maintainable by the Company against the Defendant?

That this Grant is legal in all its parts, I do not find that the Counsel that argued for it, have endeavoured to maintain.

Mr. Attorney hath admitted in his arguments, it is not.

Those parts of it are against law, is manifest, viz. it intitles illegal penalties upon persons offending against it, by creating a forfeiture of their goods and merchandize, which shall be brought into the Realm, or any of the dominions thereof, contrary to this Grant.

It also creates a forfeiture of the Ships, with the furniture thereof, wherein such goods shall be imposed or found; the one half to the King, the other half to the Company.

It grants, That the offenders against it shall be imprisoned during the King's pleasure, and not to be delivered out of prison until the offenders become bound to the Governor in the sum of 1000*l.* at least, that such person shall not at any time after sail or traffick into any places mentioned in the Grant.

It gives the Company liberty to license persons to trade within the limits of the Grant; and that the King, his heirs and successors, shall not, during their Letters Patent, license any person to sail or trade there.

In these things the property and liberty of the subjects, are put into the power of the Company; and they are to dispose of the liberty and property of their own Company, and not the Publick.

If it is Company may seize Goods and Ships, and imprison the King's subjects, according to their Grant, they will have a greater prerogative over the subject than his Majesty hath; they have power to seize goods, and imprison persons, without trial, without legal proceeding, which the King cannot do, and I humbly conceive, cannot grant to any subject or corporation.

The judgment upon the Cassary Patent, which I shall have occasion to mention in my Sermon, by the opinion of all the Judges, denied the goodness of that, agreeing in substance with this. The substance of this was admitted, at least not defended, by Mr. Attorney General.

The Grant is not only given to the Company dominion over the publick and whole bodies of the subject, and invest the Company with the prerogative of the Crown to license men and things to trade in these limits, but it deeth off the Crown, the King, his heirs and successors, of a high prerogative; that the King shall not license, as I take it, the King shall not trade in these limits without the licence of this Company. For as this great and mighty Charter is passed, it doth not only invest the Company, but direct the King of his prerogative.

Mr. Attorney and the King's Council could not argue if the Company in this matter, without arguing against the prerogative of the King. They are of the King's Council that argued for this Grant, but 'tis not to be believed they were of the King's Council, or friends, that drew it or advised it.

We that argue for Mr. Sandys, argue for the King's prerogative; That the King, notwithstanding this Grant to this Company, may license Mr. Sandys, or any other subject, to trade in these limits; and it doth not appear upon this Record but Mr. Sandys hath the King's licence to trade in these places; he may license any other subject to trade there.

And that the King by this Grant cannot exclude himself of his prerogative.

It will serve our turn, for the defendant in this case to avoid the plaintiff's action. If the plaintiffs sought out by law to have the sole licensing of traders in these limits; for the Kinging part of their declaration is laid in this, That the Defendant traded without their Licence.

There was greater care had to restrain this Company, than to preserve the prerogative of the King in this Grant; and the prerogative is named in this case, to have the Company, and not the King; and they that drew this Grant, did neither consult the honour nor prerogative of the King, the liberty or property of the subject, the trade of the Kingdom, nor the law of the land. But their business was to restrain this Company, to the detriment of the King, the Law, and the Subject, as I hope to make out in this case.

In my way to the particular Questions in this case, I shall observe, 1. That the plaintiffs in their declaration do allege, That they have a right and intitled, and do manage a great trade of merchandise to the East-Indies, and the inhabitants thereto, who at the time of the making the Letters Patents, were not, and now are not Christians; but then were, and now are infidels, and enemies to the Christian faith.

Yet they do not allege, nor can say that these Indians are in amity with the Crown of England, or that they are alien enemies to England.

2. That the profits inhabitants of these places are infidels, and enemies to the Christian Faith, yet it may be, and we hope there may be an universal conversion to the Christian Faith; and we are taught by the Church so may it, and to all manner of means to bring it to pass. Why may not these places, or some of them, become inhabited with Christians, as Spain and Portugal are now inhabited by Christians, where infidels did inhabit about 200 years ago?

3. This Grant doth not exclude a trade with infidels only in these places, but with all persons in these places.

I do not observe, that any of the Company's Counsel that argued before Mr. Attorney, have denied Englishmen the liberty of trading with Christians in any part of the World, without licence from the King. Herein I take time to be alone.

4. They say, this trade cannot be managed but per corpora incorporata.

Yet hath they an exclusion of all persons, and bodies politic and corporate, to trade, or manage a trade in these places without their licence; and by this means exclude the King from constituting any other Company within the limits of their Grant, or in any part of it, which may be very necessary for the Government, and publick trade of the King.

5. It may be, the Indians may still upon some such Company to be instituted by the King, by some treaty of commerce.

Now hath the King by this means, not only excluded his subjects from the trade of this Place; but he hath excluded himself of the liberty of making or constituting any other Company for trade or commerce, in all, or any of these places.

6. Perhaps the government and good management of trade in these places, may in time require more Companies to be instituted, in all, or some of these places; and the Company's Counsel, except Mr. Attorney, are now arguing the King by his prerogative, out of his prerogative.

That the King hath prerogative enough to make this his glorious Company the sole traders, and managers of trade in these places, and to exclude himself and his successors, and all the rest of his subjects, from this trade and management.

7. And by this means constitute a sort of Republick for the management of trade in these places, borrowing perhaps from Hamborough and other republican places, the ways and methods of managing trade upon a common stock, in fraternities and companies; and by this experiment alter the constitution of England in the management of trade, by allowing the nature of our English properties in our goods vested and placed in persons, and placing our properties in companies and fraternities; and by fixing the mystery of trade in companies, to the prejudice of single persons; and may in time turn to ill example, and endanger the Government in its other parts, as well as in this of England.

The main question in this case doth turn upon the power of the King; If the King by his royal power may appropriate this trade in these islands places to this Company?

First, That the King hath power to do this, by the advice of his great Council, the Parliament, is not doubted. So there is no defect or want of power in the King to do this by the Law of England; the exceptions to the Statute of 21 Jas. 1. do. 3. do except such Grants out of that Statute.

The question is only a question of the manner of doing this by the King, Sandys. Whether he may do so, without the advice of his great Council, or Parliament?

As there is no defect or want of power in the King, so there is no defect in the Law of England.

Thirdly, But if there be a necessity or a convenience to the doing of this for the Crown, or for the government, for the subject or for trade?

Fourthly, It is not to be supposed but that the Lords and Commons in Parliament, will and ought to assent to such a Grant in Parliament as much as the Privy-Council, or any other of the King's Council, are obliged to assent to out of Parliament; and it ought to be so promoted by the constitution of England.

And I take this to be one of the Archieps Regni, which is a subject matter fit and proper for the consideration and deliberation of a Parliament, and ought not to be passed by any Grant without these.

The trade of England, the property and liberty of the subject, the King's revenue by Tonnage, Poundage and Customs, the prerogative of the King, are under great redressions by this Grant.

Obj. That they are excluded only from trading in the East-India with Infidels, and the Inhabitants there, who are enemies to the Christian Faith and Religion.

Ans. That it is for the common safety of the Christian Religion, that this is done to prevent the danger of corrupting and perverting Christians to Infidelity.

I do not meet with any authority for this power given to the King. But that English subjects have the same freedom of trade with Infidels as they have with Christians in places beyond the seas; if so they be not to contrary with the Crown of England.

Mishawaka's case, Bromwich ad Rep. 296. That case hath been observed already to have no authority, nor the Book authentic, and at best but some saying of my Lord Coke, in a matter not then at judgment before the Court, and that perhaps militate by the Precedent.

I oppose to the probability of this saying, the report of the Taylors of Wylsham case, in Rolls Rep. fol. 4. 12 Yeo. The Lord Coke was then Chief-Justice of the King's-Bench, and says in the resolution in that case, that so trade mechanick or merchantable can be hindered by the King's Patent, not in any place, without an Act of Parliament; a Charter to hinder trade at sea is void.

How can this stand with what is published in Bromwich, that my Lord Coke should say in the Common-Pleas, before this time, that an English subject cannot trade with Infidels, without licence from the King; and that he had been a Justice, in the time of Edu. III. to that purpose?

The reason given for that saying, is as weak, because they are common enemies to the Christian Faith.

They may be enemies to the Christian Religion, and not enemies to the Crown of England, or to the trade of England.

The Law denies trade and commerce only with enemies to the Crown, not with enemies to the Christian Religion.

It is sufficiently observed already, by the Council that here argued on this side, that there are treaties of trade and commerce between the Crown of England, and these places of Infidels; and that there are leagues and embassies between them & Edu. III. allows leagues of commerce, and trade, and peace with Infidels.

And what may be the consequence, to declare that to be Law, that they are incapable of the benefit of the Law of England, allowed to other Aliens, and that they are not to be protected from personal injuries by our Law?

12 H. VIII. 4. A Papin beaten in England cannot sue, quasi per personam hominem.

And to put them in the same condition with outlaws and excommunicated persons, how doth this consist with the common justice of Nations, or with the policy of trade as an Island?

Obj. By Mr. Solicitor, 5 Yeo. fol. 32. A Jewels born in England, marrying a converted Jew, not allowable.

Mr. Solicitor hath cited many cases and Records out of Mr. Prynne's Collections, and from the Rolls themselves, how the Jews were treated in England in trade; what restraints and taxes were laid upon them by the Crown.

I do not take it that any of their Records reach the reason of restraint of trade, imposed upon English subjects by this Grant.

There's no restraint but that English subjects might trade with Jews in their own countries.

That Jews were used thus in England, is no argument that the East-India Company may use English subjects like Jews abroad in other Countries.

St. Paul's 2^d Epistle to the Corinthians, chap. 6. reprehends the Christians for going to Law one with another before Infidel Judges, who were their enemies; calling it a fault, and he speaks it so their shame, that they would not rather receive wrong, or make Arbiters of their own to judge between the brethren, than to go to Law one with another, and that before unbelievers; but there's no reproach to the Christians for converting or trading with Infidels.

4 Yeo. fol. 155. Derry and Allen's case, Morr's Rep. fol. 674, and 675. are Authorities for leagues and commerce with Pagans, which signify leagues of commerce with Infidels.

Lord Coke cites several words out of the holy Writ to justify it, out of the Books of Ysaiah, Rygs, and Jerusalem.

If it be true, there is a full freedom of trade by the Common Law for all English subjects with Infidels and Christians in all parts of the World, and that without licence from the King?

To restrain this freedom of trade to a Company of English subjects, excluding all others the King's subjects from their ancient liberty and freedom of trade, I take to be a Monopoly, and comes within the description and reason of the unreasonableness of Monopolies, so largely argued by Mr. Pollock, that I shall not take up the time of the Court in repeating what he's said, and I cannot add to it.

Neither will I trouble the Court with mentioning the authorities he hath cited for that purpose; but refer myself to the same authority in that matter.

Yet I take it, under consideration, that it is fit to be very well considered, if this Patent be not a Monopoly, and an ingrossing and appropriating of trade to few persons, which did belong and was common to all Englishmen, though a licence from the Crown was necessary for their exercise of this trade; yet every Englishman was capable of such licence, and was intitled to such licence from the Crown, and had a right to it.

Now hath this Grant put it out of the King's power to grant such licences, and hath placed this power, and the exercise of it in this Company, and by this means hath by this Patent granted and appropriated a trade to this Company, which was common to all his subjects, and hath given to this Company the sole licensing of traders in their parts, excluding all the subjects of England, which shall not be licensed by this Company, to trade in these parts: I conceive that makes this Patent and Grant illegal and void.

And makes this restraint in trade, which was common to all with the King's licence, now peculiar to this Company; and doth monopolize the trade and the means of trading, by placing it in the sole hands and power of the Company, even the sole licensing of traders, and they may by this Grant benefit Aliens only to exclude English subjects.

My Lord Coke's description of Monopolies and Monopolists, Projectors and Propounders, doth sufficiently illustrate this, with reflecting upon what Mr. Pollock hath said in his arguments, without repetition of them to the Court.

The Statute of Almog Charles declares the liberty and freedoms Merchants have to buy and sell without restraint, by the old and rightful customs, except in time of war.

2 Yeo. cap. 29 Ed. 3. Stat. 9 H. III. 30. Nisi publicus praedicator, hath my Lord Coke, is intended a prohibition by Act of Parliament.

Wolton, 10 Yeo. is of the same opinion with Lord Coke in his book about impositions upon trade; as I have it from a Gentleman in our profession. Vide his Manuscripts.

21 Yeo. cap. 3. declares all Monopolies to be against Common Law.

Cap. 11. Case of Monopolies, 84 Morr's Rep. 673. says, Dary's Grant for the sole importing of Cards from beyond the sea, and selling them for twenty-one years, 44 Edw. prohibited and judged a void Grant.

Sist. 2 E. III. cap. 2. confirms Almog Charles, for selling and coming with merchandise to and from England, according to Almog Charles.

9 E. III. cap. 1. damns all Charters to the contrary, as illegal and oppressive to the people, 4 E. III. cap. 2. confirms also Almog Charles, 25 E. III. cap. 2. doth the same, and makes Lesters Patent to the contrary void.

18 E. III. 6. 12 H. VII. 6. for five passages, &c. See Letters Patent restraining trade have been purified in Parliament, with here and cry, in all Parliaments and Ages.

Obj. This Grant is made to a Company for good government, and for the ordering of trade, and no Monopoly, and it is within the Privilege of the Statute 21 Yeo. cap. 3.

Ans. Allowed in Dary's case by the arguments for that Grant, and if it be not for public good, the Grant is illegal.

If this Grant be neither good for the King, nor for the subjects, nor for the trade of England, it cannot be said to be for the public good.

It cannot be good for the King, for it restrains him in his prerogative, as you would have the King had power to license every subject; by this Grant he hath excluded himself of all power of licensing. He can license no subject to trade in these parts.

The King suffers in his Customs and in his Navigation.

The subject is excluded from trading in these places, without the licence of this Company.

Trade itself is restrained, for it is reduced and appropriated to a Company, and to few persons, which was common to all the King's subjects.

2 Yeo. fol. 57. Lord Coke's reason against it, for all the subjects are concerned in trade, therefore all ought to consent to it in Parliament.

That they are a Company, they are not constituted by this Grant, to regulate and manage trade for England, but for themselves and their Company.

The brightening, the lowering of commodities, the raising, the lessening the rates of all the commodities of these places, the ingrossing of all the trade of these places, is in their power and in their pleasure.

There are no rules or qualifications in this Grant, intending to admit numbers into this Company, or directing or requiring their licences for this trade. They have the trade in themselves, without any check or control from his Majesty or the Government; they are independent from the Government by this Grant, they are without appeal.

Obj. That they are a Company, and that this Grant to them is within the exception of the Stat. 21 Yeo. cap. 3.

Ans. 1. Because that exception does not reach to Lesters Patent made to Corporations, after the making of that Act.

No words are saying to any Corporation, that should be afterwards created or granted.

2. This Privilege does not make them better than they were before the making of the Act, only leaves them as they were before, and as it found them.

If they were legal before, they continue so; if illegal, they are so notwithstanding this Act.

Obj. That many Grants of this nature have been made to several Companies, to the York Company, Molay, and Hemmergham Companies.

Ans. They do not trade in Joint-Stock, and monopolize, as this Company doth; they do not exclude persons from their Company, as this doth. Mr. Pollock hath discovered them at large.

That there have been many Monopoly Grants in all Ages from the Crown, appears by the Statute of Almog Charles, by other Statutes made in E. III. the time, R. II. VII. and King James's time; and by the judgments given on Monopoly Patents in all ages.

In the case of Monopolies. In the Taylors of Wylsham case.

Peashy's case, 5 E. III. severely punished for procuring a licence under the Great Seal, that he only should sell Sweet Wines in London, &c.

15 Yeo. fol. 191. Derry and Allen's, Morr's Rep. 44 Edw. Oppression is older than the Law made to punish it. Monopolies are as old as the Laws made to restrain them; it is no argument to justify injuries by their age.

St. Arthur Aquinas's Patent, 37 Car. II. for the Company's granting them the sole trade there. There are glorious records in the Patent, of advantage to the King's subjects, and for the regulation of trade, making the Company a body politic, that they should have the sole trade to those Islands, excluding all others under pains and forfeitures, with a new addition to the Statute against Monopolies; Judgment was given against this Patent, Mish. 20 Car. II.

18 Yeo. fol. 54. Taylors of Wylsham case. Compare this case with the Company of Taylors case, for the good of Trade and Company, and the Charters and By-laws fair and plausible, yet damned, because a restraint on trade.

The Company had the profit of the reformation. No other difference between the cases, than that this is a mighty, that a petty Company.

14 Car. II. cap. 24. That Statute provides, that persons by having Stocks in this Company, shall not be adjudged traders within the Statute against Bankrupts, which is called by Mr. Solicitor the Judgment of the Parliament for this Grant.

Says Mr. Solicitor, Stat. 14 Car. II. cap. 24. takes notice of this Company, and that it is an advantage to the Nation and Trade of it.

Sist. 19 Car. II. 1. takes notice of this Company, and takes every Capital stock in this Company at 20s. for every 100s. Capital Stock in the Company.

Ans. This Poll-Act taxes all Guilds and Fraternities, Bodies Politick and Corporate; it does not make them legal Corporations, Guilds or Fraternities.

The judgment the Parliament of this Grant doth better appear in the Journals of the House of Commons, of the complaints made to the Parliament, that this grant was a grievance.

And on new thing to mention proceedings upon Journals of Parliament, and the Judges take notice of them. His. Rep. & Roll.

And in a case of this importance it may be proper to adjourn it to Parliament, where it may receive the Judgment of his Majesty in Parliament, and will be a due establishment of the Law in this great case, and concern the King's prerogative, the right of the subject, and of the whole Kingdom in the trade of the Nation.

It will meet there with a Judgment that will certainly establish it, as it be for the Interest of the King and Kingdom; but if for the enlarging of this Great Company, it will meet with the common law of justice, it will stand against the will of the King and Kingdom.

It is a mighty argument for the reputation this Patent had with the Parliament, and the opinion they had of it, by taxing their Capital-Stock at 2000 per Cent.

So they do reputed Equities, at 5 l. by the head. Solicitors, Attorneys, and oppressive Officers have the like esteem with this Act of Parliament.

Stat. 9. Jac. 1. cap. 6. This Statute is but declaratory of the Common Law, and doth not raise questions and suits in Law; which might be otherwise by reason of interpreting the trade of Spice and Pepper, and then seeking for the trade of France.

It is the mischief recited in that Statute, and the evils happening to England, and the King's subjects be here, without all limitation.

These Charters mentioned in that Statute, and reformed by that Statute, were not only grievous, but illegal, and Monopolies.

For monopolizing the trade of their denizens to few Merchants, and forbidding all other his Majesty's subjects from the trade.

And using the King's subjects in England from that free and common trade, which his subjects in Ireland and Scotland had.

To the manifest impoverishing of Subjects, Owners of Ship's, Mariners, Fishermen, Clothiers, Tuckers, Spinners, and many thousands of handicraftsmen.

The decrease of his Majesty's Customs, Subsidies, and other Impositions; The ruin and decay of Navigation.

The raising of the prices of our Wool, Cloth, Corn, and such like commodities.

The enhancing of all French and Spanish commodities, that all Owners and Masters, with divers others, shall be off from the ordinary means of maintenance, and providing their wants.

And all French and Spanish commodities shall be in a few hands.

To the hurt and prejudice of all the subjects; therefore enact, it shall be lawful for all his Majesty's subjects in England and Wales, to have free liberty to trade into, and from Spain, France and Portugal, in such sort as was accustomed at any time in his Majesty's time.

Stat. 4. Jac. 1. cap. 9. Made to confirm the Charter to the Company of East Merchants, upon singular reasons recited in the Act of Parliament, declaring the Stat. 30. Jac. 1. cap. 6. should not impeach that Charter, being for public good.

Stat. 45. Ed. III. cap. 4. That no imposition shall be charged upon Wool as no fort, without the assent of the Parliament. This Stat. was not made out of necessity, for it was the Common Law; yet it was thought fit by the Parliament at that time, to declare the Law by an Act of Parliament.

Stat. 1. H. IV. cap. 16, 17. Against Letters Patent made to ingross trade, &c.

So ancient was the Monopoly, and ingrossing of trades by illegal Letters Patent.

When illegal things turn to a grievance, 'tis usual to suppress them by Acts of Parliament, and not to leave their Judgment to the ordinary Courts of Justice, without declaration first had in Parliament.

Stat. 21. Jac. 1. cap. 3. This Statute takes notice, that the King's Dispositions, Judgment and Declaration was, that all Monopolies were against Law; and that so Statutes should move for such Grants yet upon informations and untrue pretences of public good, many such Grants have been unduly obtained, and unlawfully put in execution, to the great grievance and inconvenience of the subject, contrary to the Laws of the Realm.

For the avoiding whereof, that Statute is made against all Grants to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, of any Monopoly; and declares the same illegal.

This Statute doth qualify with the description of a Monopoly.

So both the East-India Company's Charter in all its points and parts, and in the exercise of it, qualitate with these Monopolies, and their descriptions in our Law-Books and Cases;

With my Lord Chief's description of a Monopoly, in his 3d. Inst. cap. Monopolies.

If Mr. Selden be pleased in Mr. Attorney's argument, I take it that East-India Charter is placed in this Statute.

The Act of Tunnage and Poundage, 13 Car. II. says, The Common in Parliament respecting trade and commerce in your Majesty, in and for the safeguard of the seas, against all persons, extending, or that shall extend the disturbance of your Commons, in the intercourse of trade, and the invading of your Realm, give and grant for every Tun of Wine of the growth of France, that doth come into the Port of London, by your natural born subjects, 4 l. to s. by strangers and aliens, 6 l.

It like notice takes of Poundage, to be paid by subjects and aliens.

Stat. 67. Ric. 1. Rates in Wares, Silks imported in Ships English-built, directly from the East-India, the pound weight containing sixteen ounces; Subsidy, 4000. Stat. 15. 2.

Of the Manufacture of Wool, imported from ships in English-built Ships, 16 pound weight containing sixteen ounces; Duty 1 l. 10 s. 4 d.

It has also distinguished between Subjects and Alien Importers, between English and Foreign ships, not between the East-India Company only and Aliens. But this Law made for England, be now appropriated to this Company, and the rest of England excluded by this Grant against this Statute?

This Law made for all the King's subjects and their English-built ships. The confirmation of this Statute moves from all the subjects, the Grant is by all, and the benefit sought to be for all the subjects of England.

The Law is the same as to the Transportation from the Foreign to the Importation from India, to which the Company is not now bound.

The Act for encouraging and increasing of Shipping for Navigation, 10 Car. II. the last Law that ever was made, and is now in force, is the same, except the Laws for the prerogative.

The Privilege is in following: Provided that the Ship, or any sailing thereon, be not built, or extended, or be meant to receive more than 100 tons of any English-India commodities, laden in English-built ships, and whereof the Master and three-fourths of the Mariners, at least one-fifth, from the time of their place or places of loading them, in any part of the Sea, from the South-west of England or Coast of Bona Speranza, although the said parts, be not the places of their growth.

This Law made for the increase of English Shipping and Navigation, doth this Company invade, and appropriate the Shipping and Navigation to themselves, by excluding all other English-built ships.

Is this for increase or decrease of English Shipping and Navigation, to confine it to a few hands, excluding many?

There is neither Common nor Statute Law can hold this Company. I hope the Judgment of this Court will bind them; and that the Act of Parliament will prevail against this Company.

The Privilege is, for all English-built ships to carry in all English-built ships, English-India commodities brought into India.

The Charter says, this Company, and the Ships and their men shall carry by carry. Which shall prevail, the Act of Parliament or the Charter? Their last mentioned Act of Parliament differs with between Subjects and Alien Importers, between English and Foreign Ships.

Not between the East-India Company only, and Aliens. Shall the Laws made for England, be now appropriated to this Company?

Shall they have the benefit of it? Can the King's Grant take from his subjects the advantages given by Acts of Parliament, and appropriate to himself what is granted to all?

I move leave to observe four things, by way of answer to Mr. Attorney's pleas and answers to the several questions yesterday.

He distinguishes between inland and foreign trade, he did allow the subject the benefit of a house trade without restraint.

That the Parliament might please.

That one Englishman might privately sell to another by the Common Law, without licence from the Crown.

Yet one subject could not buy, sell, or trade with another publicly in an open fair or market, without licence from the Crown, and this for the preservation of the peace, to prevent public assemblies and meetings: And that as Fair or Market could be kept, but by licence from the Crown.

I think these four things, Markets, and Corporations in England by prescription, and their beginning is not known, and have been allowed by Law.

And prescriptions are compared to the head of Noli, which could never be discovered.

And that such ancient prescriptions are as ancient as the Grants of Kings or Inhabitants in the World.

And for foreign trade He said it down for a position, that no subject could trade abroad without the King's allowance in any part of the Christian World. I do not find any authority for this, practice is against it.

The rest of the Council did argue for the Company did not insist upon it; yet, they did seem to admit a trade for English Merchants with Alien Christians, without the King's licence.

That in regard the authority of E. N. Br. 83. Dyer 265. 266. against Lord Chief's opinion, Roll. Rep. Taylor of Ipswich, Stat. 1. H. III. cap. 37. Magna Charta, 2. H. III. cap. 9. 18. E. III. cap. 7. 3. E. III. cap. 2. 38. E. III. cap. 2. 5. E. II. cap. 2. 12. H. VII. cap. 16.

Stat. 18. H. VIII. cap. 10. Stat. 566. which gives the King for a limited time power to license trade and traders in some measure, as some parts, in some commodities. See the Statute.

His distinction for Merchants to trade, without coming to the Staple; and therefore to distinguish between Merchants and Traders, who are obliged to come to the Staple.

What warrant have he for this distinction? The Prayer of the Commons to the King in Parliament, the Petitions of Merchants to the King, the King's restraint of Merchants in their trade, notwithstanding Acts of Parliament; the continuing of the Staple, notwithstanding Acts of Parliament; tending to the contrary, give him a handle for this argument.

1 H. V. 7. The Prayer of the Commons to the King, to find foreign Merchants out of the Kingdom: the King's answer, Roll. Rep. 1. H. V. cap. 8.

These were Bills in Parliament presented to the King for the royal assent; so were many of the Rolls of their Ages, presented to the King for their royal assent, especially in things which any way concerned the King in his prerogative.

The Commons did not demand their rights in their Bills, but by Position claim their right.

Such answers of Roll. Rep. are no argument against the right of the subject.

Neither is the Petition or Prayer of the Commons in Parliament, in any manner that is their due to the Crown, any argument against their right.

That the Statute did continue till lost, by the loss of Calais.

Stat. 4. H. III. cap. 9. That the Staples beyond the sea, and on the side the seas, established by Kings in times past, and the pains thereupon provided, shall cease, &c.

This Statute took away the Staples for all by the Kings.

But there was a Staple for up by Act of Parliament, and reformed and altered by several Acts of Parliament, did continue notwithstanding the Act of E. III.

But English Merchants are not within any of these Statutes, or the meaning of them.

And I do not find that Mr. Attorney gives any account how these Statutes were taken away by Law, but vanished at the taking of Calais, he hath not told at the beginning or ending of the Statute by Law, I know no Common Law for them, or his distinction.

Rolls Are Perpetrated, This Proclamation of 6. 27. E. III. by the Statute of the Staple, it was ordained, that Merchants-Aliens might bring from beyond seas merchandise of the Staple, but not Merchants-Dominion.

Because Merchants-Dominion doubted to be impeached in time to come for their merchandise, which they passed by virtue of such Grant and Proclamation, forthwith as they were made out of Parliament.

Now it is granted in Parliament, 31. E. III. cap. 2.
Sec. 5. R. II. cap. 2. This Statute prohibit the exportation of Gold or Silver, and to no person other than Lords and great men of the Realm, true and notable Merchants, and the King's soldiers, go out of the Realm, without the King's licence.

This is declared to be after publication of this ordinance, which implies such licence was not necessary before the making of this Statute.

Mr. Attorney was pleased to allow, licence to particular persons to trade were not necessary; but Companies having such licence may be dissolved by Quia Furor.

Therefore none were to be dissolved in Companies than persons.

Then doth this Charter do the greater wrong to particular persons, who by Law may have such licence, which cannot be taken from them.

And it doth not appear, but Secus hath such licence, or may have, and ought not to be reformed there by any Grant.

Mr. Attorney did turn this matter upon a question of fact, which will, or will not make this Company and their Grant a Monopoly:

Viz. Whether this Company and their Grant be a public good and advantage to the trade of England?

This is a matter not to be decided in this Court, I suppose, and we cannot come at this question in this case; therefore not fit, safe or wise to dispute the Law in this case, till the fact be cleared and settled, and that in fact a Judge where this question may be determined and settled, and the Law thereupon declared and established.

It appears to the Court, there are many alleged things in this Grant.

That the Grant is a restraint to the trade of English Merchants.

That it is a new Grant.

That it may be dangerous to establish such Grants by Judgment in a Court of Law.

That there are some things in the Conary Patent, in Dory's Patent, say, in the Patent for Sweet Wines, that were commendable and useful; yet that little good did the Court, but the whole perished, and was put into the Monopoly of those Grants.

It is observable how this Court, in this action, can adjudge for the Plaintiffs upon this Record, where the whole Grant is set forth upon Record in pleading; and it appearing to the Court, that some parts of this Grant are manifestly illegal, and may occasion oppression to the subjects, and that the best parts of this Grant are doubtful, if good or useful for England, or the trade of it:

It cannot appear upon this Roll, for what part of this Grant the Court shall adjudge for the Plaintiffs, and against the Defendants.

And it cannot appear what part of it doth appear to the Court to be illegal.

This may turn to a precedent for the whole Grant in after-times, since we judge by precedents: And this precedent may occasion more Monopoly-Patents, and this Judgment give them sanction.

As for the second point in this case, whether this action be maintainable by the Company against the Defendants Secus, admitting their Grant to be good:

1. To allow such an action in a Court of Law for this Company against a single subject, will be to give them opportunity to run any subject, that shall oppose them in trade.

They that are too great for all other Companies in England, shall be too strong for any private subject in costell.

2. If their Grant be a legal Grant, they have sufficient pains and penalties in it to reduce any person to compliance with their Grant, without the aid of actions in Wolvenholme-hall.

And the Grant which makes them a Company, and doth constitute them and their power, doth direct the remedies, ways and methods to support and maintain them in their power and Company, in all the things granted them; and there being no remedy given them by action, I think it may be hard to adjudge, that an action will be for them in this case, against the Defendants.

In cases of new Injuries caused by Grants, or by Act of Parliament, and remedies created to repair such injuries in the Grants and Acts that create them, such remedies are to be pursued, and not new remedies to be given in Courts for such new-created Injuries.

This is an action brought upon the Grant, where no such remedy is provided by the Grant, and other remedies are provided by the Grant.

The Grant directs and gives forfeiture of all the goods imported against it, and the Ship wherein they are imported; but the Grant doth not exceed the offender to suffer damages in the Company, which is required by the Action, and so a special damage is laid out of the declaration.

This is like a penal Statute, which creates an offence, and adds a penalty.

The party ought to sue for such penalties, and not to sue for damages in an action upon the case.

This may be the case upon the Statute, 2. E. VI. for Tithes, it gives damages no damages; so the case doth not lie upon that Statute.

Upon the Statute for forcible entries, and upon all other Penal Laws, which give penalties by single, double, or treble damages;

It was never possible to bring them upon the case, upon such Statutes, unless in Dory's case, which action miscarried, Idem 101.

I humbly conceive this action is not like actions upon the Customs of London, or upon Duties to the City of London, which have been brought by way of Indebtedness for the duty.

In all these cases there was a certain duty created by the Grant, Custom or Charter, which made the party Debtor to the Corporation; but in this case there is no duty created;

Only an injury declared, and a penalty directed, which ought not to be turned to an action upon the case, in any opinion.

I hope the Court will not make a precedent, for the Company to multiply actions against all persons that they conceive to be intruders or aggressors upon their Grant, Company or Trade.

There is no special damage laid in the declaration to answer to the Company:

Only in general, that the Defendants, contrary to the form and effect of their Letters Patent, did trade within the limits of their Grants, without licence of the Company, with a Ship called The Expectation, to the prejudice of the Company.

William's case, 2. Co. 5. fol. 72. Defendant being Vicar of Abbeley in Court-bell, is obliged by himself, or his Clergyman, to celebrate divine service at Wolvenholme, and within the parish of Abbeley every Sunday, and to administer the sacrament to the Plaintiff, his servants and tenants within his said Manors, came out of mind:

And that the Defendants had not celebrated divine service, or administered the sacrament to the Plaintiff, his servants and tenants for a certain time, as demand of the Plaintiff. Now ad, pleaded, verdict for the Plaintiff, moved in street of Judgment, that an action upon the case doth not lie. Had this been a private Chapel for himself and family, as actions upon the case had lain, for then no other person could have brought an action but himself, his heirs and assigns.

But in this action, his tenants might bring the actions.

Which may occasion multitude of suits, for one default in the Plaintiff.

The same may happen in this case, every Member of this Company may bring the like action against the Defendant.

And as in this case the Plaintiff had his remedy in the Ecclesiastical Courts; so he hath the Company their remedy, as the King had against offenders, in trade without licence.

If licence was necessary by Law, by contempt to his royal prerogative, or prohibition:

Complaint is in the case of a nuisance in the highway, an action lies for it, without special damages.

They do not aver in the declaration, that this trade cannot be managed without their Company.

If there be any legal punishment provided for such offenders, such punishments are to be pursued, and not new remedies by actions created, to the grievance and oppression of the subject.

Darcy and Allen, Action on the case, brought by Darcy against Allen, for selling Cards, contrary to his Patent; Judgment per Jury.

William's case, 5. Co. 6. 72. Mary's case, fol. 9. Johnson's case is not to be relied upon when upon the case, but by public proceedings by indictment, or the like case lies per private demand.

The proceeding of the Company in this action, is supposed to be to right the Public in the name of the Company, not for the reputation of private damage, but to repair the Public in their Company.

The Company is in the nature of the late famous Cyprus Lazarus Antique; a nation to serve the Publick, as they would have it.

And not to be used to recover damages for private injuries, but to support and save the trade as publick actions.

This Charter releases the King in his prerogative, the Kingdom in its trade, the subjects in their freedom to trade; the King is concerned in its revenue, the subject in his right, in this question.

What the Company cannot accomplish by the forfeitures, powers and penalties of their Charter; they design to establish by the Judgment of the Court, in this action for the Company.

I know the Subject of this Court is superior to this Company, and it is placed in safer and better hands than trade or regulation of it in the Company for England.

I therefore pray your Judgment against the Company, and their action, for the Defendants.

Now 111. fol. 37. Car. II.

This Term the Judges delivered their opinions seriatim in this great cause. Wolfe was both short, and his reason being included in those of Hallam's, Life, who spoke after, I have omitted them, to avoid repetition.

Hallam's last, all might be reduced to one single point, which was, whether the Charter granting a sole trade to this Company, exclusive to all others, be good?

That this was a great point, both in regard of the King's prerogative, and the People's liberty.

He divided all trade, as Ipse was done per Senyor, Attorney-General. Foreign trade with Christians had been opened by several Acts of Parliament; and at Common Law 'twas an inherent prerogative in the Crown, that none should trade with foreigners without the King's licence. And the King having that prerogative at Common Law, an Act of Parliament is necessary to dress him of it; which none hath done but to some particular places.

Michaelson's case, cited by those that argued for the Company, hath not in any sort been answered by the other side.

This is a trade not to be carried on but by a Company; and none can erect a Company but the King.

The King hath the sole power of this trade, as of war and peace; and by declaring a war, he may determine a publick trade, tho' settled by Act of Parliament.

So the Parliament ever look'd on this as a Monopoly, nay, so far from it, as in the 11. Car. II. cap. 24. this Company, &c. are said to be an advantage to the Publick; and that Act was made, that the persons of this Company, &c. should not be discouraged in their honest endeavours, for promoting publick undertakings; thus how can this be a Monopoly?

It never hath been questioned as such by Parliament, though they have look'd narrowly into the King's prerogative, even to the qualifying some things which were his undoubted right; and consider per Jury.

William. Here are two points.

First, Whether Letters Patent giving a sole trade to a Company, exclusive to others, be good?

Secondly, Whether, in case if they be good, an action lies?

He thinks there is but one question, and that whether the action will lie or not, as the Company hath an interest or not. For if they have an interest by these Letters Patent, then the action will unquestionably lie.

The case depending solely on foreign trade with Infidels, he shall apply to that, and not meddle with inland trade.

First, he takes it, that by the Common Law the King has a prerogative to restrain all his subjects from going beyond Sea, as F. N. B. 85. "Thou mayst not go, every subject may go out of the Realm to see his friends, &c. but that it is to be understood, & that he shall not be punished for so doing, but the King may prohibit him, as appears by the same Book; and that three ways, (1.) by the Great Seal, the Privy Seal, or Signet, or by Proclamations. And tho' in Dyer 185, cited by Mr. Williams, it is said, that before R. II. subjects may go beyond Sea, yet 'tis there agreed, the King may prohibit; and a power is made, if a going out without a licence be not a contempt, though there was no prohibition. Afterwards in the same Book 260. his bolden forth departure before express prohibition is no contempt, it shall the Books say, when there is a prohibition, then it is a contempt.

As some may go against or without the King's licence, so if they are gone, the King may recall them, as appears by Dyer 375.

'Tis objected, the King may prohibit some particular persons by writ; but he cannot prohibit all his subjects.

Answered, There are several ways of prohibiting by writ, which is directed to particular persons; and by proclamation, which is general.

And all the King's subjects are bound to take notice of the King's Great Seal and Privy Seal.

Secondly, The King hath the controlling power over all trade with Infidels; he may say, over all foreign trade in general: he hath, Mishburn's case goes farther than Fisher's N. B. and he hath not heard any authority offered against Mishburn's case, as to trade with Infidels; and the opinion in that case seems to be given upon such a question as this. So that it is the judgment of the Court in a like case, for he who was then Chief-Justice delivered it, and none of the Court opposed it.

The prerogative of making leagues is in the King, and he may make them as he pleases; then it would be hard, the Law should give the King a power to make leagues, and yet the subjects should have a right to do such things to break them. But though the subjects may not trade with Infidels, yet the King may license them, or tie himself; as the Jews were prohibited to commerce with the Nations, yet Salomon traded with Heaven King of Tyre for Gold.

The several Licences and Patents, cited and shewn by the Plaintiffs Counsel, though they prove no right in the Crown, yet are evidences of it; for to what purpose should there be so many licences from the Crown, and patents from the Commons to the King, for liberty to trade, unless the King had such a right? Therefore, unless where the Parliament hath covered it, the King hath power to controul all foreign trade, especially such Infidels.

Objection. But though the King had such right, yet now the prohibiting part of the Patent is void by the Statute of E. III. which is pleaded; and the enabling part of the Patent is void by the Statute of Monopolies.

Answer. As to the first, that Statute relates not to that trade.

First, Because no such trade then in being; so that the Parliament could have no regard to it, unless by prophecy, neither could they know whether it would prove hurtful or beneficial to the Kingdom. But take the Act to the large, yet you must take it to relate to the subject matter, which was for Wool, so that the words shall be may be taken free from Custom, and to have no other imposition upon them.

As to the second, whether a Monopoly: he says, a Monopoly is no Imperial Act, but only against the publick part of our Law, which is of advantage to the Publick, as this trade is; then is certes a so to be against the prohibiting part of the Law, and so not within the Law of Monopolies.

The Company hath been in possession of this trade near one hundred years, and that possession will in time give a right; and cited Graves de Jure Patris, &c. and concludes per Jura.

The Argument of the Lord Chief-Justice Tyffernis, at the Court of King's Bench, concerning the Great Case of Monopolies.

The East-India Company Plaintiffs, and Thomas Savary Defendant; wherein their Patent for trading to the East-India, exclusive of all others, is adjudged good.

Entered Term 35 Car. II. B. R. Ret. 12th, and adjudged Termis S. Hil. Anno 36 C. II. Car. II. B. R. T. A.

P L E A.

I. Defendant demands Oyer of the Letters Patents which are set forth in his works: In which (as it hath been observed) the penalty of forfeiture of ship and goods, one moiety to the King, and the other to the Company, and imprisonment, is omitted.

2. There is a clause, that the Company may license strangers or others, and that the King will not without the consent of the Company give licences, &c.

3. That none shall have a Vote in the General Assembly, but be that hath good stock.

4. And there is another clause, which hath not been mentioned by the Counsel on either side; that if it should hereafter appear to his Majesty or his Successors, that Grant, or the continuance thereof, shall not be possible to his Majesty, his heirs and Successors, or to this Realm, that after three years warning, under the Privy Seal or Sign Manual, the same should be utterly void.

For Plea, the Defendant says, by an Act of Parliament, made 15 E. III. It is enacted, that the foal shall be open for all Merchants to sell with their merchandise where they please; and that the Defendant, by virtue of that Act, and according to the Common Law of England, did traffick within those places mentioned in the declaration, without any licence, and against the will of the Company, as the Plaintiffs have declared, prout se bene know.

Plaintiffs demand.

In the debate of this case, at the Bar, there were several matters discounted of; but at length by the consent of both sides, at I apprehend, the case was referred into these two points:

1. Whether these Letters Patent giving or granting licence or liberty to the Plaintiffs, to exercise the sole trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, with prohibition to all others, be good in Law?

2. Admitting the Grant good, whether this action be maintainable for the Plaintiffs?

Now to let me into the debate of these two points: I think not amiss, to remember some things that have been mentioned by the Counsel, that I think are no ways in question.

I. At this time I conceive, therefore, that whether the King may prohibit his subjects from going beyond sea, by writ or otherwise, by his absolute prerogative, without giving any reason, is not the question; nor was it: nor thought a question, till it was lately thrust at the Bar. For the writ in F. N. B. 85, and the Regium Imperium no such thing; and one Book says, the furnishes mentioned in that writ are not invariable. So in Dyer 185 & 375. For surely the King may restrain his subjects from going beyond sea, and is not bound to give any reason for his so doing; but that is not now in question.

II. In the next place, I do not conceive there is any difference (tho' much discourse hath been about Indians and Infidels) whether the East-India were, at the time of the Grant of this Patent, inhabited by Christians or Infidels; tho' by the way, in the debating of this case, I shall shew perhaps that matter may in some measure affect the Defendant, but will not at all affect the Grant to the Plaintiffs. So that I conceive, that whether this country or place, or any other inhabited by Christians or Infidels, that is not otherwise provided for by Act of Parliament, will make but the same question.

III. Whether every clause and article in their Letters Patent, touching forfeiture of ship and goods, imprisonments, or divers other clauses contained in the Charter, be legal or not, is not now in question. For surely it would be hard to maintain them all, and therefore the Plaintiffs Counsel have avoided those questions, by bringing this action; and tho' the Defendant's Counsel have answered them, yet surely it was only intended to fully the cause, and not that they thought them to affect the question.

IV. Nor is it the question, whether by this Grant to the Plaintiffs the King has fettered or confined his prerogative, by putting in a covenant to exclude himself from granting licences to others of his subjects to trade within the limits of the Plaintiffs Charter; tho' Mr. Williams (always a friend to the King's prerogative), in underhand and close terms, seems to be surprised by the moderate and temperate of the Grant; and would have us believe, that he was affected with the dismal consequences that must necessarily ensue by the King's parting with so great a prerogative; and that uttered by the advice, consent, or the solicitation of his Attorney-General, and the rest of his Council; by having a system agreed to the East-India Company for the sake of their money, than they had to the King in discharge of their duty. To acquit them and us, therefore, of that dilemma, I am of opinion, though it makes nothing to the question that is now before us, the King may grant licences to any of his subjects to trade to the East-India, notwithstanding the Charter, or any statute, clause or condition therein contained, to the contrary; and notwithstanding any caution or advertisement, that in his argument he gave to the King, or his relation that he made upon his Council, either for their ignorance or the subtlety of the advice, consent, or the solicitation of his Attorney-General, and the rest of his Council; for that the least of our profession, who's opinions have been quoted by him and others that have argued on the Defendant's side, were then of the King's Council, and were privy to, and advised both these Letters Patent, and all others of the like nature, that have been granted for these hundred years last past. I therefore think fit to say, that I believe Mr. Attorney-General, and the rest of the King's Council, have discharged their duty as well to the King, by maintaining of this Grant, as Mr. Williams has in this instance manifested his loyalty, by endeavouring to destroy it. In short therefore, as I said before, every clause in this Charter is not to be maintained, and therefore is not to affect the question now to be determined.

V. Whereas it has been objected, that though upon the pleadings it is agreed, that the Defendant never was a member of the East-India Company, nor had any licence from them to trade to the Indies, yet he might have a licence from the King; which, as I conceive, the King is not bound to grant by any clause in the Letters Patent; yet I am of opinion, that if the Defendant had any such licence, it ought to have been shewn on his part; which not being done, it ought to be taken by us, as I believe the truth of the fact is, the Defendant never had any such licence.

VI. It was observed, that the Plaintiffs by their declaration had alleged, that this trade could not be managed but by honest Corporations; and by this means they had excluded the King from constituting any more Companies to trade within their limits, tho' perhaps the advantage of the Kingdom might hereafter require it. Nay, tho' the Indies might desire a further treaty of commerce, or that the state of these places might require more Companies to be erected, yet say they, this Grant hath made the Plaintiffs a new Republick, and thereby has altered the constitution of England, in the management of trade by Commonwealths, by placing it in Corporations, who (were they independent upon the Crown) are truly to be called. Yet in as much as I had before observe, that the King is not by this Grant either excluded from making any new treaties with the Indies, or from making any Corporations, or granting any other licence to any of the rest of his subjects, notwithstanding any of the clauses in the Charter, so I am of opinion that that objection also does not affect the question now to be determined; and for that reason, amongst others, I thought it not improper to mention that Clause in the Charter that was omitted at the Bar, which the King has annexed as a condition to his Grant; that if it should hereafter appear to his Majesty or his Successors, that that Grant, or the continuance thereof, in the whole or in any part, should not be probable to his Majesty, his heirs and Successors, or to this Realm, that after three years warning by warrant under the King's Seal or Sign Manual, it should be utterly void. So that it appearing that the King hath never divested himself of the power, nor at the time of the Grant did design to be prevented, so shew his inclination for the promoting of the advantage of his Kingdoms by giving himself scope enough to oblige all those contingencies. Yet by the way I cannot but observe to his Majestie, so these his dislike to a Commonwealth, declared it to be absolutely opposite to the interest of a single person; but the single person he can call himself far, was not the King and his prerogative, but his Client the Defendist, and his trade, who thin I cannot in propriety of speech call a Commonwealth, yet I cannot but think this apostrophe of his seems to proceed from a Republican principle. For by his interposing has been the first fabric that within this Kingdom, for near an hundred years last past, hath in Wolmington set up against himself against the King's uncontrold prerogative in the Grant of the Wolmington and the Wolmington of his Majesty's subjects will be derived from the first definition.

There were some other superfluous objections made against the clauses in the Charter, and against the formality of the pleadings, which I think not necessary to remember; and therefore having thus premised, I shall now descend to those points I think only material in this cause.

31 The first and greatest point in the cause is, Whether this Grant of the Goldreale to the Indies, to the East-India Company, exclusive of all others, be a good grant to Law or not? And I am of opinion it is. And by the way, I cannot but make the same remark in this case, as my Lord Chief-Baron Ponson made in the great case of Bairn in the Exchequer, Year 27; that it is a great grace and eminent act of consideration in the King to the Defendant, that he does permit this great point of his prerogative to be disputed in Wolfe's Chancery; but by this he does sufficiently signify to all his subjects, that he will persevere in nothing, tho' it seem never so much for his advantage; but according to the Laws of the Land. I shall therefore endeavour to make it appear, that he is invested with this prerogative by the Law of this Nation: but by the Law I do not only mean the customary Common Law or Statutes of this Realm, which are native and peculiar to this Nation, which as Mr. Attorney well observed, are not adapted to this purpose, but such other Laws also as be common to other Nations, as well as ours, and have been received and used time out of mind; by the King and People of England; and I shall shew, that the Laws of England are not the general Laws of Europe, but the general Laws of England in those cases, namely, the general Laws of Nations, the Law-Merchant, the Imperial or Civil Law, every of which Laws, so far forth as the same have been received and used in England time out of mind, must be properly said to be Laws of England.

And for the better communicating my thoughts upon this subject, I will proceed by these steps:

1. I will very briefly consider of the inland trade within this Kingdom, and the foreign trade with other Nations; and therein observe, that the King's prerogative is concerned in both, and that there is a great difference between both, allow'd by the Municipal Laws of this Kingdom.

2. I shall show that the liberty of foreign trade may be restrain'd.

3. That foreign trade and commerce being introduc'd by the Law of Nations, ought to be govern'd and judg'd according to those law.

4. That by the Laws of Nations, the regulation and restraint of trade and commerce is reckon'd inter Regalia, i. e. the prerogative of the sovereign legislature.

5. That tho' by the Laws of this Land, and by the Laws of all other Nations, Monopolies are prohibited, yet Societies to trade, such as the Plaintiffs, to certain places exclusive of others, are no Monopolies; by the Laws of this Land, but are allow'd to be erected both here, and in other countries, and are thereforen'd by the usage and practice of both in all times.

6. I shall show the authorities that are extant in our Books, together with precedents, and reasons both publick and pollicke; for, as Mr. Lowmeyer says, that such reasons are good dardlines for our judgment in such cases as these, being demonstrations of the cause of antiquity; and therefore also observe the necessity and advantage of said Sacrament, and by the way endeavour to answer the several Abuses of Parliament, precedents and authorities, with all other the objections that have been made against my conclusions.

conclusion. To be sure, to consider the difference between the inland and the foreign trade allowed of in our Books, and that the King's prerogative doth affect both. As to Manufactures, under which all sorts of Artificers are concerned, I think they remain with the nobility by the Common Law; and as Mr. Attorney observes, the publick wealth is little concerned therein, and that the King's prerogative is not so much concerned in the exercise of labour and industry, yet even in that the King's prerogative hath not been totally excluded: for as it is taken notice of in our Books, all things that are at this day enjoyed by custom or prescription, had their commencement by royal Grants; and by that means no Artificer within the City of London was ever free from the payment of a licence or tax. Garretts cannot use the trade of Tanner, or of Bookbinder, or of Shoemaker.

3. As to the trade of merchandise or inland commerce, generally speaking, it had the same freedom by the Common Law, but was subject nevertheless to be limited or restrained by the King's prerogative in several particulars; as for instance, to prevent all forebidding and engrossing. So Mr. Attorney did well observe, that numbers of people could not meet to traffic or merchandise, without being in danger of being punished as unlawful assemblies. The Crown therefore granted the Liberties of Fairs and Markets, for the sake of commerce and trade, all which did originally proceed from the Crown, and therefore by absolute Liberty might be granted to the Citizens, to the Knights, or to the Burgesses, and so forth, but only in defiance one taken notice of in our Books, which well couldn't may go against any in the case of the Bar. Regius, fol. 207. The King grants to the Abbot of Wigmore and his successors, that they should hold a Fair at Wigmore thirty odd days together, with a prohibition that no merchant buy or sell within seven miles of that Fair during that time; and the King does then command the Sheriffs of London by his writ to seize the body of an inhabitant of Salisbury, for selling cloths in London within the time of the Fair. Now here is a Charter granted to a particular person exclusive of others, for a time subject to more objections than the Charter ten years in question, yet approved of by our Books. Hence it came that the Citizens of London were not content to please the Crown in the purchase of money, for all such came originally from the Crown. And as I find before in the case of Edin, in 1 May now lay in the case of Copeland, that the City's claim liberty and prerogives by prescription, yet not originally proceeded from the Crown, and are therefore forfeitable to the Crown: an eminent instance hereof is that case of the City of London, where during their liberty, which they choose to prefer, cannot be taken from them, and Act of Parliament, in this Court, their liberties and franchises were not intended to be taken away, as it will be all intent and purpose, till his Majesty shall be pleased of his bounty to release them. Now that the island of Jamaica is concerned, in Corporations, Markets, or Fairs, which all proceed from the Crown, does plainly evince that the King's prerogative has a more immediate influence over dealings in merchandises, than it has over other mechanic crafts and mysteries: and that, as Mr. Attorney did well observe, to prevent frauds, deceits, and other abuses either in weight, measures, or otherwise, which would certainly interrupt such commerce. But our Law goes a step further, and allows further difference between island merchandises, and such as are sold in a foreign way of dealing, which confirms that strict distinction. The Common Law and Statutes of this Realm, affecting the Law-Merchant, which is part of the Law of Nations, should decide such controversies. Devises terms H. IV. fol. 49. a complaint made to the King and Council of some debts taken away from a Merchant; it was answered in that case, that the matter might be determined at the Common Law: but the Lord-Chancellor said, that the fact being brought by a Merchant, who is not bound to sue according to the Common Law, to have his cause tried by twelve men, and to observe the other solemnities of our Law, but that fact in Globery according to the Law of Nature, and the Commercial Law of the World. And it is in that case agreed by all the judges, that the fact being brought by a Merchant, who could not be sued, as other English merchandises might be, by the Rule of the Common Law, as wares and draps, which do not plainly then make a difference in the consideration of our Law, between foreign merchandises that such the seas, and other inland goods and commodities. If two Merchants be partners in merchandises, one shall have an action of account against the other, Joannes Leges Mercatorum, says the Registre, fol. 135.

 & F. N. B. 117. D. And yet by the rule of the Common Law, if two men be jointly possessed of other goods, which are no merchandises, he cannot bring an action as account against the other, if one of the partners die, the Executor may bring his account against the heir for his society, Reg. 83. F. N. B. 157. But if it were a partnership for other goods, it should follow per hoc asserendum, according to the rules of the Common Law.

It is an admission of guilt upon a simple Contract, the Defendant may wage his Law; but it is otherwise in a Contract about Merchandise, in Law Reports, Bate's Case, Reg. 260. A. at Common Law, the goods of Ecclesiastical Persons were executed from toll; but says the writ, Domus Abbatis Abbatibus aliquos non carere de tollis. It shows, that then they fall under another consideration. If one man wrongs another man of his goods, here is an admission of trespass will lie: But if a Merchant's Goods be taken upon or beyond the Seas, there must be a Writ of Replevin to obtain satisfaction; the Parl. Roll. 3 Ed. 1. At 10. in Arden's V. Arden Ueneris Ueneris, where the Bailiffs of Sussex were so commanded by Writ, quod omnes Mercatorum Lenditores et parvi Agiles accedentes per bona et casuella sua ad quicquid forentur Legem Mercatorum et Consuetudinem Regni, ad satisfactionem Mercatorum Parvorum, &c. Where, by the way, observe, that Lex Mercatorum, which differs from the ordinary Common Law, is to be confutata regis Agilis; by which others may observe, that the rights and remedies of the Law, are not from others the eye of Law, nor the allowance of Common Law itself.

Several Acts of Parliament have been also made for the more speedy recovery of debts contracted for merchandise, as the Statute of Aban Barrow, the Statute of Alfordwille, and the Statute Exchequer. Ed. III.

top. 2. among other things it touched, That for merchandise taken away, the Party shall be arrested, and finally ready Process shall be against him from day to day, and from hour to hour, according to the Law Merchant, and not at the Common Law. So the Statute for enabling the Court of Commerce, designed for the speedy sale of Merchandise, has left the determination according to the Law of Merchants; and therefore hath ordered the Judge of the Admiralty Court always to preside in their Commission. By all which I think it may be concluded, there is a great difference allowed of, between the inland and foreign commerce, and that.

I shall endeavour to prove, that the liberty of foreign trade may be restrained.

And here I must premise, that as at first all things were promiscuously common and undivided to all, so the free exercise of this universal right, was then instead of property, but as soon as the number of men increased, and they found by experience the inconvenience of such a thing, they began to divide amongst themselves the rights of ownership and compact, either by purchase, or by institution, or implied, by senior Civitas &c.

After this Government was established, and laws were made, even for the ordering these things in which no man had any right; as for example, forests, places uninhabited, islands in the sea, wild beasts, fishes, and birds; the former were usually gained and disposed of by him that had the sovereignty over the People; the latter, by him that had the dominion over the Lands and Waters, who might forbid others from hunting, fishing, &c.

And in virtue of this universal Law, his Majesty and his Predecessors have always defended the several Plantations abroad, that have been discovered or gained by any of their subjects, and may do for the future, in case any other be discovered and acquired. For tho' the laws of Nations command nothing which the law of Nature forbids, yet they may banish and circumscribe that which the Law of Nature leaves free, and forbid that which naturally may be lawful. Now to apply this to our present purpose of trade and commerce, Mr. Williams quoted that common law Latin, Commerce dicitur esse liberum from whence he infers, that by the Law of Nature and Nations, the free trade, and traffic ought to be free as the air, and that for that he quoted Grotius de Jure Belli lib. 2. c. 1. Epistle to the Lord Admiral Gratius de Mare Nostrum, where Gratius, Mare & Littora Alteri Tunc Sine Jure Communi. Williams, cap. 3. De parochis, de Mare & de Jure Juri Communi. Sir John Burroughs his Sovereignty of the Seas, Nactus de Jure de Dominis. But I think none of these Books can warrant his conclusion; for sure that expression, Commerce Juri Alteri, cannot possibly be understood in this was the constant and ancient usage. And it is not more natural for strangers than are abroad, to take notice of the King's publick Edicts, which are known to be of great importance in all Countries, more than they would of an Act of Parliament that affects the King's own dominions only? Besides, it appears more impertinent, if you turn these words into a Proviso; and then it will amount to no more in plain English than this, provided that this Law shall continue, except it is longer express'd; which surely would be very ridiculous.

Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor both, in their arguments, quoted several Records and Precedents, wherein the King, in all times after the making of that Act, did prohibit strangers from coming in, and did command them out when they were here, at pleasure. I shall not trouble you with the repetition of the Records, for they were many, say, the King when Acts of Parliament had prohibited, did grant free-coming; and of that sort, in Roli Prærogative, 180. you will find several instances; and in the several Acts of Parliament cited by Mr. Attorney, to confirm the King's prerogative, as to free coming, in each Appare. Hyndes fol. 442. is said, that the King by the Common Law, might prohibit the importation of foreign goods; and whereas added against such Prohibition, fortified his Ship.

The King may prohibit any of his subjects from going beyond the seas at pleasure, and read them again as he thought fit; and that, as I have said before, without giving any reason. The Books of Statutes N. B. and Regius, before recited, make this evident. Mr. Attorney indeed cited many instances wherein the Kings had made use of their prerogatives, as 7 Ed. II. fol. 10. Spensford Ed. III. fol. 24. Stat. 5 R. cap. 2. which confirms it, 3 Ed. IV. fol. 10. Spensford Ed. III. fol. 12. with many more; and indeed I think it was not denied, but that after a Prohibition, it was an offence almost as it is the Defendant's Counsel for any subjects to go beyond the seas, 2y. 135. fol. 198. Spensford. And that is sufficient for the present purpose, to say being a Prohibition in the Charters in question, to all persons that are not there mentioned. What influence the King's prerogative may necessarily have upon foreign trade and commerce, appears by his frequent granting Letters of Mart and Reprieve: They are not allowed of by the Law of Nations, Civil or Common Law; for thereby no man is bound by another's act, without his consent, but by the general consent of Nations, homines recipiunt legem. The King only has the power of making leagues and treaties with foreign Princes, upon which only all foreign trade does depend; and since leagues are made upon such terms and conditions, and under such limitations, as both Princes think fit. Many instances to this purpose were also cited by Mr. Attorney, to which I refer myself; and the difference that arise from Merchants beyond the seas, are to be determined according to their leagues, and cannot be decided by the municipal laws of this Realm, which cannot be put in execution in foreign parts.

Fourthly, The King is absolutely Master of War and Peace; which he could not be, if he had not a power to lay restraint upon his own subjects in relation to foreign commerce, since 1399, that war is proclaimed, all publick commerce is prohibited; and the Council that signed for the Defendant, admitted, That the King might prohibit his subjects to go to trade beyond the seas in cases of wars or leagues. How strangely preposterous then would it be for a man to imagine, that the King should have an absolute power of War and Peace, and yet be denied the means to perform the one, and prevent the other! Is not that therefore the great reason why the King is at great expense in maintaining Ambassadors and Envoys in all the trading parts of the World, without which we should be in a perpetual state of War! Would it not be monstrous, that when the King is entered into league with any foreign Prince, in a matter of trade, very advantageous to his People, to have it in the power of any one of his subjects to destroy it? As an instance, suppose a league between our King and the Emperor of Morocco, for a trade to Tongo, were made upon condition, That no English Ship coming there for commerce, should be above a hundred ton, and a fleet of merchant ships within that condition, were in Port at Tongo; and Mr. Somers, with the same ordinary as he seems to appear in this case, should have gone with a Ship of above a hundred ton to Tongo; that would have been an absolute breach of the league, we should have been immediately in a state of war, the merchants and goods absolutely forfeited unto the Emperor by the Law of Nations, and they and their families thereby undone, without any remedy, till Mr. Somers should be pleased to return into England; and also being with him an Estate sufficient to make them a recompence, and then also perhaps it would be difficult to contrive such an act as in our Law, to compel Mr. Somers to do it. Besides, the King has another way, of his Ambassadors and Ministers in foreign parts cannot put all that right should be done to his subjects; or if Mr. Somers's merchant Ship, and all its cargo, had been wrongfully taken away from him by any foreign Prince, him by the King's declaring a War, and compelling them to make restitution by force; the contrivance is wherein will all of us, that foreign traders, would be thereby undone, both in their persons and goods; and it would be very hard for all the King's subjects to lie under the burthen and charge, and the profit and advantage above only to a few. And lastly, by the way, I think it is not proper to take notice of an objection that was made by the Defendant's Counsel, of the unreasonable that the King should be entrusted with this prerogative, for as well as it may restrain persons trading to the sea, he may also restrain them from trading into any other part of the World. The next objection was touching an embargo, as well as upon the said instance as a subject to his Prince. For as it is a maxim in our Law, the King can do as he pleases to do justice; and I am for the Defendant, that our present King has no more power as the least embargo for such disorder, and I think I may truly say, we are as safe by our Prince's own natural inclinations, as we can be by any law in this particular. The King has the absolute power of punishing all offenders by his inherent prerogative, who an Act of Parliament cannot deprive him of, the case of murder is a full instance of that, not was that prerogative ever depurged in any age, tho' twice in rebellion, having in that high case of the Earl of Essex, and that without any reason, that I could ever hear of. Is it therefore to be alledged and pretended, that the King will pardon all the traitors, murderers, robbers, and other felons, and make use of his prerogative to let all malefactors escape?

The King is the Fountain of Honour, as well as of Justice, and in virtue of that prerogative, may ennoble as many of his subjects as he pleases; and thereby exempt them from arrests, and other common proceeds of the Law, by means whereof men do more speedily recover their just debts, and have redress for injuries. Is it therefore to be pretended the King will make such a glut of Nobles, because he may do it? And as this is against his inclination, it is certainly it is against his interest, to make such Grants as are detrimental to the Country from so far, for it is more for the King's benefit than it can be for his subjects, the greater the importation of foreign commodities is, for from thence arise his customs and imposition, these necessary supports to the Crown: and therefore, in those parts, the King is the only person truly concerned in this question, for this Island supported its inhabitants in many ages without any foreign trade, at all, having in it all things necessary for the life of man.

Terra pascit ovem, non ovem pascit, says the Poet. And truly, I think, if at this day most of the English commodities were absolutely prohibited, it might be injurious as to the profit of some few traders, it may not be to the generality of the inhabitants of this Realm. And therefore, as I have offered these instances to prove the King should have such a prerogative; as the next place I come to, shew, that the Kings of England have exercised their prerogative in all ages; and as the King has the power of restraint of foreign trade, he is the only Judge when it is proper to use that power, which seems plainly to be for the same reason. And I think Mr. Somers's remark of the difficulty of this case, that it should needs make the King to call a Parliament to assist him with power to determine this question, is not so to be paid by without some satisfaction.

God be praised, 'tis in the King's power to call and dissolve Parliaments; when and how he pleases; and he is the only Judge of this Arbitrio Regis; that he should think fit to consult with the Parliament about, Aut Mr. Somers would do well to leave himself the trouble of advising the King of what things are fit for him to consult with his Parliament about, 'till such time as he be thereunto called. But it hath been too much practised at this and other times in Windsor-Hod, of late years, to captivate the Leg Gens, by letting the power of the King, and advancing, I had almost said, the prerogative of the People; and hence hence comes the many and bad use of the King's subjects in parts abroad, by making the power of the King thought to be inestimable, as though he were a monarch Duke of Perse, being absolutely dependent upon his Parliament. Would it not be mightily for the honour and dignity of the Crown of England, think you, that the Emperor of Fus and Moscow, or any Prince of the eastern part of the World, should be told, That Mr. Somers, one of the King of Great Britain's subjects, came into the Emperor's Territories against his Prince's consent, and that he had no power to hinder him, unless he would consent with all his Nobles, and the Representatives of all his common subjects, to assist therein? Would not the Emperor believe Somers to be the greater Prince of the two? But tho' such sort of declarations are so much for the service of the Crown, and for the honour of the Kingdom, as they would have it believed, yet I think they have the same tendency of duty and service to the King, with some other matters that of late have happened amongst us, viz. Some have been so concerned, as well for the safety and security of his Majesty's sacred Person, and so make him formidable to his rebellious subjects at home, as to desire that his Guards might be discharged, because it looked as though he designed to ride by a handing army; and to show their tenderness to his sacred Life, would have him removed from the assistance of well Counsellors, as they called them; and put himself into the hands of assassins, as the Emperor's Princes were not sufficient to furnish that piece of state-policy in one and the same age. And in order that he might have sufficient to support the necessity, as well as the dignity of a Crown, which all good subjects are zealous for, I am, I have, usefully endeavored to have prevented him from being able to borrow any money upon the credit of any part of his revenue, a privilege that the meanness of the person concerned in that question would think themselves highly injured to be deprived of.

These and the like attempts, if not prevented, will render the King and his Government low and despicable in all other parts of the World: And as for the instance between a Denizen and a man naturalized, I think it rather makes against, than for Mr. Somers's conclusion, as in the main question. For tho' the King cannot naturalize a man, and thereby give him inheritable blood, as a natural-born subject, to inherit lands; yet he may make an Alien a Denizen; and by that means he becomes to have as much privilege as any of the King's natural subjects both as to trade and commerce, which is the only question now before us: And I cannot help being of opinion, that this Kingdom is in greater regard to itself, and the inhabitants more prosperous at home, when the prerogative of the Crown was more absolute than now it is: therefore it is our duty as good Judges, as well as good Subjects, to endeavour to support it as much as we can by Law. And I proceed to mention some precedents and authorities, whereby the Kings of England have in all ages exercised this part of their prerogative, of restraining, disposing, and ordering matters of commerce and foreign trade, by Royal Licences, Charters, and Dispensations.

And herein I shall content myself with as much brevity as I can, only producing some few of these many instances, which I will not great care and study found out by Mr. Attorney, and Mr. Solicitor; and by them to be learnedly and properly applied to the case in question.

1. Therefore it has been well observed, that the Statutes, which were the common and publick Marts for all Merchants to refer to, were first created by the King's prerogative, without any Act of Parliament; as it doth plainly appear by the several Acts of Parliament mentioned as the Bar, either for setting the places, or enlarging the commodities that were permitted to be brought to the Staple; for surely in all times, when that no other Ships should be thus freighted for foreign Parts, till the Ships of that Town were full freighted; as he did, Rex. Clauf. 41. E. III. m. 25. de Lendæ, Druar. or any other Town of Trade complain? Would any of these Gentlemen that contend for this Liberty of Trade, adventure with their Persons to Alger, and when they are seized upon by the Algerians, tell them we are Englishmen, and we have by the Common Law of England, and many Statutes of our Kingdom, which support the Liberty of the Subject, a Freedom to trade wherever we please? Or would not they rather say, we have a Pass from the King of England, and rely upon that, which prefumes Treaties, Leagues, and Tracts between Princes; and in case that will not prevail, the King will let them right? And in the Charter that is now before us, there is a particular Refutation and Limitation of Trade to any Prince in unity with our King. Now as the constant Usage and Practice of other Countries warrants such Statutes as these, so do ours too: For, as I said, the Spain Towns were some of the first Corporations of Trade that we read of in History; so was it thought the Interest of England to support and encourage them.

King H. III. gave them great Privileges, and the Sail-yards for their Residence, which they enjoyed near 300 Years, managing their Trade by an Alderman and Council, called The Guild of the Haven, importing the Trade of England for Grain, Cables, Masts, Pitch, Tar, &c. and under that Colour the Joynists at this Day claim several Privileges.

It is observed by many Historians, that the most Bounding Trades have been begun by united Societies, and Partners.

In this Kingdom a Patent was first obtained for the eroding the Staple, from E. III. before any Act of Parliament interdicted in that Trade, and proceeded under several Regulations till the Time of Queen Elizabeth. In the Book I have before, Majesty's Letters Patents, fol. 170. 622. 7. His Company of Merchants are above 400 Years standing, as that Book reckons from 1248, when the said Merchants obtained Privileges of John Duke of Brabant, and were called the Brotherhood of St. Thomas Bachelors of Canterbury: Which were confirmed by King H. III. H. IV. H. V. H. VI. E. I. H. II. H. III. H. VI. who gave them the Name of Wool-Stack Company, and after time confirmed by H. VIII. E. I. Q. M. Q. Elizabeth, and King James, not without many Exemptions and Privileges, especially, says that Book, of late raising them to be Monopolies, and unprofitable to the Commonwealth, being that all our Cloths are not dressed and dyed in England; yet it still prevailed, as being thought for the publick good.

And 'tis observable, that Queen Elizabeth did not only wish, what was done by her Predecessors, but augmented and greatly enlarged the Privileges of this ancient Company; and confirmed the Charter of the Wool-Stack Company, granted by Philip and Mary, and set up several other Companies, in the first Year, mentioned at the Bar in the English-India Company, and the Liverpool and the English Company. And although this ancient and beneficial Company of Staplers was often opposed by particular Persons, and complained of as a Monopoly intruding upon the Liberty of the Subject, in several Parliaments, in the Time of H. IV. H. VII. E. VI. and Queen Mary; yet all Parties being heard, their Complaints were fully answered, and the Company's Privileges ratified and enlarged.

Again, in Queen Elizabeth's Time, the Clothiers having prevailed against the Company, the clothing Companies were almost quickly raised, and reduced to that Extremity, that in 29 Eliz. the Lords of the Council first for the Members of that Company, desiring them to mollify their Privileges, and cheerfully to proceed in their Society; with Assurance of all Countenance and Assistance from the Government. And in the Reigne of King James, after several Interepleas had endeavoured to destroy the Company, the King published his Proclamation to restore the Company to its ancient Privileges.

So did King Charles I. 7. Dec. 1634. reciting, "Whereas we have taken into our princely Consideration the manifold Benefits that redounded to this Kingdom; and finding how much Order and Government may be conceived in the said Trade, and Advancement of the same, we have thought fit, with the Advice of our Privy-Council, &c." There he gives an Establishment to the Company, and prohibits any to intrude upon their Privileges, upon pain of such Punishments as the Star-Chamber shall inflict.

Since this, it may be worth Consideration, whether the breaking of this Company, has not occasioned the great Decay of our Trade in Wool: It being agreeable to Reason, that as so few can be effectual without Courts of Justice to put them in Execution; nor a flagrant Army subvert without Discipline: So a flagrant Trade managed by particular Persons, whilst every one is free to attend his own private Interest, will run the Trade in general, especially such a hazardous Trade as this to the English, which already hath been too chargeable, and can only be prevented by the Conduct and Government of a public Society: And fairly to look after and settle these Matters, properly belongs to the Care and Prudence of our Governors.

Now I shall observe, how the Practice has been both in Queen Elizabeth's Time, and ever since, and that although many Charters like ours at the Bar have been granted; and none ever demanded by a Judge in Windsor, but so many as obtained, have risen private Interests, will run the Trade in general, especially such a hazardous Trade as this to the English, which already hath been too chargeable, and can only be prevented by the Conduct and Government of a public Society: And fairly to look after and settle these Matters, properly belongs to the Care and Prudence of our Governors.

and did obtain a special Privilege to exclude those Foreigners, which, had not that Act of Parliament been made, they had been liable to; which I take to be an Authority full, as to the Case at the Bar.

Queen Elizabeth, during her Reign, granted several Charters of the like Nature, which pulled the Persons of her Attorney and Solicitor, learned Men in her Profession. In the Beginning of her Reign, her Lord Chief-Baron Willes was Solicitor, Sir Gilbert Gerard Attorney-General, and pulled those Patents both to the Raffia and East Companies, 32. Eliz. my Lord Chief Justice Popham was Attorney, and the Lord-Chancellor Egerton Solicitor, in whole Time some few such Charters were also granted like to this at the Bar. And then my Lord Gage was Attorney-General, and my Lord Chief-Baron Fleming Solicitor-General, who appeared thereof; and it is observable, that in the 43 and 44 of the Queen, the Parliament took Notice of many Patents of Monopolies, as it appears by the Book cited at the Bar, Tramper's Collection, 214. and 245. The Parliament seemed to be as high as ever they were in any Act before, and particularly were in mind by those Patents. A List of all were brought in by Mr. Secretary Cecil, that were thought grievous or prejudicial to the Commonwealth; and though there were a Catalogue of forty or fifty, amongst whom that of Darg is one, yet the Parliament, nor more other, complained of any Charter granted to Corporations, but they continued undisturbed. And by the way it is not amiss to observe, that Darg's Patent was not immediately dissolved in Parliament, but referred to take its Pace in the Star-Chamber; the good Reason, that pulled that Judgment was, the Statute that was put upon the bare Trade; and in it appears in Mist's Reports, 672. And thus stood these Charters; the Clive Charter, the Turkey Company, the Barbery Company, the Givine Company, all Charters of sole Trade, excluding others, remained in Trade during all Queen Elizabeth's Time.

But in the third Year of King James was the first Act made for opening a general Trade to Spain, Portugal, and France, so that all the King's Subjects; which could not be done in Windsor, as appears by the Preamble to that Act, nor does that Act call these Charters Monopolies, or give them any other Name of the like; nor does it leave all Charters of foreign Trade, Love to Spain, Portugal, and France, to remain as they did before. And in the 4th of James, cap. 9. there is Notice taken particularly of the Charter granted to the East Merchants of the sole Trade to France; and because it was thought to be damaged by the general Words of that Statute E. III. yet it is there enacted and declared, That the said Statute of Patents, neither did nor shall it dissolve, diminish or impeach the said Charter, or the said Company in any of their Privileges, Liberties, or Immunities, granted unto them by the said Charter, any thing contained in the general Acts to the contrary notwithstanding, in the Act of Parliament which follows.

I. That the Parliament thought that the Charter to East for sole Trade to France, exclusive of others, was for the publick Benefit and Weal of that City.

II. That the Letters Patent were good in Law, and did not want the Assistance of an Act of Parliament to support them; for that Act does not confirm those Letters Patent, but provides only, that the Statute 3. James should not by general Words be thought to impeach or destroy them. Now had the Parliament thought the Charter void or infirm, they might have confirmed or strengthened it, as the Statute Patent was; but they concluded, that had it not been for the Statute of Tennis, the Charter was good to all Intents and Purposes: And so this I take to be full Authority in the Case at the Bar. But to proceed, the Grounded Patent for sole Filling, exclusive of others, granted by Queen Elizabeth, is held good, Rolle, Part 3. fol. 3. Taylor vs. Isbells's Case, and the Case of the Abbot of Windsor, is agreed to be Law; in Darg's Case, Mist, 673. by Mr. Justice Dunderidge: And by the way he gives good Advice to all Persons that dispute the King's Prerogative; and for the Flemish I hear to Mr. Levy, and others that are now in Court; and I think need the Advice, Corps will fall into his Eyes; Et qui Moysiam formosus praecepit, appropinquat splendore suo.

In King James's Time, many Grants, like ours, were made, but particularly in 7. James, the Patent granted to the English-India Company by Queen Elizabeth, was, by the Advice of her Council, as well as by my Lord Holborn, then Attorney-General, and Sir Francis Bacon, Solicitor-General, confirmed and allowed with the same Clauses as the Charter at the Bar; and so remained undisturbed and uninterrupted all King James's Reign, and was not thought to be any way touched or moved as by the Preamble in the Statute, 43. Elizabeth, cap. 1. Stat. 9. only pointing at the Monopoly Patent complained of in that Parliament of 43 of the Queen, which I mentioned before. Then comes the Statute to much insisted on by the Defendants' Counsel, commonly called the Statute of Monopolies, Stat. 17. James, cap. 3. which certainly doth not at all affect the Case at the Bar. For first, This Charter is not a general Grant for the sole buying, selling, making, using of any thing within this Realm, which are the very Words of the Act: Nor does that Charter give the English-India Company Licence at Toleration to do so, or, except in this respect, to the Import or Export of any L. or Statute, which are the only things provided against by that Act. But the Parliament was formed to do the same general Cure of all such Charters as this at the Bar, as the Parliament did in 3. James, of this particular Charter of East; and therefore, so the End that that Words in the Beginning of this Act of Monopolies might not be thought to extend to Charters, or Corporations for Trade, there is a Provision, Stat. 9. that that Act should not extend to any Corporations, Companies, or Fellowships, &c. erected for the Maintenance, Enlargement, or ordering any Trade or Merchandise, but such as have been as they were before that Act, without any Innovation. And it is observable, that the Parliament thought that the good Reason sufficient to support these Charters that were then in being, was their being for Trade and Merchandise; but made particular Provision for the buying of Patents for Inland Commodities, viz. such as Salt, Gunpowder, Ordnance, Shot, and the like.

So that this Company was in full Possession of their Privilege of sole Trade, exclusive of others, all King James's Time, and King Charles's Time, and all the Prejudicates of the Crown were invalid; and the crown's Head too was taken off by Traders and Rebels. But the Providence of God

God being referred to our King, and relieved him with all his ancient rights, as well as referred to our ancient rights and privileges, and hence, as Henry, was in his Throne, but amongst the other considerations, that he had for the publick weal of his subjects, he considered the publick advantage of this Kingdom suffering by trade, and navigation, in one of his first thoughts he laid upon this Company. For in the 12th, 15th, he by his Letters Patent taking notice of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, and King James, granted to the East-India Company, and of the injuries that was done to them by the late troubles; with the advice of his Council, and approbation of Mr. Attorney General, and a Lord-Chancellor each, he granted and confirmed to them all their privileges. The 27th of May, in the 20th of his reign, Lord-Governor then being Attorney, and my Lord-Keeper, that were in, Solmes, he confirms this Charter, and grants to the East-India Company other privileges, by another Charter in the 21st year of his reign, at which time the Lord-Keeper was Attorney, and Sir William Jones, Solmes, he confirms the former, and grants more privileges: and at the 24th year of his reign, by the Charter now in question, passed with the approbation of the private Attorney and Solicitor, men of great ability in these professions, and of whom, were they not present, I should say much more; the Charter to this Company was confirmed with additional privileges.

Now has this Charter passed only the approbation of his Majesty and Council, since his happy Reformation, but the Parliament has likewise taken notice of it, the Statute 14 Car. II. cap. 14. takes notice of it to be of great advantage to the publick. The 26th of the 29th of this King for poll-money, taxes them with twenty shillings for every hundred pound in Stock. In the great case between Stewart and the East-India Company, the House of Commons defended them, even to an arbitration between the two Houses.

Mr. Jones and some other Linnen-Drapers and Traders of London, taking the advantage of the heats that are frequently petitioned the House of Commons of late years, especially against the point of prerogative, did furiously attack the East-India Company, but without any success: and this Company was never assailed in Windsor-Hall till this case at the Bar. I cannot help therefore this observation, that as the King by his Charter 15th, takes notice, that the Charters granted by Queen Elizabeth and King James remained unattested till the late rebellion; so the Interlocutor against the King's prerogative in this particular, and the several conspiracies against the King's life in this last heinous conspiracy, full appeared in Windsor-Hall about the same time.

As to the objection I have not yet given answer to, I think they are but few: my Lord Chief-justice, cited by Mr. Palsgrave, 2 Inst. 540. where my Lord observes new things, which with fair pretences prove hurtful to the Commonwealth, and savouring they reckon, that new Corporations taking into foreign parts and home, which under the fair pretences of order and government, in conclusion end to the hindrance of traffick, and in the end produce Monopolies, does not all concern the case at the Bar. For the Charter that hath continued for an 100 years without any interruption till of late, can neither be thought a new Corporation nor hindrance of trade; and Sir Edward Coke, when he was Attorney-General, and paid this Charter, was as learned in the Law, as he was when he published that Book, and was turned out of being Chief-Justice, did not think this Charter needed that caution.

As to the case of the Guany Patent between Horn and Joy, that cannot affect the case at the Bar.

For first, the Judgment in that case was given upon the point of pleading, and not upon the validity of the Patent.

II. That Patent was in perfect opposition to the Statute, 7 Jac. that opened a free trade to Spice, and therefore could not be reformed by the King's Letters Patent, but there is no such objection to our case.

The Counsel that argued for the Defendant seemed to allow the Charters to the Pirgusa, Turky, and England Companies, which are exclusive of others, to be good; because they are managed by a Regulation, and not by a Joint-Stock, which surely can make no difference: for it is a Grant of a sole-trade to them, exclusive of others, as well as the case at the Bar. And 'tis as hard to get into the Turky Company, as it is into this; and may be more chargeable: for you cannot be a Member of the Turky Company, but you must be a Freeman of the City of London; and makes you liable to all the great offices of charge in that Government, But a freedom of the East-India Company may be purchased at a much easier rate; the Members of the East-India Company are as visible as those of the Turky. And though it was said, the East-India Company were sometimes invisible, yet, were the Turky Company infected with so many Interlopers as the East-India Company have, they would not appear so glorious and splendid as they now do, and as I heartily wish they may long continue. But the King by this Charter has referred to himself a power to destroy and alter the whole Charter, or any part thereof, so as to put in a way of regulation instead of a Joint-Stock, in such manner as he shall see his great wisdom think fit; therefore it becomes us in duty and modesty to wait till we receive his further royal pleasure therein. And whereas it was objected at the Bar, because the King cannot lay any imposition upon foreign trade, therefore he cannot restrain it;

I do not know to what end that objection was made, because it does not affect the question at the Bar; but left it may obtain the effect, that I profess was aimed at, I think it not amiss to say, that even at this day there is much more may be said in the maintenance of the King's prerogative in Windsor-Hall, in this case, than can be offered against his prerogative in this. But in as much as that and several other objections against the Charter proceeded from an unreasonable, as well as unmanly mind; they have of the Crown. I cannot but remember that his sacred Majesty was not so misrulerful of them. For he since his relaxation has bestowed upon his subjects more than all his predecessors, put them all together, face the conquest, ever and. Nay, he in a moment frankly bestowed upon us more than ever he before he should be troubled with us again, for by his act of indemnity he bestowed upon his subjects their lives, liberties and estates, which were all justly and legally forfeited to him, by the late rebellion; the consideration whereof will prevent all fears and jealousies, and prevent in all loyal hearts a firm reliance, to secure their lives and fortunes, to freely bestowed upon us by him, to maintain the Crown and just Prerogatives thereof; so that it may have a perpetual continuance in this Royal Family, in a lawful succession; which I heartily pray may be long as the sun and moon endure.

From what has been said, I hope it will plainly appear, that the Law of this Land, and the Law of Nature to Nations, allow the power of making Companies to manage traffick, exclusive to all others, to be in the Crown, that this is reckoned to be inter Regia Potestas, that no Act of Parliament does restrain this Prerogative, that the practice of all Acts of Parliament has been accordingly; that particularly such Companies have been erected in England, and such Companies have been as great pollution of these prerogatives for such a number of years; that they have passed the approbation of many learned men; that they have been thought for the publick advantage of the Nation, by so many Kings and Princes, with the advice of their Council, both in and out of Parliament; that all Statutes and Authorities of Law that we can meet with in our Books affirm it, and none that I can meet with to the contrary.

That the East-India Company has, fully run the hazard, and been at great expence.

In discovering places, Erecting Forts, and keeping Forces, Settling Colonies, And making leagues and treaties abroad;

It would be against natural justice and equity, (which no municipal law can take away) for others to reap the benefit and advantage of all this: Especially since all this has been occasioned by an Act of the publick, and by the just prerogative of the Crown, under which they clear.

So that now, supposing the matter had been doubtful at the beginning (yet the contrary is evident), yet after so many years undisputed and uninterrupted prerogative of the King, and the possession of the Company past that point; and yet the laws having always been open to any subjects who conceived themselves grieved; that speech which Joseph records of King Assyria, to those Jews who after many years disconsoured to recover their lost presence, may be applied to these clamorous Interlopers.

Interrogationem off many Interlopers conspire, show me mittentem certum spiritum. Non avertit interitum dicitur, sed fidei certum.

And so the Remon answereth Abimech, [to them the injustice of his demands,] Thou be required they Cities which his Predecessors for many years had sown as they.

And Queen Elizabeth pleaded against the King of Denmark, that the rights of fishing upon the coasts of Norway and New-Bould. That neither his great-grandfather, grandfather, nor father, had exacted any thing for it; and therefore concluded it to be unjust. Causa, Eius. fol. 100.

So that I conclude the first, and as I conceive, the only point in this case, that Letters Patent which give licence and liberty to the Plaintiffs to exercise their sole-trade to the Indies, within the limits of their Grant, exclusive of all others, is a good Grant in law.

I do conceive, that the Defendant trading to the Indies, contrary to this Charter, may be punished by information at the face of the King; and that the action by the Plaintiffs is also well brought; and in as much as I have detained you so long upon the first point, I shall therefore upon your patience but a few words to this.

1. Therefore I conceive, the Plaintiff need not allege any special damage, no more than the Grantee of a fair, market, or any other franchise.

2. The action is brought, and grounded upon the Grant of the sole and entire trade, which, as I conceive, is a franchise the King may grant, and is like the sale of new inventions; upon which Lee in Patent actions brought by every day's experience; and the prohibiting clause is added, only to make the thing more necessary; and that Interlopers, in case they should be prosecuted at the King's fit, should be more so vexatious. And until you can imagine there be as many East-India Companies, as there are commoners and school-masters in England, Allen's case, Cole's case, can never be thought an objection. As to the objection in the 12 Rep. 88. Rail Bridge, part 2. p. 106. Derry's case, that admitting the Grant or Disposition to Derry had been good, for the sole importation of foreign Carcs; yet that being only a Disposition to the Stat. of Ed. IV. and did only exclude Derry from the priority of that Act, he could not maintain the action: But in this case that Grant had vested an interest, as our Grant at the Bar does, he might have brought an action, as, my Lord Chief-justice says in the next paragraph, may be collected out of Derry's case.

The case upon Patents of new inventions, are full authorities in the case at the Bar: And so is that case of the Abbot of Windsor, where the Grant of the market for three days, exclusive of others, is particularly set forth in the action. And the Salford man that brought cloth to London, and sold the same contrary to that Charter, is prosecuted in an action of trespass upon the case, at the face of the Abbot; and the writ concludes, (supposing the Grant good) de vi et contra iustitiam legem nostram; which is an authority full as to this point.

Upon the whole matter, I am of the same opinion with my brothers; and do conceive, that that Grant to the Plaintiffs of the sole trade to the Indies, exclusive of others, is a good Grant, and that the action is well brought:

And therefore let the Plaintiff take his Judgment.

XXXVII. The Lady Ivy's Trial, for great Part of Shadwell, in the County of Middlesex, Dio Martis 3 Junii, 1684. Ter. Trin. 36 Car. II. B. R. Before the Lord Chief-Justice Jeffreys.

Elon McGon, Plaintiff; vs Dame Thersie Ivy, Defendant.

This Day this Cause came to be tried at the Bar of the Court of King's-Bench, by a special Jury of the County of Middlesex, whose Names follow:

Middlesex Jury.

Sir Reynolds Fyfe, Bart.
Sir John Coker, Kt. and Bart.
Sir Goddard Vobry, Bart.
Sir Michael Hanger, Knt.
Sir William Cudde, Knt.
Sir Richard Doncast, Knt.

Richard Reynold, Esq.
Ralph Beveland, Esq.
Thomas Ash, Esq.
John Douglas, Esq.
Thomas Cudde, Esq.
Richard White, Esq.

Who being swayed, the Record was read to them by the Clerk of the Papers, in English, and opened by Mr. Holt, for the Plaintiff.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. MAY it please your Lordship, and your Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel in this Cause for the Plaintiff, and the Question will be, who her the Lady or the Plaintiff hath a good title to the Tenement in question, which are about there at four hundred tenements, near Roadside, in Shadwell Parish, and the ground in itself is, say we, the ancient Inheritance of the Church of St. Paul's, who have had the possession thereof for four or five hundred years*. We shall prove leases down for three hundred of years, all we come to that made to the Lessor of the Plaintiff, under whom we claim. We will begin with the last lease of Dean Worthington, 30 Sept. 1610, upon the foundation of the lease made by Dean Souches, now Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.

Some Jeffs. Willam (which was done) it is a Church-lease, but yet he is a witness to it.

The Lease of 30 Sept. 1610; was read.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. (Shewing to him another Deed) Did you see that Deed sealed and delivered?

Willam. Yes, Sir.

An Indenture quodammodo made the 25th of March, 1679, 31 Car. II. between Thomas Noke, Esq. the Lady Gale, &c. Read.

Mr. At. Gen. We admit the Allegiance.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Then we shall prove the Lands in question were always held of the Dean of Paul's.

Mr. At. Gen. Ay do, show that their lands in question were so, if you can.

L. C. J. I would not interrupt you, Gentlemen, pray go your own way; but if I mistake not, you had as good begin with 5 Ed. VI. as you did last time, as I remember, I have not indeed my Book I had then, here; I fear we have not overmuch time to waste: we shall wait time at the latter end of the cause, therefore pray come close to the merits of the cause.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We will leave it, if they require, they know it well enough.

Mr. At. Gen. Show what you can.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. In 5 Ed. VIII. the Dean of Paul's, Gale, leases to one John Hall.

L. C. J. But it is 5 Ed. VI. I ask for.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. 23 Feb. 5 Ed. VI. Dean Mery doth make a lease to John Hall, and Mercator Hall. In the Dean Frotham, 20 Dec. 2 and 3 Phil. and Mor. in confirmation of a former of that lease, lets another lease to Mercator Hall, and so it continued till May, 1679, and then Dean Druce made a lease for three lives; and upon the foundation of that in 1679, Dean Bromfield made a lease to John; and in 1679, he made another lease to Watersham, which was sold to Mr. Noke, and so came to the Lessor of the Plaintiff. First read this book.

Mr. At. Gen. What Book is it, Mr. Serjant?

L. C. J. Ay, tell us what it is; open it before you read it.

Clerk reads. A testament with a water-mill, con Perillensis.

L. C. J. What is it you read there?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. It is a Book that belongs to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's.

L. C. J. What Book is it? How do you prove it to be belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's?

Thos Mr. Spencer was called, but could not readily come in by reason of the Crowd. Mr. Porter was sworn.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. Mr. Porter, What say you to this Book?

Porter. Since the beginning of this Sun, this Book was found among the Writings of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. At. Gen. How long ago, Sir, upon your oath?

Porter. About a year ago.

L. C. J. That is but a slovenly account of such a Book as this.

Mr. Willam. It is plain, my Lord, it is not a new Book made on purpose.

L. C. J. It is plain, that in this dumpy age we live in, it is very easy to make a Book look as old as you would have it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. We will go on to the lease made to Mercator Hall.

Thos Mr. Spencer came in and was sworn.

Mr. Willam. Pray, Sir, when did you find that Book?

Spencer. Seven years ago.

Mr. At. Gen. Where, Sir?

Spencer. Among the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. What is it you would read in it? An entire lease, or what?

Mr. Serj. Stringer. 'Tis a short note of a lease.

Clerk reads. A testament with a water-mill.

L. C. J. See if the Book have any title.

Clerk. No, my Lord.

* The State of the question being, Whether the seven acres in Shadwell, was part of the ancient Inheritance of the Dean of St. Paul's, to whom Edw. Noke was Lessor, and was a Lease of the Plaintiff, as part of Wapping Shadwell, this had been drawn by one Forbes, and other Sidd to the Shadwell's, under whom the Lady Ivy did claim.

L. C. J. Let me see it. (Which was done.)

Mr. Serj. Stringer. This 23d of Feb. 5 Ed. VI. —

L. C. J. You, Spencer, have you seen in any of the Books an entry of any lease made by Dean Gale?

Spencer. I have not observed that I have from any lease of Dean Gale.
L. C. J. Have you seen any lease made by Dean Gale, in the time of Henry VIII. About any of the Church's lands? I ask you the question, because I observe here in this Paper, in two places here is the Word Dean Gale, sent with another hand than that of the Book; but Novell is sent with the same hand as the other. And to Novell seems to have been put for the maker of this lease, as being put upon the top; when in truth he was not Dean till long after. Upon your oath, in whose name was that lease but that is here spoken of?

Spencer. I know not, my Lord; that is the Book I saw then.

L. C. J. Is this lease in your Book of Leases?

Mr. At. Gen. Pray, Gentlemen, you did produce before your original Deed of purchase, where is it now?

Mr. Willam. That Book was produced and read at the first trial.

L. C. J. What's that trial? Not that last Term.

Mr. Willam. It was in Court at that time.

L. C. J. I believe not, you are mistaken in that; for I have brought the notes I took then, and I find no such thing here.

Mr. At. Gen. They produced then the first purchase of the Dean.

L. C. J. Is there any lease of Henry VIII's time in that Book?

Spencer. I do not remember any lease of Henry VIII's time of this land, but I have seen that Book ever since I belonged to the Dean's business.

L. C. J. Have you not a Book of the succession of your Deans? Where was Collet Dean?

Mr. Willam. In 1505.

L. C. J. When was Novell Dean?

Mr. Willam. In 1560.

L. C. J. Then I assure you this Book is grandly suspicious.

Mr. At. Gen. They threaten a us with forgery, and I know not what; I believe it will be found on Mr. Noke's side.

L. C. J. If it can be come and produce a Book, and you value yourselves upon the antiquity of it, is an evidence that that land did belong to the Dean and Chapter, and leased by them, 5 Ed. VIII. and in that Book Novell is written by the same hand as the rest of the Book, as Dean then; but because you find Gale was then Dean, and Novell was still three score years after, Novell is turned by another hand to Gale; it draws a great suspicion certainly upon your Book, as it set up for a purpose.

Mr. Willam. It is true, my Lord, if we did that, it were something; but we had an old Book among the evidences of the Church, and we produce it as such; we have not altered it, therefore it cannot be done for our purpose.

L. C. J. Who knows who did it? But done it is.

Mr. At. Gen. And your title is under the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

L. C. J. Who keeps the evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's?

Spencer. They are kept in the Chapter-house.

L. C. J. I am persuaded there may be an ancient Book, and this may be such an one; but it looks a little unworned in this particular. You, Spencer, did you look upon those two particular passages?

Spencer. No; I did not observe it.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. My Lord, our next lease in the Book recites one made by Gale.

Mr. At. Gen. Come, upon your oath; did not Mr. Barnes, or Mr. Noke, come to search in this Book?

Spencer. Yes, they did.

Mr. Serj. Lamin. How long ago was that?

Spencer. As to Mr. Barnes or Mr. Noke themselves, I did never see them come to search; but some list them here.

Mr. Willam. Do you believe the Book was thus as it is now, before you came at first to it?

Mr. Serj. Lamin. You say they did not come to search, whose did they come for then, to drink?

Spencer. They have come to the Officer, Mr. Porter, but I never saw them search.

Mr. Willam. But I ask you again, was it as when you found it first?

Spencer. I believe it was, I know of no alteration.

Mr. Serj. Stringer. But to put it out of doubt, we have this second lease, which does recite this lease of Gale.

Mr. Noke. Nay, my Lord, we have another piece of evidence that will testify that Book to be true, as to the foundation of it; that last lease was then made as the Book says; for we have a kind of Particular, or Catalogue of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter. It is an ancient writing. And in this there is mention particularly made of a lease made in 5 Ed. VIII. Pray, Sir, look upon that, and give an account of it.

Spencer. I have then this among the rest of the evidences of the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. At. Gen. How long ago?

Spencer. I cannot directly tell.

Mr. Willam. How long do you think, upon your oath?

Spencer. I was two years ago.

Mr. At. Gen. That is since this court.

L. C. J. Ay, that is a little too lately for an ancient writing.

Mr.

Mr. Serj. Lenth. Did you see it before Mr. Nash or Mr. Bates offered a fourth share?

Answer. I cannot say particularly I did: I have seen this paper—
Mr. Serj. Paper, may it be in a Parchment, or by the hand what thus laid; How long is it since you last saw that Parchment?

Serj. I believe I have seen it this seven years; but not that I can swear to have taken any particular notice of it.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Where did you see it first, upon your oath?

Serj. Among the rest of the Deeds and Evidences that belong to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Upon what occasions did you take notice of it first?

Serj. Upon searching among the writings.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Who did search with you at that time, upon your oath?

Serj. Mr. Parler.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Read it.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Was it delivered to Mr. Nash before it was brought hither?

Serj. It is brought here now among the Dean's other writings, we never use to deliver any out.

Chief Justice. This is dated a Edw. 1559. Books and other writings appertaining.

Mr. Serj. Strong. Now we will need the leaf to Morville Hall, wherein this is recited to have been made.

(The leaf is in the Book now read, dated 23 Feb. 5 Ed. VI. for five-and-forty years, at 101.)

Mr. Serj. Strong. Then the next leaf is in 2 Ed. 3 Phil. & Mar. (Which now read.

10 Dec. 2 Ed. 3 Phil. & Mar. from Dean Farnham to Marcellus Hall for ninety years from Michaelmas 1516.

Mr. Serj. Gos. There is a licence to alter the Mill, which we shall prove as afterwards did.

Mr. Serj. Strong. Your Lordship observes here were grounds and several houses at this time, with the Mill and Ponds, and diiches to recover the water. After this, Morville Hall assigned to divers others in the year 1516, bequeath it to his Wife Mary Moor; and in 1520, the Forresters, and hath a new lease for lives.

Mr. Serj. Gos. Show your allegations, Mr. Serjeant, from Morville Hall.

Mr. Serj. Strong. That we cannot do, nor need we; for we are not to deliver our title that way, but the Church's title is ours. We will show you Dean Dean's lease to Mary Moor, upon her surrender.

(Which now read, dated 14 Mar. 1520, 6 Car. I. first under, at 101. &c. married.)

Mr. Serj. Strong. Then Mary Moor, 16 years after, surrenders this lease, and takes a new lease for three lives in Dean Wharf's time, at 101. a year rent, and 40 s. interest.

(Which leaf dated 4 Aug. 1526, 6 Car. I. now read.

Then another leaf dated 5 March, 1526, 10 Car. I. by Dean Winnell to Samuel Whitwick, and John Winterburn, at 101. the an next rent, 40 s. before increased, and 4 s. more now increased.

Mr. Serj. Strong. Thus far it stood upon leases for lives: this lease continued till 1526, till Mr. Nash bought this land, and then he renewed it from the new Archbishop, then Dean Strong, who ceded the rent to Ed. during the life of Fook, who was the surviving life, and to 1601. after.

(Which leaf, dated 12 July, at Car. II. 1569, now read.

Mr. Serj. Strong. We have brought it hither now, my Lord, to the Letter of the Plaintiff: For we have shown this lease surrendered to Dean Strong, and so we have made a lease to Gervard and Croft, which we have given an account of before. And so we have shown a succession of leases from the Church, for 130 odd years.

L. C. J. The last leaf is at the rent of 240 s. a year, I think.

Mr. Serj. Strong. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Serj. Attorney. Have you done, Gentlemen?

Mr. Serj. Strong. Yes, we have, till you give us further occasion, Brother.

Mr. Serj. Attorney. Then, may it please your Lordship, and you Gentlemen of the Jury, I am of Counsel in this cause for the Defendant, my Lady Joy.

The Plaintiff has given you a sort of evidence for a title, but the truth of it is, all that they say will not make a conclusion, such as they would have from their Privileges; For all that they have proved, is, that the Deans of Paul's, successively one after another, have made leases. They did in the beginning tell you, they had had this land hundreds of years: But what have they had? and what leases have they made? But only a mill, a bakehouse, a trough of lead, and all houses, lands, meadows and pasture thereto belonging. We do not deny but that they are to have a mill; their leases are also, even the new ones do mostly follow the track and words that were said in Queen Mary and Henry the Eighth's times. But here is the truth of our case: That the Dean and Chapter had a mill, we agree; say, more than that, we agree that they have eighteen acres that lie on the North side of Ratcliff high-way; and also that they have another parcel of land, called the Lynden. That this may be understood, we now leave to deliver maps to the Court and the Jury.

Mr. Serj. Attorney. And we desire ours may be first too.

Mr. J. Wilkes. Aye, deliver in your maps, this is the only fit place for them.

(Which now done on both sides.)

Mr. Serj. Attorney. Then, my Lord, I will go on. We agree, I say, they had a mill, which is now taken down and put in another place. We shall show them where it did stand, and that was no part of the land now in question. The Jury have seen the place, and I hope have had a satisfactory view of it. There was once a mill standing, and there was once a pond, but that mill and pond do stand elsewhere. The land in question, we say, was anciently marsh ground, and subject to the overflowing of the Water, and it is so to this day. In H. VIII's time, it was by one Fordwylf, a Dutchman, drained. This, by Act of Parliament, Richard Hill was made owner of, and he conveyed it to Sopdian, who was the Defendant's ancestor, and who he bought it. And the boundaries are set down in that, and the subsequent conveyances, which cannot possibly stand with those that their mill is said to stand in. We shall then by several Records the Queen had a title to it by a conveyance in way of mortgage to her; and this afterwards was conveyed back again to the ancestor of my Lady Joy. We yield they had a mill, and they have increased the rent sufficiently upon it, not to need other men's land. They have houses built upon it; I know not indeed how much, but I think it is now 1000 l. a year that it yields to them. If then we can demonstrably show you where our ground is, and where their's is, and if we affirm our title by Records and good Conveyances, then by a pretence to a mill, I hope they shall not grudge us, or take away all our land.

Mr. Serj. Gos. My Lord, and Gentlemen of the Jury, I leave leave to answer the Evidence that has been given, before I enter upon my title.

They have spent a great deal of time to derive down a title to the Dean and Chapter of Paul's, to a mill, a bake-house, and some little ground thereto belonging. And truly, as Mr. Serjeant says, no man ever questioned the Dean and Chapter for their mill, and bake-house, and leaden trough. But the thing in question is, seven acres and an half of land, which in the memory of man was marsh ground; if you observed it, Gentlemen, upon the view how it lies, you know the North bound is the Dean's Lynden, the South bound is the Thames, the West bound Fordwylf, and the East bound is the Edly ground that is called Cock-hill. And we lay as to all this land, it is none of the Dean and Chapter's, nor ever did pay, or was enjoyed by this lease; but we shall show you it was under another lease.

I shall observe, that it is very strange upon their own evidence, that a mill, can Percey, should pass seven acres of ground; and a mill that was demolished in long ago in Queen Mary's time, (for we shall plainly show you) and that their land, concerning it, can Percey, should not have a survey taken of them, and out of some figure of the land, that they might know what was theirs, and what their neighbours. For your Lordship and the Jury may observe, as all the leases and conveyances down to this time, in Dean Gale's lease, and onward, there was nothing mentioned but a mill with the appurtenances, or a tenement with the appurtenances. But there have not one good boundary of their lands; and really it cannot be presumed the Dean and Chapter should be so ignorant.

Besides, in the ancient lease that they produced of Ed. VI's time, there was a covenant to pay the quit-rent, as for lands held of the manor of Stropen.

And we did expect that they would have brought forth the Rolls and Records of that manor; and out of some figure, there remaining, would have given a particular inventory of what lands belong to the Dean, and what do not.

But in truth, we lay this is a properly manor land, for that will be your question, Gentlemen, that you are to try, I believe, or lay: Whether these seven acres, that bounded on Fordwylf, West on the Thames, South on the Edly, and East on the Edly, be manor land, or not.

The Dean and Chapter have given evidence of some leases, which upon the surrender were delivered up to them; but there are none produced, they only are in evidence in their Books. Now we shall conclude that this mill of theirs was an over-mill; for there is mention made of a barren trough, which is the only proper instrument of an over-mill. Therefore we will first fight (because they themselves will not) what is there; and then we desire not to give you satisfaction that this was never any of them, but the undoubted inheritance of the Archbishop; and not a foot of it belongs to any other man living. But further, since they say now, we shall produce a piece of evidence, which indeed we must thank Mr. Nash for, for blabbing at about that he had a survey of the manor of Stropen, which would do our work, put us upon searching there for it; and we have it here, and there you will find a particular of all the Dean's lands, and of all quit-rents. And the particulars are thus described in that Book, (which shows that there was a tenement that stood by the mill, and that paid a quit-rent, and the other lands came under that quit-rent): Twenty acres, called Shadwell field, that lye on the North-side of Ratcliff high-way, known at this day, and all this piece of ground, of twenty acres, is built upon and improved; which was one part of the land that came under a quit-rent, but not pretended to be any part of this. The next is five acres, called the Lynden, and it appears by the Record to be five acres, and so it is measured now. Ratcliff high-way went on the top of the hill, and then it called the Lynden way, not imposed nor built upon; and it exactly abated according to our Records, and described by acres to an acre. Then comes the third parcel, and that only concerns you to acquiesce of, whether these seven acres and an half be parcel of that? And that is described in the Record to be a tenement, called Dorset-hill, which is a bake-house with a mill, and the leaden trough, the appurtenances of the mill, at the rent of 3 s. and 4 d. There are all the parcels named of the Dean and Chapter's lands. And at the last trial when they produced the deed of purchase, whereby this was conveyed to the Dean, which I think was in H. III's time, it yielded but 4 s. a year in the whole, and now in time it is come to 2000 s. a year, without this great goblet, which they pretend that the south of the former Deans, in this place where the mill then lately stood, was left to John Carter, Clerk-maker. There are in that place, at this day, lands and houses that yield the Dean and Chapter an hundred pounds a year, distinct from the Lynden and the North ground of Ratcliff high-way, and that is a very good improvement for a mill, and a bake-house, and a leaden trough, and a ditch for the water. Now by their lease in 1520, they recite that the mill was not worth the keeping up; and according to the power given them by the lease, 2 Ed. 3 Phil. & Mar. to pull down the mill, it was pulled down and built upon, and it came to yield them 200 l. a year, as it doth at this day. After this we shall call witnesses to set forth, that in this place, in the Edly end of Cock-hill, in the memory of man, there was found the floor of the old mill; and there are thofe living that can attest it. So we shall show they are sitting in a wrong pool; they have sufficient to answer their deed of purchase; and all the evidence that hath been given you, will appear to be

Deeds to certify, the same with an annexed nothing, and to take up the same, that we find go yet a Step further, and they beyond all peradventure, that this land in question was marsh-ground. And the other side sayeth, that if it be marsh-ground, the Dean and Chapter have no interest in it, never presented to a foot of it, nor doth any title of theirs evidence mention marsh-ground. And truly we will admit to it, because we do not marsh-ground we have nothing to do with it. So that, Gentlemen, your great question is, Whether this be marsh-ground, or not? And the reason the main of the question will be about the East boundary alone, and no other: For that Wright was marsh-ground South on the Thames, North on the London, and West on Sir Colborne's, is no question, nor ever was in all the trials that have been. Therefore the only point that the evidence is to be applied unto, is about the Edler's boundary. That we lay to be Col-Hill, anciently called the Hilly-way, or Middle-way, now Col-Hill, and in the Records of Seymour manor, it is called Correll-Hill. And it is a rising hilly ground, it appears to be so to this day; I appeal to the Jury who have been in it. Now that this was marsh-ground, and the inheritance of the Stephen's, we shall prove by these Shops. First, We shall produce an Act of Parliament made in 37 Hen. VIII. wherein the bounds appear to be plainly the same as now we lay they are at this day: only now it is all built, that is all the difference, and the marsh doth thence contain 120 acres. Now by that Act, the whole marsh is defined, as to one moiety, in Richard Hill, an assignee of Paradise the Dutchman, who had drained it, and for his pains was to have one half; and he agreed with the paragonages, among whom Stephen was one, and had 45 acres, and particularly this land. So that the Dean of Paul's must derive a title from this Act, if he will have the land. But we shall show how they colour their position. Afterwards Richard Hill, in 11 Nov. 37 Hen. VIII. he doth make a lease to the Dean and Chapter, miller, and so the thirty-four years, wherein you will exactly be the boundaries of the Act as they stand. And he had leased it to the Dean's miller, he passeth away the inheritance to Thomas St. John, in time, 26 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. Mervin Hall the miller, after Stephen had obtained the inheritance upon agreement between them, gets a lease from Stephen of 128 years of the lands in question, as you may see by the bounds they are exactly the same; and this was in time 20 Apr. 6 Ed. VI. So the miller had now ground on both sides the way that is called Col-Hill, on the East side by lease from Hill, on the West side by lease from Stephen. I then in point of time we shall come to show the lease made to Roper. For Mr. Atty, after he had this long lease from Stephen, 30 Nov. 5 & 6 Ph. & M. Ed. both demise the land in question to Rick of Roper, for twenty-four years; and we shall show that in all the Queens's time Roper was tenant. Then John Hill, who was the Heir of Richard Hill, in 12 Nov. 5 & 6 Ph. & M. by deed, and afterwards 3 Ed. by fine and common recovery, conveys all their lands particularly by name, and re-leases them to John and Mervin Stephen, and the heirs of John; and do lodged the inheritance in the Stephen's, all but that which was thus out in a long lease to Mervin Hall. We shall prove that before Richard Hill died, he entered into a Statute to Find and Solve for a great sum of money; and this Statute comes to be extended 3 Ed. and thence this land, notwithstanding their lease, is seized and extended as Hill's lands. We shall show all this land upon a commission of Writ, had a survey taken of it. When we have shown all these Records, and proved that this is marsh-ground, and not a witness of theirs but still acknowledge it to be marsh-ground (for that part of Paul's land was raised at least nine feet, and so proportionably was the rest of the ground; and it appears at this day, that upon a high tide all their cellars are overflows), I think that you will make no doubt, whether this be our land or no. And to proceed in this order that I have opened, we will first lead you the survey. There was our thing I forgot about this time, and so we will return to it.

Mr. Serj. Strang. What is it you read Sir?

Mr. C. J. What do you begin with, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. Atty. Gen. Your Lordship observes they show a lease from Dean Fulkens, the 10 Dec. 3 & 4 of Ph. & M. Now on the 22 Dec. in the same year, we shall find Mervin Hall, by lease to Carter, butts it upon the East side of the mill.

Mr. C. J. I took the notes the last time of your evidence, and it begin in H. V. 11th time.

Mr. Atty. Gen. My Lord, when we come to our side, we shall go on in the same method we did then; but now we are only showing where the lands are.

Mr. C. J. Go your own way.

Mr. Atty. Gen. This Indenture, made the 22 day of December, in the second and third years of the reigns of our sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Indies, Jerusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith, Arch-Bishops of Avinion, Dukes of Burgundy, Milan and Brabant; Counts of Hainault, Flanders, and Tyrol; between Mervin Hall of Ratcliff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter of Ratcliff, son-master of Stowmarket, of the other part; witnesseth, that Mervin Hall hath purchased, granted, and to farm let unto the said John Carter, that his wharf lying in Ratcliff, where late the mill flood, called Ratcliff mill, adjoining on the West upon the East side of the mill-ditch, above the mill-dam, reaching from thence Baylyard 30 foot, and from the North-east corner of the said mill-dam, Southward to the River of Thames, 30 foot; to have and to hold all and whole the said wharf, as it is before specified, with all commodities and profits belonging to the same, to the said John Carter, to his heirs, executors, and assigns, from the feast of St. Mary the Virgin, immediately following the date of these presents, until the end and term of 30 years.

Mr. C. J. This lease made the last time.

Mr. Serj. Strang. Yes, it was so, My Lord.

Mr. Atty. Gen. —to be fully complete and ended, yielding and paying therefor for the same, unto the said Mervin Hall, his heirs, executors, and assigns, ten bushells of lawful money of England yearly; that is to say, at the feast of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin. And if it happens the said rent to be behind and unpaid at the said feast, in part or in all, by the space of one fortnight, and lawfully seized of the said John Carter, his executors, and assigns, then it shall be lawful to the said Mervin Hall, his heirs, executors, and assigns, to distress for his said rent to be being behind, and the distress to continue until such time as the said rent with the arrears, be fully paid and paid.

Mr. C. J. For how many years is that?—Mr. Atty. Gen. Thirty years.

Mr. C. J. What is denied by this bill?

Mr. Atty. Gen. Read the Parliament again.

Mr. Serj. Strang. My Lord, we would gladly know where they had this lease, that if it may appear whence it came; for we know they have an excellent art at hiding out of Deeds.

Mr. C. J. Ay, come, show where you had it. Let me see it.

Mr. Atty. Gen. We did produce it at the last trial, and at the first too.

Mr. C. J. But that this Jury knows nothing of, and they call for some account of it on the other side.

Mr. Atty. Gen. My Lord, do you know any thing of that Deed?

When did you first see it?

Mr. Williams. And where had you it?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I had it in a garret, in a kind of a nook, about six foot long, and three foot and an half wide, in my own house, in the garret among other writings.

Mr. C. J. How came you to have them?

Mr. Atty. Gen. As I was Executor to Winterson.

Mr. Atty. Gen. My Lord, will you tell upon what occasion you loaned them and found them?

Mr. Serj. Strang. Ay, pray give an account of the whole.

Mr. Atty. Gen. My Lord, upon the 24 of August, 1682, was the first time I ever saw my Lady Ivy to my knowledge; and she was informed by one Mr. Fisher, that I had several writings of Winterson's: I told her I had so, and my Lady desired me to search among them, all there were any writings that concerned Stephen's estate; I told her it would take up a month's time to look them all over, for there was a great quantity of them. She said, I would do her a great kindness, if I would look; I promised her I would: And upon the fourth of September, I think I found the Deed.

Mr. C. J. How was Winterson concerned?

Mr. Atty. Gen. They have shewn that he was owner of the land once.

Mr. Williams. Did you ever read over that lease?

Mr. C. J. I ask you again, how was Winterson concerned?

Mr. Atty. Gen. He was partner with Wright, who sold the estate to Mr. Noel.

Mr. Serj. Gen. Wright sold it to Noel, Winterson died, and this man was his Executor, and so he came to the writings.

Mr. Atty. Gen. But pray, Mr. Knox, tell us, were these writings ever shewn to Mr. Noel?

Mr. Atty. Gen. In the year 1680, when Mr. Noel bought this Estate of my Uncle Wright, the writings were all to be looked over; and upon Mr. Noel's request, all the writings were sent to his Council, a Gentleman in Gray's-Inn, one Cope, I think his name was, or something like it; and there they were left three months, and I believe in my soul that Deed was among them.

Mr. Atty. Gen. Were they brought back again?

Mr. Atty. Gen. There were two hampers brought back.

Mr. Atty. Gen. Had you any discourse with Mr. Noel about this business?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I was arrested upon his account in an action of 2000 l. and he presently after came and got me off from that action, and told me, Mr. Knox, I am sorry you were arrested upon my account. So as I say, Sir, said I, did he? I do believe really, you found that Deed; I did so, Sir, said I: But say he, pray will you answer me one question seriously? That I will, two or three, if I can, Sir, said I. Say he, did not my Lady Ivy, or Baylyer, sell the Deed into your hands? No, said I, for before ever I saw either of them, I had seen that Deed. Then I am undone, said he.

Mr. Williams. Who was by, pray, when this discourse passed between you and Mr. Noel?—Mr. Knox. There was none but he and I.

Mr. Williams. It was at the tavern; Mr. Noel, I suppose, will not deny it.

Mr. C. J. Will he not? Will you take his word for it?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I do say, I found that Deed there.

Mr. C. J. Read it, read the demise. But, Mr. Knox, let me ask you a question or two: As I understood, you said my Lady Ivy desired you to look among Winterson's writings, for deeds that concerned Stephen's Estate?—Mr. Knox. Yes, my Lord.

Mr. C. J. Where was that?—Mr. Knox. That was at her house.

Mr. C. J. And when did you find this deed?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I found the deed in September, before any body came to look with me, or was in the place with me.

Mr. C. J. Was there any body with you, when you found the deed?

Mr. Knox. No.

Mr. C. J. Then you found it yourself?—Mr. Knox. Yes.

Mr. C. J. Did you read it?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I did the outside; what was I concerned further?

Mr. C. J. Nay, no need to be angry; when thou art so full, thou speakest to call a man can scarce understand thee; answer my question fairly: you say you read it, what part was it you read?

Mr. Atty. Gen. The backside, the outside.

Mr. Williams. I thought you had meant the inside of the outside.

Mr. C. J. How did you gather by reading the outside, that it concerned my Lady Ivy?—Mr. Knox. I only read Stephen's name.

Mr. C. J. Stephen's name, you say?

Mr. Atty. Gen. What deed do you allude upon?

Mr. C. J. That deed, the only deed you have seen here. What is your Christian name?

Mr. Knox. Stephen Knox.

Mr. C. J. If I mislook you, I beg your pardon: your question is concerning this very deed now shewn to you.

Mr. Atty. Gen. I thought you had meant the lease of 128 years.

Mr. C. J. Well then, let that pass for a mistake; I would know of you now something concerning this deed. Look upon it—(which he did)—upon your oath, when law you that deed did?

Mr. Atty. Gen. I cannot say what day it was.

Mr. C. J. But, look you, if I mislook you not (if I did, I ask your pardon again), did not you say you found that very deed among a great many other writings of Winterson's, in a room, so many foot long, and so many foot wide, in your garret? Did not you say, that in time you saw my Lady Ivy first, upon the 24 of August, 82, that you found that deed in your possession? And did not you tell us, that you did believe, in your conference, that in the year 1680, Mr. Noel hid this writing, among others, sent to the Chamber of such a Gentleman in Gray's-Inn, that that they remained there these months, and then were brought back again upon you; and you believe as your confidence that was one of them? And did not you say, when I asked you, how you came to know this belonged to my Lady Jay, you said, because my Lady Jay had spoke to you, so look if there was any thing belonging to Stephen, and you read the outside of the deed, and found Stephen's name, and so you knew it so concern her? Did not you say all this?

Kewley. I believe I did.

L. C. J. Now tell me then by the outside of that deed, how thou canst tell that it belonged to Stephen? For if thou canst, thou art most crafty when any body here, I believe.

Kewley. I thought it had been the long lease, for that has Stephen on the outside.

L. C. J. Well, let that pass for a mistake; we must now begin again upon a new account. Where wilt thou say that deed?

Kewley. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. How do you know that?—Kewley. I put my hand to it.

L. C. J. Did you read the inside of that deed?

Kewley. No, I did not.

L. C. J. Look you then, we ask you how you came to know it was a deed belonging to Stephen?

Kewley. I read the backside, and put my hand to it.

L. C. J. How came you to put your hand to this deed as belonging to Stephen, when you never looked into the deed?

Kewley. When I found this deed to have written upon it Marcus Hall I did believe it was something that concerned the Stephen's. L. C. J. Let us see for the deed now—(which now draw)—You say that was the reason upon your oath?—Kewley. Yes, it was.

L. C. J. Then look upon it again, and do not be surprised, but let us have the truth come out, in God's name. Was that the reason?

Kewley. It was, my Lord.

L. C. J. I would fain see Mr. Sattin, I have a question to ask him.

Mr. At. Gen. He is here, my Lord.

L. C. J. Give Mr. Sattin his oath—(which now draw)—Look upon the outside of that deed, and upon your oath tell us what hand-writing that is.

Sattin. All but the word (Lease) is my hand-writing.

L. C. J. Are not the words Marcus Hall all of your hand-writing?

Sattin. It is.

L. C. J. Then how couldst thou know this to belong to the Stephen's by the words Marcus Hall, when you first discovered this deed in September, 1682, and you found it by yourself, and put your hand to it; and yet that Marcus Hall be written by Mr. Sattin, which must be after that time?

Mr. At. Gen. He says he knows it, because he put his hand to it; I suppose he read something of the inside.

L. C. J. He said the backside, the outside; I did not read the inside.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, I desire our evidence may not be anticipated. I will tell you by the way, your evidence anticipate themselves: And this fellow, Kewley, without any more ado, has proved himself an evasive, notorious knave. And of your evidence will blunder and spoil themselves, I cannot tell how to help it. I know, as soon as I saw the deed, that that was Sattin's hand; I knew his hand, as well as that you are Mr. Attorney.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray, my Lord, give me leave to ask him a question, which I hope may clear all this matter, for it is plain the man is mistaken.

L. C. J. Marcus Hall. Yes, I assure you very goodly. Ask him what question you will, but if he should swear as long as Sir John Falstaff fought, I would never believe a word he says.

Mr. At. Gen. Did you look into the inside of one of the deeds?

Kewley. Yes, I did.

Mr. At. Gen. Can you tell which you looked into the inside of, and which you did not?

Kewley. I believe and found others I did, but I cannot particularly tell.

Mr. At. Gen. Then, my Lord, here is the case: Here are multitudes of deeds, and a man looks on the inside of some, and the outside of others; it is possible for a man to peep positively to all the particular deeds, without being liable to mistake?

L. C. J. Mr. Solicitor, you say well; if he had said, I looked upon the outside of some, and the inside of others, and wherever I saw either on the outside, or in the inside the name of Stephen, or Marcus Hall, I laid them by, and thought they might concern my Lady Jay; that had been something. But when he comes to be asked about this particular deed, and he upon his oath shall declare that to be the reason why he thought it belonged to Stephen, because of the name of Marcus Hall on the outside, and never read any part of the inside, when Sattin wrote Marcus Hall was written by him, what would you have a man say?

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, I have said this to say, if there were never a deed delivered by Kewley to my Lady Jay, or Sattin, where Marcus Hall's name was written on the backside of it, but by Mr. Sattin; I confess it were a strong objection. But where there are other deeds, and a great many, a man may easily be mistaken. It is impossible for any man, as a multitude of deeds that he finds among a great parcel, and delivers many of them out, so take it upon his memory particularly, which he looked on the inside of, and which he looked on the backside or outside of.

L. C. J. Did he not give it as a particular reason of his knowledge, that they belonged to my Lady Jay? For wherever he saw Marcus Hall on the outside, he thought that belonged to her.

Mr. At. Gen. Wherever he saw those names, that is either in the inside or outside.

L. C. J. Under favour, Sir, he did not say so; but positively said, he knew it by that name. And you shall never argue me into a belief, that it is impossible for a man to give a true reason, if he have one, for his remembrance of a thing.

Mr. At. Gen. I beg your pardon, my Lord; as I apprehend him, he feared he looked into the inside of some, and the outside of others, and did not write a great many of them.

L. C. J. And I beg your pardon, Mr. Solicitor, I know what he spoke as well as any body else. It indeed he had sworn constantly, and with oath, that he had been taken for a liar, or a mistake.

Mr. At. Gen.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, we must leave it upon its own weight, but we are not come to our title yet: I have the deed in my hand, which is a very old one, and therefore needs not such exact proof. His majesty, we do own it, and I must appeal to the Court, whether a man may not be mistaken in a great multitude of deeds.

L. C. J. Well now, after all this is done, let him give us account how he came to know that to belong to Stephen, or my Lady Jay, it be cast. I speak it not to prejudice your cause, but only to have the truth come out. But for the witness that swears, it may affect him. I assure you. Give him the deed, and let him look upon it—Look upon the inside, and look upon the outside too.

Kewley. I believe, my Lord, upon better consideration, I have read this deed before now.

L. C. J. Very well, and yet you swear the contrary just now.

Kewley. I was in a maze, my Lord.

L. C. J. I am sure thou wast wildly.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray what deed did you take it to be at first?

Kewley. The lease of 128 Years.

L. C. J. Prayers read it now to us.

Kewley Reads.—That indenture made the 22d day of Dec.—

L. C. J. Between whom?

Kewley Reads.—Between Marcus Hall of Reddyff, miller, of the one part, and John Carter, our master, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said Marcus Hall hath devised, granted, sold and sold to the said John Carter, all that wharf lying at Reddyff, where late a mill stood, called Reddyff mill.

L. C. J. Can you say you ever read to much before?

Kewley. I believe I did.

L. C. J. When was it?—Kewley. In September, 1682.

L. C. J. Then you read it before you showed it to my Lady Jay?

Kewley. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. And you found what the contents were by reading?

Kewley. Yes, my Lord.

L. C. J. Did you read it through?—Kewley. No, I did not, I believe.

L. C. J. How far do you think you read?

Kewley. As far as I have read now.

L. C. J. Did you find any thing there of the name of Stephen?

Kewley. No, not in that I did not.

L. C. J. I would desire to know of you, who it was that came to my Lady Jay, to inform her you had such and such writings?

Kewley. It was one Mr. Ficker, about a trial that was to have been two or three years ago, at the Bar of the Court of King's Bench here; but the cause did not then go on. After that Mr. Ficker did tell my Lady, that one Kewley had a great company of writings that were Waterhouse's; and he desired him that he would please to talk with me, so he if I could do let any kindness or service in any of those deeds. The first time that I saw his was the 2d of August, as near as I can remember, and then I told her, it was Waterhouse's, and had in great many writings. Said he, do you know the hand of Stephen? if you do, and can find any writings that relate to Stephen, you will do me a great kindness.

L. C. J. Did he name any body else to you?

Kewley. He named one Lee, and one Barker, and one Heldin, and that several others; I do not remember all.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of one Collier?—Kewley. No.

L. C. J. Was there of one Dexter?—Kewley. Of one Lee there was.

L. C. J. Of one Falmer?—Kewley. No.

L. C. J. Of one Alm?—Kewley. No.

L. C. J. Of one John Hall?—Kewley. No.

L. C. J. Was there any mention made of any Hall?

Kewley. Yes, there was.

L. C. J. What Hall did he speak of?

Kewley. I am not certain whether any Hall was named or no.

Mr. At. Gen. He says, he is sure there was of Stephen, and several others, but not of any Hall.

L. C. J. He does so, Mr. Attorney. But now I would ask him this question. There were no mention of any Hall, how came you to find that that lease in Marcus Hall to Carter should affect Stephen, or my Lady Jay?

Kewley. My Lord, I will give you an account of that.

L. C. J. Ay, do you can.

Kewley. This was at the first time that I saw my Lady Jay, that this discourse was between us; upon another discourse, at another time, Hall was mentioned to me.

L. C. J. How many names did he tell you of at first?

Kewley. I cannot remember them all.

L. C. J. Let me remember as particularly as can be the 2d of August; to be the first time that he saw my Lady Jay; and then the spoke to him of looking for writings that concerned Stephen, and Lee, and Barker; and he remembered such a day, the fourth of Sept. 1682, he found the deeds; but he will not give any account how he came to know, by Hall's name, that this belonged to Stephen. I would fain know when you first heard of the name of the Hall?—Kewley. It was all within a month's time.

L. C. J. Who was it first spoke to you to enquire about the Hall?

Kewley. My Lady Jay spoke to me about Hall when I gave her account of some deeds I had found.

L. C. J. How often did you look over the writings?

Kewley. Several times.

L. C. J. The first time, did you give my Lady Jay an account that you had found any thing?

Kewley. Yes, I gave her an account of the lease of 128 years.

L. C. J. Did you find nothing else but that?

Kewley. Yes.

L. C. J. What did you find else?

Kewley. Several; I cannot give an account of all.

L. C. J. Did you find that lease, or this deed first?—Kewley. The lease.

L. C. J. When did you first find that deed?

Kewley. The 22d of September I found the lease, and within fourteen or fifteen days after I found the deed.

L. C. J. How many deeds did you find out?—Kewley. Half a score.

L. C. J. Who was by when you found the deeds the second time?

Kewley. 4 E

Kensel. When I had loved the lease for 128 years, I hid it by, and needed further for other things, and found a mortgage which concerned myself, and that made me more eager to look for what might concern me besides, that I was not so careful as I should have been of the lease of 128 years, but missed it among the writings again. But I told my Lady I had found such a deed, and she ordered Mr. Banger to help me to find it again.

L. C. J. Pardon me, I am not sure. Who first put you in mind of looking after the Hill?—Kensel. My Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Was any body by, when she spoke to you to look after the Hill?—Kensel. Yes, Mr. Banger was by.

L. C. J. Who else?—Kensel. Several of my Lady's servants.

L. C. J. Name some of them that were by.

Kensel. There was Mr. Banger's wife and his daughter by.

L. C. J. What day was it my Lady Ivy first spoke to you to look after it? Hill?—Kensel. Within a week after I first her.

L. C. J. Was it before you found the lease you speak of?

Kensel. Yes, it was before.

L. C. J. How comes it to pass then, that you did not find it at the first looking, which was the 4th of September, when you found that lease, you say?

Mr. At. Gen. We must lay aside the testimony of this man.

L. C. J. Ay, so you had need.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray have the deed in Court, we shall have Mr. Nicol too busy with it self.

Mr. At. Gen. We shall desire your Lordship to consider all the use we make of this deed is to prove, that the mill was removed to another place.

L. C. J. I do not know what it proves, but if you had kept your witness Kensel in the mill, I think you had done better than brought him hither.

Mr. At. Gen. Sweet Mr. Banger and Mr. Clerk. (Which was done.)

Mr. At. Gen. Did you examine that with the Roll, Sir? (Shewing the paper.)

C. Clerk. Yes Sir, I did examine that with the Book that Mr. Nicol shewed me; I think they say he is steward of the manor of Stapley; he read in the book, and I read the copy; and it is a true copy of a survey of that manor, taken 25 Edw.

Mr. At. Gen. I intend you have the books of the manor here; pray let them be produced.

Mr. Willmors. You are merry, Mr. Attorney; if it is a true copy, pray let it be read.

Clerk read. The Dean of St. Paul's holds freely of fee or held, containing by estimation—

L. C. J. Who is Lord of the manor of Stapley now?

Mr. Paul. My Lady Wentworth is Lady of the manor.

Clerk read. The Dean of St. Paul's holds—

L. C. J. This bounds it on the East, on the Dean and Chapter of Paul's lands, and so doth you go on.

Mr. Willmors. Let them go on, my Lord.

Mr. At. Gen. With submission, these are our exact boundaries.

L. C. J. Well, go on.

Mr. At. Gen. We shall go on; and with submission these bounds exactly agree with the bounds that are set by the Act of Parliament for dividing the marsh. Here is speaking that we can see that they can claim both the mill and lake-heads, and they are all bounded on the West by St. Paul's Marsh; and the Leys are bounded in, part upon the North, and in part upon the West; and there was a little part of the marsh did run into the North bounds. But now we shall come to our evidence; and first we shall shew the Act of Parliament.

Which being Anno 25 H. VIII. was read.

Mr. At. Gen. Next we shall shew Richard Hill's conveyance by mortgage, to Frodd and Schope.

Which Indenture of Mortgage was read.

Clerk read. This Indenture made the eighth day of November, in the 32d year of our Sovereign Lord King Henry the eighth, between Richard Hill citizen and mercer of London, on the one party, and Anthony Frodd and Henry Schope, Merchants, of the other party; witnesseth, That where the said Richard before time was indebted unto the said Anthony Frodd and H. Schope in the sum of 56*l.* of lawful money of England, whereof they of their free will have pardoned 36*l.*

The said Richard Hill by these presents

All that money of lawful money being 20*l.* acres, lying and being to Radcliffe Town, on the party of the East; so Griff Mill by the Hamlet, on the party of the West; on the high-way, leading from Lawden to Radcliffe on the party of the North; and on the river of Thames, on the party of the South given and assured to the said Richard Hill, by authority of Parliament, in the 25th year of the most noble Reign to have and to hold—

Mr. At. Gen. This doth sell the lands in question with others in Frodd and Salvage, as a necessity for their money.

Mr. At. Gen. Now we shall shew a lease from Hill to Mercator Hall.

Clerk read. This Indenture made the eleventh day of November, in the 32d year of the reign of Henry the eighth, between Richard Hill citizen and mercer of London, of the one party, and Mercator Hall miller, of the other party; witnesseth, That the said Richard Hill, for the sum of 56 pounds of lawful money of England, to him in hand paid, at the enrolling and delivery hereof, whereof the said Richard Hill hereby acknowledged himself to be fully satisfied, contented and paid; and whereof he doth clearly acquit and discharge the said Mercator Hall, his Executors and Administrators by these presents, hath demised, granted, and to farm letten, and by these presents doth demise, grant, and to farm letten unto the said Mercator Hall, a parcel of marsh-ground, lying and being at the East end of the marsh that buttin on Radcliffe hilly marsh wall-bank, or wall belonging and the well Schope, consisting by estimation eleven acres and a half, more or less, abutting on Thames Wall, on the party of the South; to the lands called the Dun's Leys, on the party of the North; and on the wall that reaches from the Leys to the Island, by the pond on the West, with all the foreland and fall.

All which marsh-land is in the Parish of St. Andrew to have and to hold the marsh-land foreland and fall to the said Mercator Hall, from the feast of the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin next coming, for thirty and four years—

Mr. At. Gen. This was a lease made to their mother, and contains eleven acres and half an acre, which we shall shew is justly the contents of our land. Next then we shall come to the conveyance made to Thomas Staphin, which will bring us to our title.

L. C. J. Read the reversion of that lease.

Clerk read. Yielding and paying therefor yearly, and every year, unto the said Richard Hill, his Executors and Assigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, in four terms of the year; that is to say, the feast of the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, St. Michael the Archangel, the Birth of our Lord, and the Annunciation of St. Mary the Virgin.

Mr. S. Pembroke. Pray, my Lord, we desire they may give some account of this lease, where they had it, and how they came by it.

Mr. At. Gen. You have had it in your hands; you see what it is.

Mr. S. Pembroke. Yes; and therefore we desire to know something about it, because we find Kensel's hand in it.

Mr. At. Gen. We can give you a better account of it than you think for; but that will get you into an hour's wrangle more, which is all you have to say for yourselves. We have it, I desire it.

Mr. S. Pembroke. You have it we see, but remember you will give no account where you had it. But then we desire to ask Mr. Kensel a question, Whether my Lady Ivy was with him—

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, we desire we may go on and give our evidence entire; they would gain break in upon us, and take up another hour in quarrelling with our witness. When we hear them in their time office to impeach the validity of the deed, then will be our time to justify it; and I doubt not but we shall give a satisfactory account of it. Pray, will you give an account of the deed you shewed up the last time?

L. C. J. Nay, Sir, Gentlemen, we cannot take up our time in your disputes and idle words. Do not try to hinder them, and we shall for they shall not hinder you when it comes to your turn.

Clerk. This deed hath been read for the Plaintiff and Defendant, and is marked so.

Mr. At. Gen. It has been read well before.

L. C. J. Well, will ye go on, Gentlemen?

Mr. At. Gen. Then we shall shew this deed-poll next.

Clerk. This is also marked to have been read twice. (Read.) This is dated 16 Apr. in the 6th year of King Edward the Sixth.

To all whome these words shall come, I Richard Hill citizen and mercer of London, first greeting in our Lord God everlasting. Know ye that I, the said Richard Hill, for the sum of one hundred and thirty pounds of lawful money of England, by Thomas Staphin, alias Staphin, of the Parish of St. Mary Magdalen alias Whitechapel, in the County of Middlesex, brewer, unto me the said Richard Hill in hand paid, wherewith I content myself to be well and truly satisfied—

L. C. J. Upon whole account is it that my brother Gregory causes here?

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, Mr. Baron Gregory was defamed by the Plaintiff to be here; and as soon as we come to our reply, we shall set him some questions: if he pleads to say, we will disprove him so soon as we can.

Mr. At. Gen. Nay, rather than trouble Mr. Baron to say, we yield he should be examined now.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I am not in so much haste, my Lord, but I can say a while, and not break in upon the middle of an evidence for me.

L. C. J. If you please, they consent you may be examined, and they may be long.

Mr. Bar. Gregory. I would not interrupt the course of evidence.

L. C. J. Nay, we will take you at your word; but if it be long, pray remember that we shall have ended now, but you will limit yourself out of it; now you are like to shew by it, while, I assure you, brother. Go on.

Clerk read. And do therefore acquit and exonerate the said Thomas Staphin alias Staphin, his have given, enfeoffed, sold, granted, and by this my present writing confirmed, all those four four-acre and twenty acres and a half of marsh-land, measured by the rod or pole, lying in Wapping—

Three acres of which are lying adjoining on the west side of the mill that buttin upon the hilly bank, or way leading to Radcliffe Town, called Radcliffe-mill, with the bank or wall thereunto belonging, and the well adjoining to the way that goeth up to the Leys, called Schope well, lying between the East end of the marsh, and all the next next West adjoining to the same, containing by estimation one acre, and the pond and two acres adjoining on the West side, six acres lying in the bottom of the hilly Leys, adjoining North west on the wall that reaches from the Leys to the Island by the pond. All which eleven acres and a half of marsh-land are in the holding of Mercator Hall, miller; and also the bank, or wall-flood or pond, adjoining with on the said eleven acres and a half, containing by estimation of measure two acres; and also all that parcel late divided into two, and now late in the tenure of Richard Hill, butcher, containing by estimation of measure six acres, and also all that parcel well adjoining to the six acres, which is the said Richard Hill hold in his own hand; and also, that it is to say, all that parcel with the bank or wall laid and Pond, containing by estimation of measure five acres, which last thirteen acres he bought of, and had conveyed to me and my heirs, from one John St.

All which four-acre and twenty acres and a half, more or less, of marsh-land, abuteth on the Thames wall, on the part of the South; to the lands of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, called the Leys, on the part of the North; on the aforesaid mill, on the part of the East; and on twenty acres of the said Thomas Staphin, on the part of the West. And also all the Thames bank or wall, belonging to the said four-acre and twenty acres and a half of marsh-land; which said piece or parcel of wall doth buttin on the fourth end of the said on part of the east, and on the bank or wall in the occupying of William Kervet, on the part of the West. All which marsh-land, bank or wall are in the east end of Wapping marsh, abutting on the aforesaid hill and hilly bank aforesaid, in the way leading to the Town of Radcliffe aforesaid. And which four-acre and twenty acres are part and parcel of one hundred and thirty acres which

L. C. J. Very well, and how came the error there?
Baylor. This is the very deed I looked upon at that time.
L. C. J. Where did you first get that deed?
Baylor. I was at the finding of it in a garret at Mrs. Karsle's house.
L. C. J. That was in Sept. 1882; you say.
Baylor. Yes, in Sept. 1882. I never saw it before.
L. C. J. Pray, who are parties to that deed?
Myself. My Lord, it is the purchase of the Inheritance.
L. C. J. It is for; and how should that come to be in the possession of another?
Baylor. I never saw it before that time.
L. C. J. Read it again.
Lark reads:—This is dated the 6th of April, in the sixth year of Edward the Sixth. To all faithful—Adm. Sol Giv. Certainly, my Lord he is under a mistake.
L. C. J. Ay, so he is sure enough, but a very bad one upon my word. I wonder how far we can bring him out of it. Mr. Baylor, let me ask you a question.

Mr. Williams. Was your name ever in it, or not?

Kens. No, never.

Mr. Davies. But it was to it at the trial in Mohamud's turn.

L. C. J. Did you let your name to all the deeds you found in the garret?

Kens. Yes, I did.

L. C. J. Upon your Oath, Bensley, did you let your name to any deeds that he did not, that were found there?

Bensley. I believe I might do so, I would not fear punctually to it.

L. C. J. Was he with you?

Bensley. He was with me in the very first chamber.

Kens. I do not know that ever I put my hand to that deed in my life.

L. C. J. Did you ever see that deed?

Kens. I cannot say I did; I remember nothing of it.

L. C. J. I ask you once again, when you found this deed, was he with you?

Bensley. Yes, Sir.

L. C. J. Yes, Kensley, did you ever tell him to look and search any deeds in your garret, but when you were by yourself?

Kens. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Then I would ask you upon your oath, because you are the person that had these deeds in your custody, was there any deeds delivered out of your hand that you did not set your hand to?

Kens. I believe there was never an one.

L. C. J. How came this deed, which he found was found there, not to have your hand to it?—Kensley. I do not know that ever I saw it.

Mr. At. Gen. Did Mr. Kensley say he was looking for deeds of his own concern, when he found the first deed?

Bensley. He did say he had looked before, and had found some of these deeds, and then mislaid them, and desired my assistance to find them again.

L. C. J. Why did he say to you at first?

Bensley. He said he had been spoken unto by my Lady Ivy, to look for deeds that might concern her ancestors, and he had found some; but finding some also that concerned himself, he had mislaid my Lady's, and desired me to help him to find them again.

L. C. J. What employment have you under my Lady Ivy?

Bensley. I am her rent-gatherer.

L. C. J. Her husband, I suppose? But now you speak of what my Lady Ivy desired of Kensley, I would ask you a question, lest it slip out of any memory, Were you present at any time when my Lady Ivy spoke to Mr. Kensley to look after any deeds?—Bensley. Yes, I was.

L. C. J. Pray tell us whose deeds he desired him to look?

Bensley. The deeds he said he had mislaid.

L. C. J. What were they?—Bensley. The deed of Richard III., and the deeds belonging to Stephen and Shadrach.

L. C. J. With all names did he mention to him, that the wife would have looked after?—Bensley. She did mention him.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, did he mention any deeds made by Dr. Drom, Dean of St. Paul's?—Bensley. No.

L. C. J. By one May, Dean of St. Paul's?—Bensley. No.

L. C. J. Was one Law named?—Bensley. No.

L. C. J. Or one Helder?—Bensley. Not that I know of.

L. C. J. Did he mention one Jane Hall?

Bensley. I do not know that my Lady Ivy gave particular order for any of these names.

L. C. J. Did he, upon your oath, name Mervin Hall to you?

Bensley. No, my Lord.

L. C. J. Upon your oath, Kensley, was not he by when my Lady named Mervin Hall to you?—Kensley. He was, my Lord.

Bensley. I did not hear my Lady name that name at all.

L. C. J. No; he heard her give order for no particular deeds, neither for Helder, nor Law, nor Mervin Hall, but only concerning Stephen and Shadrach.

Sir Edw. Herbert. Bensley, did he say he had before found them, and mislaid them?—Bensley. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. Upon your oath, what deed do you take that to be which is produced?

Mr. Penn. Can you read it, yes, or no?

L. C. J. Mr. Penn. do you think my Lady Ivy sent Bensley to look after deeds that he could not read? or was very greedy?

Mr. At. Gen. What deed do you take it to be?

Mr. Sir. Gen. Let me ask you one question, Mr. Bensley? Did you ever let your hand to any deeds that were not found at Mr. Kensley's?

Bensley. Yes, have.

Mr. Lenthall. Upon what occasion did you put your hand to them?

Bensley. Because they were ancient deeds, and I was to look out where the hands were that they did concern.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray now answer my question; I look upon it, and tell me what deed do you take it to be?—Bensley. It is a deed of sale to Stephen.

L. C. J. It is, for you are in the right of it; and now upon your oath, where did you find that deed of sale?

Bensley. My hand is to it, and this is one of the deeds, I take it to be so, that was found in the garret at Mr. Kensley's house.

L. C. J. He has said for I know not how often.

Mr. At. Gen. He is not honest.

L. C. J. How can I help that, Mr. Attorney? But what he says, is plain.

Mr. Sir. Gen. Pray read over the note you have in your hand to yourself, and remember all the deeds that are particularly therein contained.

L. C. J. Let him read his note, (which is dead) and now ask him what you will.

Mr. At. Gen. Is there any deed of the 16th of April, 6 Edw. VI. from Hill to Stephen, in that note?

L. C. J. That is no fair question, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. At. Gen. With your leave, my Lord, I conceive it is; for that will make a plea that he is mistaken.

L. C. J. I believe he is; but with your favour, it is not a fair question; you see only to ask him, whether that deed given in evidence be there?

Mr. Sir. Gen. I would ask him one short question, my Lord, and I think it is a fair one.

L. C. J. Ay, in God's name, ask what fair question you will, but no leading ones.

Mr. Sir. Gen. Your witness is sworn, Madam.—(To my Lord, &c.)
Mr. S. Lenthall. My Lord—was not underlaid what he says, that is plain.

L. C. J. Further, all knowers are fools in one kind too.

Mr. Sir. Gen. Have you read the date of that deed?—Bensley. Yes.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, if you please, we will go on with our other evidence a while, and let him recollect himself, and recollect of us.

L. C. J. With all my heart; but I think the more he considers, the worse he is, and so he will be to the end of the chapter.

Mr. At. Gen. They have called to us, my Lords, for an account of this deed, we shall now prove that Mr. Noak knew of this deed before.

Swear Mr. Butler. (If he will do so.)

L. C. J. What is your name?—Butler. William Butler.

Mr. At. Gen. Pray, will you tell the Court and the Jury, what difference you had with Mr. Noak, and what he said about a deed, and when?

Butler. I never saw the leaf, but as I was here at the last trial, when there was a verdict for this Estate to be my Lady Ivy's, and afterwards, the 22d of December last, I had an opportunity of being with Mr. Noak, he being with Mr. Bryson, my Lady's husband, since dead, at the King's Head tavern, with whom I had some business.

Mr. Bryson was there then, (I suppose it was by appointment they met) and in half an hour Mr. Noak came up stairs. After they had chatted some three complements, they came to talk about meeting at Mr. Attorney-General's chambers in the Temple, to treat about their controversy.

Says Mr. Noak, let there be a consultation upon it of go, as he said by him that falls. Mr. Bryson, Mr. Bryson, I will make no lecture, but I will certainly meet there.

Says Mr. Noak again; And I question not but to give such satisfaction, as whereby to converse you and my Lady, that this is not her Estate. I should be glad to hear that, says Mr. Bryson; why I hope you do not think the deeds not forged? No, says Mr. Noak, I do not think they are forged.

Mr. Kensley offered me a long time ago, to show me that deed, and I might have had it in my possession; but I would not; for if I had, I should have been the worst man in the world to have it. This is all I can say.

L. C. J. And what is this to the purpose, Gentlemen? Alack—a day, this is very thing, a slight discourse in a tavern. How can any answer be given to such an evidence? That indeed it does not need any. Pray let not our time be taken up with such trifling stories of a cock and a bull, go on to that which is material.

Mr. At. Gen. Now we shall produce a leaf from Mervin Hall to one Reper, of part of this eleven acres and an half.

Clark reads. This indenture made the 13th day of November, in the 22d and 23d years of the reign of our sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Indies, Territories, and Islands; Defenders of the Faith, Arch-Bishops of Angora, Dukes of Burgundy, Millen, and Brabant; Counts of Hainault, Flanders and Tire; between Mervin Hall of London, miller, of the one party, and Richard Reper, citizen and father of Reveries, of the other party, witnesses, That the said Mervin Hall, for the sum of six pounds of good and lawful money of England, to him by the said Richard Reper in hand paid; whereof the said Mervin Hall clearly acquittance and discharge the said Richard Reper, his executors and assigns, and every of them, by their present, hath granted, sold, aliened, and to turn lease, and by their present grant, aliened, and to turn lease, to the said Richard Reper, a parcel of marsh-ground, lying and being in Wapping marsh, at the east end of the marsh, beginning at the well side of the well, which lieth by the way that leadeth up to the Lydney, called Shadrach, measured by a straight line from the Lydney, by the well side of the well, to the Thomas wall, and reacheth well to the way that leadeth up into Wapping high-way, containing by estimation of measure seven acres, little more or less, and the pond; all which marsh-land abuteth north upon the Lydney of the Dean and Chapter of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, and south upon the Thomas wall; and also the Thomas wall belonging to the seven acres, with the forland and foil, down to the low-water mark of the River of Thames; all which marsh-land are lying in the parish and manor of St. Andrew, alias Stepney, in the County of Middlesex; to have and to hold the said parcel of marsh-ground, wall, forland and foil, with the appurtenances, to the said Richard Reper, his executors and assigns, from the feast of the Annunciation of our blessed Lady St. Mary the Virgin, next coming, unto the end and term of four-and-twenty years from thence next ensuing, and fully to be completed and ended; yielding and paying therefor yearly, during the said term, to the said Mervin Hall, his executors and assigns, three pounds of good and lawful money of England, at four terms of the year—

L. C. J. What date is that deed of?—Clark. The 13th of November, in the 22d and 23d years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

Mr. At. Gen. Now we shall read Stephen's license to Hall, to alien his term.

Clark reads. To all manner of people to whom this pre-sent writing shall come, I Thomas Stephen, alias Sorbin of the parish of St. Andrew, alias Stepney, in the County of Middlesex, brewer, send greeting in our Lord God everlasting.

Whereas I the said Thomas Stephen on the 25th of April, in the sixth year of Edward the Sixth, have taken eleven acres and a half of marsh-land with all the bank with the forland and foil, down to the low-water mark of the River of Thames that he should not alien or assign the said lease or term of years, without the special licence or consent

Now know ye, That I the said Thomas Stephen, for diverse good causes give leave and licence to the said Mervin Hall, to the right worshipful Mr. Dean of the Cathedral Church of St. Paul with the wall, forland and foil under such conditions, as is rehearsed and contained.

Mr. Williams. I would ask Mr. Bensley something about this deed; look upon it, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. We have not done with him yet. Pray take that deed out of his hand.

Mr. Sir. Pomfret. You will let him give some account of it first, Mr. Attorney.

Mr. At. Gen. You would fain confound him.

Mr. Sir. Pomfret. He is confounded enough already.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Now, Mr. Banjo, I have considered it, pray once more look upon the deed again—(which he did).—Was that deed one that you signed then or no?

Banjo. This is my name, but I cannot find the date of this deed in my paper. I cannot tell now whether it be one I found then or no.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Did you set your hand to any deeds that were found there, which you did not find down in your paper?

Banjo. No, not that I know of, I do not know I did.

L. C. J. Pray where did you find the deed that you found?

Banjo. I set my hand to the deeds that were found there at the house.

L. C. J. Did you set your hand to some else but what were found there?

Banjo. I have set my hand to divers deeds besides, but they are none of those deeds that are in my paper.

L. C. J. Where did you set your hand to any deeds besides?

Banjo. To divers deeds I have set my hand at home.

L. C. J. Have you to any relating to the lands in question?

Banjo. I do not know that I have set my hand to any deeds relating to the lands in question, but at Mr. Kensel's.

L. C. J. To what purpose did you set your hand and name to the deeds you found at Kensel's?

Banjo. To the same intent to testify that I was at the finding of them.

L. C. J. To what end did you set your hand to any other deeds?

Banjo. To the intent that I know better where the lands did lie than the deed, and when my Lady found any deeds, I set my hand to them, and then found the places where the lands lay.

L. C. J. You had had a fair time to consider of that deed, could you see there to what place that deed related, by this mark?

Banjo. I cannot find the date of the deed in my paper.

L. C. J. But where do you think you did put your name to that deed?

Banjo. I cannot tell whether I did it at that time or no, but this is my name.

L. C. J. I know thy name is thus, man, I read it two hours ago: but did you put your hand to that as one of the deeds that you found in September, 1683, when you were at Mr. Kensel's, or not?—Banjo. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Dost thou believe thou didst not?—Banjo. I cannot tell.

L. C. J. Canst thou tell the reason why thou didst set thy hand to it?

Banjo. Certainly because I was at the finding of it, I know so otherwise.

Mr. S. Pender. Now pray look upon this deed (showing him another) and see whether that be thy name or not?

Banjo. Yes, my Lord, I will.

Mr. S. Pender. Is that your name?

Banjo. Yes, it is; this is one of the deeds that was found at Mr. Kensel's.

Mr. S. Pender. You told us as to the other two.

Mr. S. Pender. But he was not positive in it.

Banjo. This is rat-eaten, and so I know it again; and there is a rat-eaten deed set down in my paper.

L. C. J. Let him be as positive as he will, he has been fourteen five times.

Mr. Sol. Gen. He was confounded with a mistake of the deeds, he having set his hand to so many.

L. C. J. They are perjured both of them plainly; that is the truth of the matter.

Mr. Sol. Gen. I hope the folly of our witnesses in such circumstances, shall not rob us of our own land, and that it appears to be plainly.

L. C. J. God forbid but you should have your own land; but by the Grace of God, if I can help it, you shall never have a foot of land by foreclosing and perjury.

Mr. Williams. When did you find that deed?

Banjo. The 13th of September.

Mr. Williams. Where?—Banjo. In the garret at Mr. Kensel's.

Mr. Williams. Are you sure of it?

Banjo. Yes, I am sure of that deed, because it is rat-eaten.

Mr. Williams. Kensel, pray, do you look upon it, what day you to that deed?

Kensel. This is my hand, and this is one of the deeds that was found there at that time.

Mr. Williams. Pray read the date of that there.

Kensel reads. This Indenture, made the 13th day of November, in the 3d and 34 years of Philip and Mary—

S. Pender. This is a deed from Maria Hall to Raper; how should that come to be at Kensel's?

L. C. J. They have taken it.

Mr. Sol. Gen. They go about to blench our deeds by the folly of our witnesses, which we cannot help. We however leave the deeds to the jury, and let them see if these facts and other things look like counterfeit.

L. C. J. Well, so on, the jury will have the deeds with them.

Mr. Sol. Gen. My Lord, we did before produce a conveyance from Richard Hill to Staph. It recited not these, that conveyance had no legal execution; it was then made, and a fine and recovery by the heir of Hill, and what was the occasion of this, will appear by the deed.

Kensel reads. This Indenture made the 12th day of November, in the 5th and 36 years of the Reigns of our Sovereign Lord and Lady, Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God King and Queen of England, Spain, France, both the Sicilies, Jerusalem, and Ireland, Defenders of the Faith; Archbishops of Dublin, Dukes of Burgundy, Milan and Brabant; Counts of Hainault, Flanders and Toul; between John Hill, son and heir of Richard Hill, late Citizen and Merchant of London, of the one party; and Maria Hill, late wife and executrix of the last will and testament of Thomas Hill, and John Hill, son and heir apparent of Thomas Hill, of the other party, witnesses, That whereas the said Richard Hill, father of the said John Hill, by the said Maria Hill, amounting in the whole to the sum of 1000*l*.

And where variance concerning all that parcel of marsh-land unto Sir Katharine's, which the said Richard Hill bought of Cornelius Fanderdy for the assuring all that Wapping-marsh, the said Richard Hill stands bound in without or otherwise within the parishes their heirs and assigns for ever, all the right, title, together with all evidences and writings discharged of all former charges, incumbrances by the said John Hill.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Next we shall find that Maria Hill, that had this long lease, and had demised the seven acres down from Shadwell to Raper, doth on the 12th of November, in the 5th and 36 years of Philip and Mary, surrender the remaining four acres to Thomas Staph, and then we shall find it was demised to Fer, who was the full builder and male Fer's lease.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Your Lordship doth observe, that the licence was to assign the whole eleven acres and an half; but he did assign but seven.

Kensel reads. This is dated on the 12th of November, in the 5th and 36 years of King Philip and Queen Mary.

To all whom this present writing shall come, I Maria Hill of Ratcliffe, miller, greet greeting in our Lord God everlasting. Whereas Thomas Staph by his Indenture, dated the 20th day of April, in the 6th year of King Edward VI. let to me the said Maria Hill on the one side to have, or to, or four acres of marsh-land, abutting on the green bank, at my house, and for six years, to be paid by the said John Staph, yearly, to the well side of the lands in the occupying of Raper, which said lands was made over with the leave and licence of the said Thomas Staph, to the right worshipful for the term of twenty-three years; and with on the field, in the occupying of John north on the Lyons, and south of it, or to the Thames wall abutting on the south-west wall, as aforesaid down to the low-water-mark of the River of Thames So that neither I, my executors or assigns, any right, claim, demand but from all or any part thereof shall be utterly excluded and departed for ever—

Mr. Sol. Gen. Here is a fine levied, Quod Vin 3 Eia, they had both also where that was found too? Is not that forged?

[The Fine was read.]

Mr. Sol. Gen. Here is a recovery also, and a deed to lead the Utes: In which recovery the names John Hill, who voucheth over the common voucher.

[The Recovery was read.]

L. C. J. Read your deed to lead the Utes.

Kensel reads. This Indenture made the 12th day of May, in the fourth year of the reign of our Sovereign Lady Elizabeth, by the Grace of God, Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. between Maria Hill and John Hill, of the one party, and Edward Staph, of the other party, witnesses, That whereas the said Richard Hill, father of the said John Hill, by the said Maria Hill, amounting in the whole to the sum of 1000*l*.

Mr. Williams. Mr. Banjo, pray, Sir, look upon this deed, and see whether your name be to that deed or no? (Showing him the Bar order of Hall.)

Banjo. This is my name.

Mr. Sol. Gen. Was Mr. Kensel's hand to that deed?

Banjo. I cannot tell.

4 F

Mr.

L. C. J. Rule Flow upon Grenade's flood; therefore this mill he your land: that is all the argument I can make of it. Your boundaries do make it as plain as the nose in a man's face.

Mr. At. Gen. Swear Mr. Hailwell. [What was done.]—How long have you known this place, the lands in question?—Hil. Not above a year.

L. C. J. He is your Surveyor, I think.

Mr. At. Gen. He is his, my Lord. Pray, you Cape, which way did the water go?—Cape. Westward.

L. C. J. But which way did you see it go to the river from the Lyons's? Cape. We sometimes went the lower way, and sometimes the higher way.

L. C. J. Which was the higher way?—Cape. Remington's way.

L. C. J. And which was the lower way? Cape. Through Wapping and Shobell's. Shobell's is the lower way.

L. C. J. Thou take 1/4 of the north-west way; but if you went in go directly into north to south, which way would you have gone?

Cape. Down Cock-hill, or down Brass-bridge.

L. C. J. Where is that?—Cape. Beyond Cock-hill.

L. C. J. Whereabouts is it?—Cape. Within a little of Fox's lane.

L. C. J. When you went down Cock-hill, upon which hand did you leave the mill?

Cape. If I went the lower way, I left the mill on the left-hand.

L. C. J. But when you went the higher way down Cock-hill? Cape. Then we left the mill behind us.

L. C. J. What dost thou mean by behind thee?—Cape. I left it particularly.

Mr. At. Gen. Yes, my Lord, he is right.

L. C. J. But I say he is not right, Mr. Attorney, for Cock-hill is north of the mill.

Mr. At. Gen. Cape, do you know Fox's lane?—Cape. Yes, very well.

L. C. J. Is it raised?—Cape. Yes, right or near foot.

Mr. At. Gen. What was the reason of its being raised? Cape. It was not fitting for carts to go over.

L. C. J. Why to?—Cape. The Water came upon it.

Mr. At. Gen. And then to come to the amendment, taking in the place in question, it makes just 130 acres, which is our number, and no more.

L. C. J. Then you will leave the Dean nothing.

Mr. At. Gen. Yes, he has about 40 years.

L. C. J. Where?

Mr. At. Gen. In the east, beyond this place.

L. C. J. Why, would you have any of the land that belongs to the mill?

Mr. At. Gen. We claim this as marsh-land; which they have nothing to do with, and the number of acres will not be altered without it. Mr. Hailwell, have you advertised the marsh?—Mr. Hail. Yes; I have, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. From whence did you begin?—Hil. From Howe's gate-Ditch.

Mr. At. Gen. Within what bounds?

Hil. That which they call the Lyons's and the marsh to St. Katherine's from the well.

Mr. At. Gen. And how much does it make?

Hil. Besides the well and the Lyons's, I find it something above 130 acres.

L. C. J. Something above, how much?—Hil. Not an acre above.

Mr. Hail. Pray, Sir, how many acres lies out of Grenade's land.

Hil. Besides the well and the Lyons's, I can make but fifty acres and an half.

L. C. J. Where did you reckon up the whole?

Mr. At. Gen. To make up the 130 acres he took in the mill and all.

L. C. J. That is very well.

Mr. At. Gen. Why, my Lord, it is no more than 130 acres, and so much we must have.

L. C. J. Look into the survey that you produced, and see what that says.

Mr. At. Gen. Besides all—

Mr. At. Gen. Those lie eastward of the mill.

L. C. J. Pray, did you measure the well?

Hil. Wapping well is 20 acres.

Mr. At. Gen. If they will consent, the Jury shall have the survey with them.

Mr. Hail. With all our hearts, let them have it.

L. C. J. Gentlemen, both sides consent, you shall have the survey with you; but without that consent you could not have had it, it is so being under seal.

Mr. At. Gen. Then we defer our last verdict may be read.

Mr. At. Gen. It was a verdict upon full evidence?—Yes, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. How many hours did it last?—Answer. Five or Six.

Mr. At. Gen. Was there a view in it?—Answer. There was so.

L. C. J. Read it.—[What was done.]—Mr. Hailwell, how much, pray, is the land between Fox's lane and the mill?

Hil. Below the Lyons's I find it to be seven acres and an half.

L. C. J. Can you expost that all that little word of garden, orchard, &c. should be answered under seven acres and an half? Besides, the full and ancient reversion of rent was 20 s. a year; after it, was increased to 10 s. a year, and it doth appear the mill turned 10 s. 10 d. a year, that it was pulled down, and so the land was to answer the rent; which, for a ground-rent upon a Church-lease, in those days, was very great. Have you done now?

Mr. At. Gen. We have done for the present, my Lord.

L. C. J. What say you to it then for the Plaintiff, Gentlemen?

Mr. S. Stringer. May it please your Lordship, and your Gentlemen of the Jury; if we should give no further evidence at all than what we have already given, but leave it upon this, I dare affirm it plainly appears that they have no title at all to this land. As to their last piece of evidence I would still give an answer to that, and that is their verdict; and that which I would observe upon it, and say to it, is this; it was a verdict obtained upon forged Deeds: Deeds found, as is proved, and as you have heard from their two special witnesses, in a very extraordinary manner, found in a gutter. But by what act procured, and that they are forged, I question not but we shall give you satisfaction. But besides, as to their advertisement, it seems if they would have 20 s. a year in the question about the extent of the marsh. So much they claim; and we shall bring two Surveyors that will give you an account upon their oaths, that between Fox's Lane, which we lay in the well boundary of our land, and the call of theirs, and Howe's gate-Ditch, where the marsh ends, there is above 130 acres; and so they do not want their number. For all the evidence that they have given out of Records, we agree them to be as they say; and by that agreement shall do ourselves no harm at all, for they all do confirm our assertion. They place the eastern bound of the marsh at Remington's way, now of Fox's lane from Rat's gatehouse begin. The art has been to confound the Clerk by passing his name, when it is a plan, apparent mistake they run upon; and indeed I may very well say, a wilful one too. They would have us confine all to a mill and a little ditch, when there are in all five acres always enjoyed with it, and all called the mill, which had a pond, gardens, orchards, tenements, &c. And now there are very large drains necessarily made, to keep the water from annoying the inhabitants, and so carry it away. But for a further evidence of our title, we shall still prove, that upon an bill exhibited in the Exchequer by Mr. Attorney General, against Stephen their ancestor, to know what acknowledgments had been made, what before us to the Dean of Pew's, and what to Mr. Stephen, are fully set out.

There it is proved, that the bounds of the marsh were Ray's mill, since Fox's lane. The marsh was continually overflowed with water; but now in our ground there was a great many ditches and places to keep the water for the service of the mill. When we came to build upon our ground, which was 25 Tenches, [then it began] then he brought an action, and did pretend that we did encroach the wall (foretold) into the marsh, there we had a verdict upon a view, and after a 100-foot upon full evidence. There was likewise a Bill exhibited in Chancery against Stephen the father; wherein the bounds are set forth, and he in his answer particularly enumerated the boundaries. And it has been constantly the reputation of the place, that this was the Dean's lands, foretold by the Dean's lands, told in the last times of usurpation as the Dean's lands.

The first thing, my Lord, which they produced, and that we did then, and do now controvert, is Carver's lease. This, they say, was found in the gutter; and they bring two witnesses for it: But how they have behaved themselves! What confusion there is in their evidence! You for—

L. C. J. Brother Stringer, if you have any evidence to give, pray give that first, and leave your remarks till the last; you shall then say what you will; but first give your evidence.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, we shall pursue your direction: We say upon Fox's building, Stephen claiming that the wall belonged to him, comes and brings an action of ejectment against Fox's tenants for this wall, and upon trial the verdict went against him. Then there was another action brought, and he was non-suited upon that. Afterwards, there was a bill preferred against him, and in his answer he confessed that this wall-marsh belonged upon Fox's lane. Here are the Bill and Answer.

[Which were read]

As likewise Copies of two Records, one in the Common-Pleas; the other in the King's Bench.

Bill. 22 Jacobus. Ejectment; George Bawell, Plaintiff, against Thomas Fox, Defendant. Not paid, placed a wall for the Defendant.

Mich. 14 Jacobus. Ejectment; William Torrell, Plaintiff, against Thomas Fox. Not paid, placed, and the Plaintiff became Nephew.

Sir John Trevor. My Lord, we have this further piece of evidence; we have here a lease made by Stephen, of seven acres of lands, with a wall of Fox's lane, which divides the marsh from the mill-ditch, and there is a covenant, that if he recover any part of the wall, marsh-wall, the tenant shall have the advantage of it, and increase his rent.

[Which I took leaving date, 16 Aug. 13 Jac. Anno Dom. 1613.]

Mr. Hailwell. This was in time between the non-suit and the verdict.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, as I did open it, there was an information exhibited by Mr. Attorney General, 10 July 7 C. 1. against our tenants and theirs, and upon that information there were examinations of witnesses, and all the bounds of both parties particularly set out; which make it all as plain and clear as can be. This cannot be set up to prove a ten; it was in 7 C. 1. so long ago; and when that shows the wall to be the inheritance of the Dean of Pew's, it answers all their pretence of a lease.

L. C. J. Look you, Brother, that cannot be given in evidence, and I will tell you why; if it were an information against Stephen himself, he being the party under whom they claim, no doubt it were evidence; but it is against the tenant of the one, and the tenant of the other, who only could support their own tenancies, but they could not know their landlords particular titles, and then this cannot be evidence to bind their inheritance.

Mr. S. Stringer. We submit it to you, my Lord. Then we shall offer you a survey. In the year 1649, this was expected to be at Church-lands, and a survey taken, and found to be the inheritance of the Church of Pew's; and in fact sold for good, and enjoyed by the Purchasers till the Revolution.

Mr. Hailwell. Yes, and to that very person told from whom they say they had their lease, which they have produced: That is, to Winterton's, whose Executor Kearle was, as he says; and if he had given a lease, which then had been forty years in being, would he have given so much money, or ventured to purchase it as the inheritance of the Church?

Mr. S. Stringer. Here is the survey then taken.

Mr. At. Gen. We oppose the reading of your survey, because it had not any authority to warrant it.

L. C. J. Nay, Mr. Attorney, tho' there was no sufficient authority, yet for things have always been allowed in evidence. You cannot but remember it was done in the case of Highgate-Road, when they call it, Winterton's Road.

Mr. At. Gen. Then let them read the commission it was made upon.

Mr. S. Pemberton. We have none; there were many things done then of this nature, without commission under seal.

L. C. J. Ay, they did them by orders from Committees. Read it, [it was read, dated Dec. An. 1649.]

Mr. S. Stringer. Now we will show the deeds of purchase, which was by deed enrolled.

Dated 23 Nov. An. 1660. for 9500 l.

Mr. S. Stringer. My Lord, because they pretend this to be an over-shot-mill, as they call it; though it is plain it could not be by the place, yet we have three tide-mills that we would trouble you with a little: but first here are some others, Blind, Merr, and Leyburn, who who will give an Account of it—(They were James).—Blind, Do you know the Houses in question?—Blind, Yes.

Mr. Williams, How long have you known them?

Blind, Thirty Years.

Mr. S. Pender, Pray, what is the common Reputation whole the Lands were?—Blind, It was always taken to be the Dean's Lands.

Mr. Williams, Who were the Tenants?

Blind, Mr. Whitcomb and Mr. Whitcomb.

L. C. J. Prithor, could thou tell what was taken to be the East Boundary of Whittington's?—Blind, Far's Lane.

L. C. J. Was that the Reputation, upon your Oath, in all your Time?

Blind, Yes, ever since I knew it.

Mr. Williams, Blind, Pray, do you know the Pond?

Blind, The Ponds were filled up; but there were Ditches in my Time.

L. C. J. How near were the Ditches to Far's Lane?

Blind, Within ten Feet.

Mr. Williams, What was the use of those Ditches?

Blind, The Water came in at Ball-shay, and filled up the Ditches with the Tide, and it went back again.

Mr. S. Pender, Can you tell who purchased these Lands of the State in the late Times?—Blind, Whitcomb and Whitcomb.

Mr. Williams, Blind, Pray, do you know the Pond?

Blind, The Ponds were filled up; but there were Ditches in my Time.

L. C. J. How near were the Ditches to Far's Lane?

Blind, Within ten Feet.

Mr. Williams, Blind, Pray, do you know the Pond?

Blind, The Ponds were filled up; but there were Ditches in my Time.

Mr. Williams, And this, he says, lay West of Far's Lane; and there is your Shed Bounds for you!

Mr. At. Gen., I ask you again, that Spring which you mentioned, did it lie in the Dean and Chapter's Lydney, or no?—Carleton, I told you I know not where the Ground was; the Church Bounds were near.

Mr. S. Lusk, Did it lie in Upper Shadwell?

L. C. J. He answers as plain as any Man can, it was where the Church now is.

Mr. Williams, Where is Kemp? Do you know the Houses in question?

Kemp, The Houses in Shadwell I do know, between Ball-shay and Far's Lane; I knew them before they were built as they are now; there were some small Houses built here and there all along. There was a Pond and Datchet to receive the Water of the Tide; but at Ball-shay especially, these were Houses along to the northward; among the rest, Mr. Croome's House, who had a large Orchard and Garden.

L. C. J. Where was that?

Kemp, Eastward of Far's Lane, and several other Houses there were.

Mr. Williams, Whole Inheritance was it?

Kemp, Mr. Moore was my Master's Landlord, and Shadwell was requested by Lord and Gravel.

Mr. Williams, She was Let under the Church.

Mr. S. Pender, Did you know the Cens and Ditches in that Ground?

Kemp, Yes, Sir.

Mr. S. Pender, How far went they William?

Kemp, The Ditch ran all in one till it came to Ball-shay, where it parted in the Northward and the Willward.

L. C. J. How near Far's Lane?

Kemp, Within a Dozen or twenty Yards of Far's Lane.

Mr. At. Gen., What Sort of Ground was it? Was it not Marsh-ground?

Kemp, A Plain that builds Boats in Winter-time; put his Shallops into the Pond, otherwise it was very good Ground to grow the Northward; there were very many good Houses built, and since Mr. Nale had to do with Shadwell, they have built a Mr. Croome's, and built a Water-house, and two other Houses there.

L. C. J. Read the Survey again, that mentions Croome's House there.

(Which was done.)

Kemp, That was bounding Northward that Way.

Mr. Williams, It is Part of the eleven Acres now in Question.

L. C. J. Do not you contend for the Brown House?

Mr. At. Gen., For the Wain-house, we do.

L. C. J. Is not the Water house built upon Part of Croome's Ground?

Kemp, Yes, Sir.

Mr. Williams, When did you know this first?—Kemp, Fifty Years ago.

Mr. Williams, Was this Ground Overgrown or Garden then?

Kemp, Several Places of it were Gardens and Orchards; some Places had Houses, chiefly to the Northward, some good Houses and Orchards, especially Mr. Croome's.

Mr. At. Gen., Do you speak of the hill or the low Ground?

Kemp, The middle Ground chiefly, that lay Northward.

Mr. At. Gen., Do you know the Lydney, the Billy Ground?

Kemp, Up higher to Ratcliff high-way, I did.

Mr. At. Gen., Did you know the Ditch that came under the Bottom of the Lydney?—Kemp, The Stream did run in several Places, but the Ground was good Ground, Northward especially.

Mr. At. Gen., Were there any Houses built on the South-side of that Ditch?—Kemp, There were a great many built between the Ditch and the Thames, between Ball-shay and Far's Lane.

Mr. At. Gen., What, fifty Years ago?

L. C. J., Your own Time.

Mr. Williams, Call Daniel Home.—Swear him. (Which was done.)

Do you know the Mill and Lands in question?

Home, I knew it when it was a Mill.

L. C. J., How long is it since you left knew it?—Home, Forty Years.

L. C. J., Prithor, what Kind of a Mill was it?

Home, A Ground-shot Mill; the work in Water at Ball-shay, and it ran towards the West to Far's Lane, in several Branches and Ditches.

L. C. J., How? A Ground-shot Mill, I say?—Why, these Gentlemen say it was an Over-shot Mill.

Home, My Lord, it could be no Over-shot Mill, for the Water will not rise high enough to drive such a Mill; it ran in several Ditches to preserve a free rising to overflow the Ground. Besides, my Father, who was a Mill-wright himself, told me he had known it three-score Years, and knew it always a Ground-shot Mill: He told me of all the Mills about London, what they were.

Mr. At. Gen., Pray, how old was your Father when he said you so?

Home, He had known them, he said, sixty Years, and he has been dead twenty Years.

Mr. Williams, By the Mill was removed; he could not know it so long.

L. C. J., I know so Proof of it as his own Death.

Home, My Lord, there it was, he said.

Mr. At. Gen., Was there not a Pond and Ditches?

Home, There must be Ditches to receive the Water as it came in; but still the more the Tide came in, that filled up the Ponds; and as it went back again, it drove the Mill.

Mr. Williams, What Profession are you of, pray?

Home, I am a Mill-wright.

Mr. At. Gen., Pray, do they make use of a Trough in such a Mill?

Home, They do use an Over-shot Mill.

Mr. At. Gen., How is a Trough of Lead in their Lead. Do not they use a Trough in an Under-shot Mill?

Home, No, if it be by the Tide a Ground-shot Mill, there is no Necessity of a Trough.

Mr. Williams, We have a great many Witnesses to this Point. Swear Grindly.—(Which was done.)—Are you a Mill-wright?

Grindly, I am only a Miller.

Mr. Williams, Did you know the Mill in question?

Grindly, I cannot remember it, Sir.

L. C. J., How long have you known the Place?

Grindly, Thirty or forty Years: But I had no Acquaintance with that Mill they speak of; but I know it is impossible for any Over-shot Mill Mill to be there: For I kept Part of a Tide-mill myself, and have done so for the forty Years; and I know the Water must rise at least ten, twelve, or fourteen Foot higher than it needs in a Tide-mill. For we take in our Water as the Tide comes in, and we have a Part of Gars that are hung with hinges at the top, which open as the tide comes in; but the water, as it goes out, shuts it again, and that keeps the water to stand three or four hours in some mills, and then we have only gates that belong to the wheel, and when we draw up the gates, the water goes out. We have no water that comes above the shaft, which is half the height of the wheel, which is sixteen foot high. To talk of an over-shot mill, the water must rise to high as to go over the whole mill.

L. G. J. And must draw all the town and country too. It is plainly so, Mr. Attorney, talk as long as you will.

Mr. At. Gen. Friend, Let me put this plain question; I would know, can they say a less than truth with this Tide-mill, as you call them Grabs.

Mr. At. Gen. Would not the springs in that parish carry an over-shot mill?

Grady. Sir, I have been the place all about many times; and I will say any man told to do that all the springs thereabout shall not produce a quarter enough water.

Mr. Williams. Where is Gorge Gars? Swear him.—[Which was done.]

—Do you know Fox-lane?—Gars. Very well.

Mr. Williams. How long have you known it?

Mr. At. Gen. Fifty years.

Mr. Williams. Did you know Shadwell, the well so called?

Mr. At. Gen. That I do, Sir.

Mr. Williams. Where does it, pray?

Mr. At. Gen. At the upper end of Fox-lane as we go westward, and just at the side of the Church-yard there is one now, and back'd over head, where they used to fish water; I never knew any other.

Mr. Williams. Was that called Shadwell?

Mr. At. Gen. I never knew any other but what I tell you of.

Mr. S. Attorney. Pray, what was usually taken to be the east-bound of Wigmore—may?

Mr. At. Gen. That well side of Fox-lane was called Mary-well, or Well-may, and that was the boundary to Stephen's lands; and eastward was always the lands of the Dean of Paul's, and I have known it this eighty-and-five years; nay, I was the first that ever built an house in Fox-lane.

Mr. At. Gen. Do you know the Lysons, on the high ground northward?

Mr. At. Gen. I know it not at this time.

Mr. At. Gen. This Well you speak of, did it not rise out of that ground?

Mr. At. Gen. It was by the Church-yard, that is now.

Mr. Williams. Sir, we hope we shall not need to be taught which is our inheritance; where is Mr. Merr? We shall soon, my Lord, unless the advertisement made by her Surveyor Hobbs. Pray, will you, Mr. Merr, tell the Court how many acres it is?

Mr. Merr. The land which is counted Wigmore-may, which is bounded on Fox-lane side, on the Dean's land well, upon Grady mill, Wigmore, Nightingale-lane, &c. if we take it to the upper ground, doth contain 130 acres; but take in that which is in question too, and it makes 141 acres.

Mr. Williams. Did you measure it too, Mr. Lysons?

Mr. Lysons. I did it too, Sir; and it is as he says.

L. G. J. How much is it?

Mr. Lysons. I took the whole, from St. Katherine's to Fox-lane, and it makes 140 acres before the upland and farland, and the like between Grady-mill and Wigmore-may; it is at least so much; it is, I think, somewhat more, the ditches being undermeasured.

L. G. J. Well, what is it all this while you say my brother Gregory for?

Mr. Williams. If your Lordship please, we have only a three question to ask Mr. Bacon Gregory; if the pleads to be tenure—[Which was done.]

Mr. At. Gen. You have claim'd the inheritance of it.

Mr. Williams. Sir, we hope we shall not need to be taught which is our inheritance; where is Mr. Merr? We shall soon, my Lord, unless the advertisement made by her Surveyor Hobbs. Pray, will you, Mr. Merr, tell the Court how many acres it is?

Mr. Merr. The land which is counted Wigmore-may, which is bounded on Fox-lane side, on the Dean's land well, upon Grady mill, Wigmore, Nightingale-lane, &c. if we take it to the upper ground, doth contain 130 acres; but take in that which is in question too, and it makes 141 acres.

Mr. At. Gen. You have claim'd the inheritance of it.

Deeds were forged. But we suspect it now no longer, for we have detected it, and will show as palpable, full-evident forgery upon the face of these deeds as ever was. I desire to be for the Deed of the 13th of November, in the 2d and 3d years of Philip and Mary, from Margaret Hall to Sper, and that of the 2d of December, in the same years, from Margaret Hall to Conor. I desire to be for both.

Mr. At. Gen. Come on, let us for this demonstration.

Mr. Williams. The Deeds have brought that evidence upon their own faces, that is 1000 witnesses.

Mr. Williams. Princes open the exception.

Mr. Williams. If your Lordship please to look upon them, the file of the King and Queen in both run thus: The one is, This Indenture, made the 13th day of November, in the second and third years of the King and Queen of England, France, and Scotland, James, and Ireland, Descenders of the Faith, Archbishops of Archie, Dukes of Burgundy, Albion, and Brabant, Counts of Hainault, Flanders, and Tyrol. The other is, This Indenture made the 2d day of December in the same year. Now in November and December, second and third of Philip and Mary, it was impossible for any man in the world to draw a deed in this form that those two writings are—

Mr. At. Gen. Is that your demonstration?

L. G. J. Pray, let me go on, mentions it is very ingenious.

Mr. Williams. My Lord, I had the first time my Lord Cole in his first testimony, not so to this particular file, for I know he is mistaken there, but for the denoting of forgery in general.

L. G. J. It is very well; pray go on.

Mr. Williams. My Lord, at that time King Philip and Queen Mary were, among other files, Isid King and Queen of Navarre, Princes of Spain and Sicily; they were called King and Queen of Spain, and both the Spain then; and lastly, Burgundy was never put before Albion. Now to give all this that I say, I have here all the Records of that time, and their files to be otherwise. Pray, We shall show the Acts of Parliament of that time. The first being the 2th of October, in that year, which was before their Deeds, and ended the 2th of December after. We shall first read the titles of the Acts of Parliament, and you will find them just as I have opened them. Read the Statute-Book.

Next read. 1. Acts made at a Parliament begun and holden at Westminster, the one-and-twentieth day of October, in the second and third years of the reign of our most gracious sovereign Lord and Lady Philip and Mary, by the Grace of God, King and Queen of England, France, and Scotland, and Ireland, Descenders of the Faith, Princes of Spain and Sicily, Archbishops of Archie, Dukes of Albion, Burgundy and Brabant, Counts of Hainault, Flanders and Tyrol, and there continued and kept until the dissolution of the same, being the ninth day of December then next ensuing.

Mr. Williams. Here in the Acts made by the public Council of the Kingdom, the file is in the ancient manner. And your Lordship observes there no small differences. Here first Spain is left out in the enumeration of the Kingdoms, and so Sicily and Navarre is instead of them. In the Deeds, Spain is put in before France, and the Scots made a Kingdom too. Secondly. Here in the file of the Acts they are called by Princes of Spain and Sicily, that in the Deeds is quite left out. And then in the Acts of Parliament, Albion is put before Burgundy in the Deeds Burgundy before Albion. And how this great alteration of the file should come to be put in a Miller's list, is strange. We have next an account of all the fines of Henry Terms, which was the next Terms following; for their first Deeds happen to be in Michaelmas Terms, and then the Parliament fine too. [Which was read.]

Mr. Williams. Here are likewise a line of the Exchequer Terms following, which these that fill the old file continued in all the public Records. And if we could as easily have brought all the enrolments of Deeds, that would prove the same. [The End of Esther Term read.]

Mr. Williams. Now, my Lord, we shall show when the file ceased, that was in Trinity Term after. [The Read read.]

Mr. Williams. But I cannot see how these Deeds could be truly made at that time, when they stand single, and none like them can be seen, except they come from the same forge that these do. I cannot believe it is his file, as he that drew his last for him could so long before properly what manner of file should be used.

Mr. Williams. Your Lordship has heard our Deed of the 2th of December, in the same year, read already; but we have here the Ledger-Book of the Church of St. Paul's, which cannot be made for a term, but was written at that time; we desire the file may be read there.—[Which was done.]

—But to go a little further, to satisfy your Lordship that they are very likely to be forged, we shall give some evidence that this is not an unusual thing with some people concerned in this case. The witnesses will name them to you, and give you an account of it. Swear this Lady and Sir Charles Conrad. [Which was done.]

L. G. J. Well, what is it you call their perjury?

Sir John Trotter. To speak plain, my Lord, we call them to give an account of my Lady Joy's forging a Mortgage from one Sir William Salt—hall for 1500*l.* of a house in St. Martin's-lane, to which surgery Mr. Dagfin, that Lady's husband, was pious, and what benefit he should have by it, you will hear. See Charles Conrad, pray, will you tell what you know of my Lady Joy in this matter?

Sir Ch. Conrad. My Lord, that which I have to say is this; my Lord, I am certain as my Lady said, Sir William Salt's widow, was a house in St. Martin's-lane, and was so to her husband a year and a half before he died. The house hath been built backward, and the garden side they kept to themselves; but all the house that was first built, I took, and have it still.

My Lady Willow come to the house about three months before Sir Willow died, passing from her husband Sir Thomas Ivy: she came thither as a refugee; she had been before, and was received very kindly. He died, as I said, about three months after, and my Lady then desired to know how accounts stood between Sir Willow and her about monies he had lent her, and supplied her with. And upon the account she appeared to me, Sir Willow said she then took 4*l.* more out of my Lady Willow's money, and told her, now Madam, I owe you 4*l.* She had been entertained as a guest there without paying any thing for it, and as his death she continued with my Lady Willow three quarters of a year after. And in my time (as she presented), in great kindness to me, she persuaded my Lady and me, that the lease of my Lady's house should be carried over to me, in trust for a debt of fourscore pounds that was owing to me by Sir Willow Willow. So I to my Lady Willow, Madam, I am in no doubt of my money, I pay as much rent as this in a year and more, I can pay my self that way, pray let me not meddle with any such thing, but, Duffin will be persuaded I intend to cheat them if I should. But still my Lady Ivy was at it, and prevailed upon my Lady Willow to send me to it. At last, upon their importunity, said I, if it be necessary for my Lady's service, let it be done what you think fit. She therefore gave directions to Mr. Sutton, and he came to me, and I directed him to draw a writing to turn over the house to me as a security. He asked me how much my debt was? Fourscore pounds, said I. Said he, I should for my Lord of Salisbury's lease to my Lady, for he must take out some things to draw this bill. He did it for me, and took as much by note out of it as he thought fit, to make the other by. Then a writing was drawn, this was in June 1679, or 1678, I am not certain particularly much, but she brings this writing, and my Lady Willow signed it by her self; and my Lady Ivy and Mr. Sutton were both witnesses to it. About a year after I heard that the bill on foot a Mortgage of her own upon this house from Sir Willow Willow. I wondered at it, because when the account was made up, the appeared to be in Sir Willow's debt; and I told those that told me of it, I would believe it when I did for it. I was then informed the writing was at Malborough. She after went out of town, and comes back again in a little while, and this writing, as I heard, was drawn to several persons of my acquaintance, that came to me and told me she had sent it, but said I, so have not I, but when I see it I will believe it. At last Sir John Wyl, who was a relation of mine, I married his aunt, one day brought over this writing to me; and sold me he had got this writing at last, and leave from my Lady Ivy to let me see it. I looked upon it, and there I did for at the bottom, where the seal was, Willow Willow, and then I turned to look upon the witnesses names. No, says he, you must not let that, who are witnesses to the Deed; for say Lady Ivy made me promise, before she let me have it in these you, that you should not see the witnesses names. Then said I again, I have been enough to give me satisfaction: I was a little more concerned that the thing was not a reality but fiction, and so I told him. My Lady Ivy that would not part, the officer, provided Mrs. Duffin, my Lady's daughter, might have the advantage of the house, to release the matter.

L. C. J. Pray, Sir, for how much was the pretended Mortgage?
Sir Charles Carter. For 1500*l.* that Sir Willow Willow owed her; which I thought somewhat strange, seeing, as I said, the owed Sir Willow as much as his debts. At last I came to produce my writing, (for she told me I might give Mrs. Duffin a night to the house). Now I had not read over the writing made me, but now when I came to look upon it, instead of a Mortgage for securing my debt, mine was a Deed of Sale from my Lady Willow, whereby the lease and the lease from my Lord of Salisbury were sold me for fourscore pounds; at which I was a little amazed. My Lady was then pleased to say I was a cheat, tho' I had no hand in it, nor indeed would have had any thing at all done; but upon my Lady Ivy's importunity, and my Lady Willow's, I gave direction only for a Mortgage.

L. C. J. What was it that Satme took out of my Lord of Salisbury's lease?

Sir C. Cat. He was to take notes to draw a Mortgage of that lease by.
L. C. J. He got the notes tho', for ought I perceive, to draw another Mortgage by. A very trick, it smells rank of the Kewer.

Mr. S. Stranger. Pray, Sir Charles, did you ever pay any money by my Lady's order?

Sir C. Cat. I did lend my Lady Ivy 50*l.* the being in distress for money, afterwards it was made up 100*l.* About February 1679, it was made up 1500*l.* by agreement among them my Lady Ivy did relinquish that said Mortgage he had that fit on foot: and there was a Deed Tripartite made between one of the first, my Lady Ivy of the second part, and some Trustees for Mrs. Duffin of the third part, whereby the reversion was given to Mrs. Duffin, and my Lady confirmed it, and gave my Lady Willow a Bond of 1000*l.* in which Colonel Gronow was bound for her, that she should not trouble my Lady about the house; yet notwithstanding did the afterwards write to Mr. Duffin, at I have heard, that he would let it on foot again, and she should have half of what the had received.

L. C. J. The Inheritance of the house, it seems, is in my Lord of Salisbury.
Sir C. Cat. Yes, my Lord; Sir Willow Willow had the original lease from my Lord of Salisbury.

L. C. J. What direction did you give Sutton about it?

Sir C. Cat. To make a Mortgage only to secure fourscore pound.

L. C. J. And what did he make?

Sir C. Cat. An absolute Deed of Sale.

L. C. J. Was there no proviso in it, to be void upon payment of money?

Sir C. Cat. No, nothing but an usual Sale for so much money.

L. C. J. You say my Lady Ivy afterwards did relinquish her pretended Mortgage; pray had she nothing for it?

Sir C. Cat. Nothing that I know of, she joined in that Deed Tripartite.

Mr. Willow. What should dispose her to give Mrs. Duffin 1500*l.* if it was really owing her?

L. C. J. Is that Mortgage here among your writings, Mr. Attorney?

Lady Ivy. Indeed, my Lord, I would have brought it, if they had given the least notice of what they now talk of.

Mr. At. Gen. Sir Charles Carter, do you know that my Lady Ivy forged that Deed?

Sir C. Cat. Not I, but it did appear to me to be no true Deed, upon what I found and knew.

Lady Ivy. You must give an account for what you have said here—

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, pray do not be in a passion: he has sworn what he has said here.

Lady Ivy. If he doth swear it, he is lawless.

L. C. J. Nay, Madam, you must be more moderate in the Court?

Mr. Willow. My Lady thinks the best occasion to be angry, but it may be we shall give her more exercise for her passion before we have done. Pray, swear that Lady, Mrs. Duffin. Will you acquaint my Lord and the jury, what you know has been done by my Lady Ivy, or by her direction, in making and altering of Deeds.

Mrs. Duffin. My Lord, I did see Mr. Duffin forge and counterfeit several Deeds for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. Do you hear what she says, Mr. Attorney?

Mr. At. Gen. Yes, my Lord, we shall give an account of her sworn.

L. C. J. Truly, I hope I misheard her, and did not hear right what she said. Pray, Madam, speak it over again, and consider what you say.

Mrs. Duffin. I say, my Lord, I did see Mr. Duffin forge and counterfeit several Deeds for my Lady Ivy. The first thing that I do remember was in the Trial between her husband and she; Mr. Duffin did by her order counterfeit a bond from him to some third person for 1000*l.* and several letters pretended to be written from Sir Thomas to my Lady Ivy were counterfeit.

The next thing that I remember, Mrs. Duffin was writing upon a parchment; I asked him what he was writing; he answered me, He was counterfeiting one Glover's lease, by which my Lady would get many hundreds of pounds, and for which he should have 500*l.*

I desired him to consider what he did, for before that time he had been accounted a very honest man. Some time after that, my Lady Ivy did upon pique to my mother, my Lady Willow, let a-foot a Mortgage she pretended to have of the house in St. Martha's-lane for 1500*l.* from my father.

She did once tell me she had had a Mortgage, as she pretended not, but that it was drowned in a trunk of writings coming from Malborough. Said I, my mother and Sir Charles Carter will not believe it, if you do not let them see it. I am furnished as to my concern in it, and would not have you proceed in it, for she pretended the did it for my advantage. But afterwards Mr. Duffin and she did agree to make a writing, in my sight, of a Mortgage.

L. C. J. Was my Lady Ivy by when the writing was made, as you say?

Mrs. Duffin. She was by, giving him order how to make it, and what ask he should use to make it look old; and they forced her to make the last, and to keep it close to put it in it to make it look old.

Mr. S. Stranger. Now will be the time to show my Lady's letters.

L. C. J. Misheer, I would ask you one question by the way, whether while their things were doing at any time, any body did come in and give you any interruption?

Mrs. Duffin. My Lord, Mr. Duffin and my Lady made me oftentimes stand at the door (for we were but lodgers) that no one might come and disturb them, and I never remember any that came in thither but one Mr. Sutton an Attorney, my Lady's Attorney.

L. C. J. Did he see any of this done?

Mrs. Duffin. I cannot say he helped to do any thing, for when he came in, they sometimes sent me out to see that no body should come upon them; and so what he did, I cannot say. But he was let in when

Mr. Duffin was counterfeiting for my Lady Ivy.

L. C. J. When was this; about what time?

Mrs. Duffin. Of the day, my Lord?

L. C. J. No, how long ago is it?—Mrs. Duffin. It might be about 20, or 30.

L. C. J. You are my Lady Willow's daughter, I think, and married Duffin?

Mrs. Duffin. I did, my Lord, I am her daughter.

Mr. Stranger. Pray, what did they do to the Deeds they made, to make them look like ancient true Deeds?

Mrs. Duffin. For the making of the outside look old and dirty, they used to rub them on windows that were very dirty, and smear them in their pockets to tressle them, for some weeks together, according as they intended to make use of them.

Mr. At. Gen. My Lord, as it happens, we have that Deed for talks of, called Glover's lease, here.

L. C. J. Ay, I suppose you have such a Deed; it is a famous Deed in Windsor-Isle.

Mr. At. Gen. Here it is, we desire she may look upon it, [Read she did.]

Mrs. Duffin. As far the Deed, I cannot fancy this is the Deed, there have been too many made by them. But he did counterfeit a Deed that he told me was one Glover's lease.

Mr. Willow. Misheer, you were going on, to tell how they did alter their Deeds they made. Pray tell us how they used to lay them on the Balconies, and any you know of the art.

L. C. J. Ay, how was it?

Mrs. Duffin. When they had been rubbed upon the window to make them look dirty, and they were to pass for Deeds of a great many Years standing, it was used to lay them in a balcony, or any open place, for the rain to come upon them and wet them, and so the next fast-fresh day they were exposed to the sun, or a fire made to dry them badly, that they might be believed.

L. C. J. Is your husband dead or alive?—Mrs. Duffin. Dead, Sir.

Mr. At. Gen. How long has he been dead?

Mrs. Duffin. I was not at his death with him, he died beyond sea.

L. C. J. Was your husband alive when Mr. Jehon's Business was?

Mrs. Duffin. Yes, he was.

L. C. J. Yes, I know he was in Court; tho' I asked the question, I remember all that business.

Mrs. Duffin. I was subpoena'd in at that time, but my Lady Ivy would not let me go.
